This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

Princeton University Library
32101 065111872

Digitized by Google

7600
.247

LIBRARY
OF POLITICAL SCIENCE AND JURISPRUDENCE

THE LIBRARY
OF
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

760C
247

Digitized by Google

COLLEGE LIBRARY,
JUN 13 1893
PRINCETON, N. J.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

—EDITED BY—

HON. JOHN F. DILLON AND SEYMOUR D. THOMPSON.

VOL. 1. 1874.

PUBLISHED BY
SOULE, THOMAS & WENTWORTH,
ST. LOUIS, MO.

Digitized by Google

(RECAP)

TABLE OF CASES

Reported or Criticised.

Adams Express Co., Bank of Kentucky v., 436, 446, 498, 500, 570, 572.
Adams Express Co., Buckland v., 571.
Adams Express Co., Olwell v., 186.
Adams Express Co. v. Schlesinger, 360.
Armstrong, Cal. Pacific R. R. Co., v., 124, 452.
Ætna Ins. Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. R. Co., 206.
Ah Fong, Matter of (with note), 516.
Ah Fook, Matter of, 515.
Alexander v. Central R. R. of Iowa, 543.
Alston v. Grant, 307.
Andover, Spaulding, v., 197.
American Express Co., Christenso v., 446.
Andrews, Pittsburgh & Connellsville R. R. Co., v., 489.
Andrews v. State, 273, 287.
Angell, In re (with note), 363, 371.
Appleton v. Bowles, 135.
Arthur, Carlisle & Son v., 95.
Atlantic & Pacific R. R. Co., Bailey v., 418, 502.
Aymette v. State, 273.
Auditor, N. Y., Belmont & Co., v., 111.
Aurora City, West v., 27.

Baez, Hatch, v., 135.
Bagley, People v., 299, 628.
Bailey v. A. & P. R. R. Co., 418, 502.
Bain, Wells v., 3.
Baker v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., 502, 503.
Baker v. Bolton, 615.
Ballentine, Daniels v., 224.
Baltimore, City of, Barron v., 295.
Bank of Kentucky v. Adams Express Co., (with note) 436, 446, 498, 500, 570, 572.
Baring Bros. & Co., v. Dabney, Morgan & Co., 337.
Barlow v. Kennedy, 51.
Bank of Charleston, Whaley v., 211.
Bank of N. America, Lemoine v., 529.
Barnes v. Wyethe, 236.
Barnett v. Hightower, 565.
Barney v. Leeds, 532.
Barney, Sweet v., 446.
Barnwell, Clarke, etc., v., 571,
Barrett, In re, 556.
Barron v. City of Baltimore, 295.
Barry, Gunn v., 173.
Bartholow v. Bean, 161, 166.
Bartlett, Gould & Heath, Saunders v., 84.
Battaile, Memphis v., 119.
Baxter, State v., 237, 238.
Beale, State v., 592.
Bear & Steinberg, In re, 607.
Beckerford, In re, 578.
Beecher v. Gillett, 27.
Bell & Murray v. State, 630.
Belmont & Co. v. Auditor N. Y. State, 111.
Beloit, Morgan v., 123.
Benedict, Lange v., 591.
Birdseye, Trustee v. Lake Superior Ship-Canal, &c., Co., 127.
Birmingham, Rex v., 236.
Bledsoe, Compr., v. International R. R. Co., 375, 401, 627.
Bliss v. Commonwealth, 260, 449.
Boatmans' Savings Institution, Tiffany v., 99, 104.
Bolton, Baker v., 615.
Borden, Luther v., 488.
Boston, Haley v., 69.
Boston, etc., v. Dana, 614.
Boston & Hingham Steamboat Co., Parker v., 206.
Boston & Lowell R. R. Co., Hill Manf'g Co. v. 423.
Bourbon Co. v. Lewis, 16, 30.
Bowen, Philadelphia & Baltimore R. R. Co., v., 63.
Bowles, Appleton v., 135.
Bowles, Ryppon v., 308.
Boyer, Knight v., 572.
Boutwell, United States v., 231.
Breedlove, Gwin v., 27.
Brewer Brick Co. v. Brewer, 371.
Brinkley v. Brinkley, 259, 272.
Bronson v. Kinzie, 174.
Brooks v. Page, 238.
Brossard v. Marsouin, 51.
Brown v. Mayor, etc., of Glasgow, 585.
Buchanan In re, 446, 565.
Buchanan Co., Huidekoper v., 177.
Buckland v. Adams Express Co., 571.
Burch In re, 565.
Burlington & Mo. River R. R. Co., Hunnewell v., 347.
Burroughs, Marsh v., 125.
Byrne, Williams v., 27.

Caballero v. Hentz, 303.
California Pacific R. R. Co. v. Armstrong, 124, 452.
Callaway Co., Foster v., 263.
Cameron v. McLennan, 462.
Canada Iron Mining, &c., Co., Commercial Union Ins. Co., v., 271.
Carew v. Rutherford, 232.
Carlisle & Son v. Arthur, Collector, 95.
Carris v. Carris, 235.
Carroll, Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co., v., 434.
Carroll County v. Reynolds, 226.
Cass Co., Jordan v., 319
Cass Co., Kennard v., 35.
Castellar v. Simmons, 236.
Central R. R. of Iowa, Alexander v., 543.
Chamberlin v. St. Paul & Sioux City R. R. Co., 51, 53.
Chandler, Receiver, v. Siddle, 341.
Chapin v. James, Administratrix (with note), 540.
Chapman v. Rose, 235, 242.
Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., Smith v., 76, 171.
Cheek, Waggoner v., 186.
Cheek v. Columbia Fire Ins. Co. (with note), 465.
Cheek v. N. American Fire Ins. Co. (with note), 465.
Cheek v. Phœnix Fire Ins. Co. (with note), 465.
Chicago & Alton R. R. Co., The People v., 340.
Chicago & Alton R. R. Co. v. Pondrom, 490.
Chicago & Northwestern R. R. Co. v. Northern Line Packet Co., 578.
Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., Baker, v., 502, 503.
Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., City of Davenport v., 384, 385.
Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co. Provost v., 502, 509.
Christenso v. American Express Co., 446.
City of Davenport v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co. (with note), 384, 385.
City of Memphis v. Battaile, 119.
City of Mexico (steamship), United States v., 191.
City of St. Joseph v. Kansas City St. Jo. and Council Bluffs R. R. Co., 184.
City Bank, Vanderhoff v., 15.
City Bank of St. Paul, Wilson v., 40, 135.
Clark, etc., v. Barnwell, 571.
Clark Co., Smith & Hall v., 45.
Clarke, Holmes, v., 112.
Clarke, McKinney v., 236.
Clinton, Macauley v., 160, 164.
Clinton, Stern Bros. v., 160, 164.
Coates v. People, 590.
Cochran v. D'Arcy, 173, 179.
Coffman, Gray v., 326.
Cole Murder case, 377.
Coleman v. Riches, 399.
Collier v. Dublin, Wicklow & Wexfor R. R. Co., 124.
Columbia Fire Ins. Co., Cheek v., 465.
Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons, 371.
Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. Canada Iron Mining & Manufacturing Co., 271.
Commonwealth, Bliss v., 260, 449.

Digitized by Google

Commonwealth (steamer), Taylor v., 502.
Connecticut Mutual Life Ins. Co., Wolf v., 301.
Conover, Executor, v. Mass. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 597.
Cooke, Jay & Co., In re, 580.
Coulter v. Frese et al., 193.
Coward, Ferguson v., 12.
Crane v. Reeders, 132.
Curry v. Curry, 100.
Cusic v. Douglas, 174.

Dabney, Morgan & Co., Baring Bros. & Co., v., 337.
Daly, Isaacs v., 141.
Daly v. Grimley, 418.
Dana, Boston v., 614.
Daniels v. Ballentine, 224.
D'Arcy, Cochran v., 173, 179.
D'Arcy, Lewis v., 405.
Dartmouth College case, 63.
Davenport v. Underwood, 250.
Davenport, City of, C. R. I. & P. R. R. Co., v. 384, 385.
Davidson, Fay v., 397.
Dean v. Peel, 539.
Dearmon, Irwin v., 539.
Deckert, In re, 316, 320, 578.
De Jarnette v. De Giverville, 226.
Denison v. Brown, 572.
Denver & Rio Grande R. R. Co. v. Comm'rs Pueblo Co., 218.
Des Moines, Field v., 604.
Dewey v. Hoag, 616.
Dillard, In re, 578.
Dodge v. Woolsey, 412.
Dole, In re, 121.
Dollar Savings Bank v. United States (with note), 261.
Doolan, Montreal v., 371.
Douglas, Cusic v., 174.
Douglas, First Nat. Bank v., 594.
Downing, Kirkpatrick v., 614, 617.
Dublin, W. & W. R. R. Co., Collier v., 124.
Durant, Union Pacific R. R. Co. v., 581.

Eastern R. R. Co., Harten v., 423.
Ebert, United States v., 205.
Englehart, Upton v., 335.
England, Feltham v., 112.
English v. State, 274.
Espy v. First National Bank of Cincinnati, 449.
Everett, Hale v., 91.
Everett, Meador v., 453.
Eyser, Western Union Tel. Co. v., 87.

Fair, Laura, v. State, 29.
Fairfax v. N. Y. Central R. R. Co., 303.
Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. v. Maquillan, 315.
Fichtenberg v. British Bark Woodland, 60.
Feltham v. England, 112.
Ferguson v. Coward, 12.
Ferguson v. Lowry, 416.
Field v. City of Des Moines, 604.
Fields v. State, 28, 29, 172, 179.
Finch, Washington University v.. 35, 66.
First National Bank, Espy v., 449.
First National Bank, Tappan v., 183.
First National Bank v. Douglas Co., 257, 594.
First National Bank v. Turnbull, 27.
Fisher v. Thirkell, 308.
Fitchburg R. R. Co., Metallic Compression Co. v. 212.
Flint and Pere Marquette R. R. Co. v. Lull, 131.
Flood, Ward v., 199.
Florence S. M. Co., Grover & Baker S. M. Co. v., 136.
Fort v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 39, 112, 118.
Fort Scott, Keane v., 140.
Foster v. Callaway Co. (with note), 263.
Fowler, Priestly v., 112.
Fox v. State, 295.
Francis, Queen v., 481.
Franke, In re, 448.
Franklin v. State, 172.
French v. Richard, 308.
Frese, Coulter v., 193.
Frost, In re, 566.
Fulton Co., Marsh v., 137.

Galloway v. Jenkins, 112.
Galpin v. Page, 487, 491.
Gibbons v. Ogden, 414.
Gillett, Beecher v., 27.
Gilman, McDonough v., 307.
Glasgow, Mayor of, Brown v., 585.
Glenham Manf'g Co., In re, 100.
Gouverneur, La Guen v., 446.
Gove Lathrop, In re, 189.

Grand Lodge v. Knox, 616.
Grant, Alston v., 307.
Graves v. Winter & Steele, Executors., 178.
Gray, Kent v., 244.
Gray v. Coffman, 326.
Great Northern R. R. Co., Hamlin v.. 125.
Great Western Telegraph Co., In re, 75.
Green, State v., 592.
Griffiths, In re, 507.
Grimley, Daly v., 418.
Grover & Baker S. M. Co. et al. v. Florence S. M. Co., 136.
Gunn v. Barry, 173.
Gwin v. Breedlove, 27.

Hale v. Everett, 91.
Haley v. City of Boston, 69.
Hamilton v. N. Y. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 171.
Hamilton v. The People, 296.
Hamlin, assignee, v. Pettibone, 404, 423, 428, 462, 471.
Hamlin v. Great Northern R. R. Co., 125.
Hannibal & St. Joseph R. R. Co., Aetna Ins. Co. v. 206.
Hare, Woods v., 3.
Harriman, Schulenberg v., 411.
Harriman v. Stowe, 400.
Harris, McGready v., 34.
Harten v. Eastern R. R. Co., 423.
Harwood, Leighton v., 147.
Haskell, In re, 531.
Hassard, Phila. Passenger R. R. Co. v., 373.
Hatch v. Baez, 135.
Hayes v. Kelley, 602.
Hedges, Louisville, etc., R. R. Co. v., 183.
Heffron, In re, 565.
Heine v. Levee Commissioners, 248.
Heneage, In re, 336.
Hentz, Caballero v., 303.
Hightower, Barnett v., 565.
Hightower & Butler, In re, 384.
Hill, In re, 149, 564.
Hill Manufacturing Co. v. Boston and Lowell R. R. Co., 423.
Hoag, Dewey v., 616.
Hoag, Sawyer v., 43.
Hoeger, Ramsay v., 321,
Holden, University R. R. Co. v., 112.
Holmes v. Clarke, 112.
Homestead Cases, 174.
Hooker v. Miller (with note), 55.
Hopkins v. Commonwealth, 286.
Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 324.
Hubbell v. Town of Waterloo, 124.
Hubbell & Chappell, In re, 247.
Huidekoper v. Buchanan Co., 177.
Huidekoper v. Vernon Co., 223.
Hull v. City of Kansas, 204.
Hunnewell v. Burlington and Mo. River R. R. Co. 347.
Hunt, In re, 359.
Hymes, In re, 462, 566.

Ingersoll, People v., 301.
International R. R. Co., Bledsoe v., 375, 401, 627.
Iron Mountain R. R. Co., Trask v., 171, 175.
Irwin v. Dearmon, 539.
Isaacs v. Daly (with note), 141.
Ives, Warren v., 312.

Jacobus v. St. Paul & Chicago R. R. Co., 375.
James, Chapin v., 540.
Jenkins, Galloway v., 112.
Jewsbury, Swift v., 160.
Johnson, In re, 223.
Johnson v. Monell, 186.
Joliet Iron and Steel Co., In re, 564.
Jordan v. Cass County, 319.

Kalbfleisch, Wade v., 99.
Kane v. McCown, 114.
Kansas City, Hull v., 204.
Kansas City, St. Jo , etc. R. R. Co., City of St. Jo. v., 184.
Kansas Pacific R. R. Co. v. Prescott, 349,
Keane v. City of Fort Scott, 140.
Keen, Morren v., 454.
Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co., 183.
Kelley, Hayes v., 602.
Kellogg v. Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co., 271' 278.
Kennard, New Jersey R. R. Co. v., 490.
Kennard v. Cass Co., 35.
Kennedy, Barlow v., 51.
Kennedy, In re, 173.
Kent v. Gray, 244.
Keuchler v. Wright, 627.

Kilbourn, Martin v., 94.
King, In re, 498, 506.
Kinzie, Bronson v., 174.
Kirkpatrick v. Downing, 614, 617.
Klinger, Spencer v., 4.
Knight v. Boyer, 572.
Knowles v. Logansport Gaslight Co., 135.
Knox, Grand Lodge v., 616.
Kuhn, Peoples' Ins. Co. v., 211.
Kuhn, Netter & Co. v. McMillan, 46.

La Guen v. Gouverneur, 446.
Lake Superior Ship Canal Co., Birdseye, v., 127.
Lake Superior Ship Canal Co., McCarter, v., 127.
Lake Superior Ship Canal Co., Sutherland, v., 127.
Lancashire & Yorkshire R. R. Co., Sneesly, v., 297.
Lange, United States, v., 147.
Lange v. Benedict, 591.
Laverick, Searle, v., 302.
Leavenworth, Lawrence & G. R. R. Co., United States, v., 423, 425.
Lehman Bros. v. Strassburger, 50.
Leeds, Barney, v., 532.
Leighton v. Harwood, 147.
Leiter v. Payson, Assignee, 87.
Lemoine, Assignee, v. Bank of North America, 529,
Levee Commissioners, Heine, v., 248.
Lewis v. Com'rs, of Bourbon Co., 16, 30.
Leonard, Townsend v., 69.
Lewis v. D'Arcy, 405.
Lincoln Co. Union Pac. R. R. Co, v., 106.
Linkhaw, State v., 75.
Lippincott & Co., Mitchell v., 265, 302.
Litchfield, In re, 220.
Lloyd v. Pacific R. R. Co., 591.
Lockwood, In re (with note) 254.
Logansport Gas Light Co., Knowles, v., 135.
Long, Phil. & Reading R. R. Co., v., 171,
Louisville, etc. R. R. Co. v. Hedges, 183.
Lowry, Ferguson v., 416.
Louisville & Portland Canal Co. United States v., 99, 101.
Luther v. Borden, 488.
Lull, Flint & Pere Marquette R. R. Co. v., 131.
Lyon, Pollard, v., 424.
Lyons, In re (with note), 137.

McCarter, Trustee, v. Lake Superior Ship Canal etc. Co. 127.,
McCartney, Voorhees v., 562.
McCarty Murder Case, 64.
McConnellsville R. R. Co. v. McClung, 490.
McCown, Kane v., 114.
McCue, N. W. Union Packet Co. v., 112, 119.
McDonough v. Gilman, 307.
McGinnity v. White (with note), 241.
McGlory v. McGlory, 94.
McGready v. Harris, 34.
McKinney v. Clarke, 236.
McLennan, Cameron v., 462.
McMillan, Kuhn, Netter & Co. v., 46.
McShane, Union Pac. R. R. Co. v., 347.
Macauley v. Clinton, Auditor, 160, 164.
Macon Co, State v., 225, 226, 229.
Maguire, North Missouri R. R. Co. v., 224, 271, 275.
Maguire, Pacific R. R. Co. v., 224, 228, 271.
Maquillan, Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v., 315.
Main, Assignee, v. Second Nat. Bank of Chicago, 232.
Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, In re, 19.
Market v. City of St. Louis, 211.
Marrett, Assignee, v. Murphy, 554.
Marsh v. Burroughs, 125.
Marsh v. Fulton Co., 137.
Marsou n, Brossard v., 51.
Martin v. Kilbourn, 94.
Martin v. Mott, 475.
Martin v. Payne, 538.
Mass. Mutual Life Ins. Co., Conover v. 597.
Matthews v. Mass. Nat. Bank, 469.
Mayor of Newark v. The State, 245 (with note) 252
Meador v. Everett, Assignee, 453.
Meek, Parker v., 539.
Memphis City of, v. Battaile, 119.
Merchants' Nat. Bank, Tappan v., 183.
Merrick Co., Union Pac. R. R. Co. v., 359.
Messman, United States v. 121, 159.
Midland etc. R. R., Redhead, v., 463.
Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. R. Co., 212.
Miller, Hooker v., 55.
Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co., Kellogg v., 271, 278.
Missouri River, Fort Scott & Gulf R. R. Co. v. Miami Co., 184.
Missouri, Kansas & Texas R. R. Co., United States v., 428.
Mitchell, State v., 260.

Digitized by Google

Mitchell v. Lippincott & Co., 265, 302.
Monell, Johnson v.. 186.
Montgomery, Thayer v., 365.
Montreal v. Doolan, 371.
Montreal, Vogler v., 65.
Mordaunt Case, 405.
Morey v. New York Life Ins. Co. (with note), 139.
Morgan, Peete v., 413.
Morgan v. Beloit, 123.
Morren v. Keen, 454.
Morris v. St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern R. R. Co., 591.
Morrison, Rex v., 148.
Mott, Martin v., 94.
Munn & Scott v. The People 88, 89.
Murdock, Woodson & Ewing v., 619, 628.
Murphy, Marrett v., 554.
Murrin, In re, 51.
Myers, Assignee, v. Seeley, 451.

Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co., Vaughn v., 568
Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co. v. Carroll, 434.
Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co. v. Sprayberry, 541.
New Jersey R. R. Co. v. Kennard, 490.
New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., Hamilton v. 171.
New York Life Ins. Co., Morey v. 139.
New York Life Ins. Co., Tait v., 171.
New York Central R. R. Co., Fairfax v. 303.
North American Fire Ins. Co., Cheek v., 465.
North American Life Ins., Co. v. Wilson (with note), 290.
North Missouri R. R. Co. v. Maguire, 224, 271, 275.
Northern Line Packet Co., C. & N. W. R. R. Co. v., 578.
Northwestern St. Louis R. R., St. Louis R. R. Co. v., 521.
Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. McCue, 112, 119.
Norton v. Wiswall, 571.
Nugent v. Supervisors of Putnam Co., 136, 153.
Nunn v. State, 260, 295.

Obear, In re, 347, 362, 371.
O'Brian, United States v., 11.
O'Donahue, Woodhouse v., 462.
Ogden, Gibbons v. 414.
Ogden v. Saunders, 174.
Olcott v. Supervisors, 63.
Olwell v. Adams Express Co., 186.
Oppenheimer v. U. S. Express Co., 107.
Oregon Central Military Road Co., Tilton v., 267.
Oregon Steam Navigation Co. v. Winsor, 350.
Osage Valley & S. Kan. R. R. Co., In re, 33.
Osborne, Stephenson v., 174.
Owens, United States v., 99.

Pacific R. R. Co., Lloyd v., 591.
Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire, 224, 228, 271.
Page, Brooks v. 238.
Page, Galpin v., 487, 491.
Palmer, Warren Savings Bank v., 565.
Parker v. Meek, 539.
Parker v. Boston & Hingham Steamboat Co., 206.
Payson, Leiter v., 147.
Payne, Martin v., 538.
Peele, Dean v., 539.
Peete v. Morgan, 413.
Peniston, Union Pac. R. R. Co., 51, 58.
People's Ins. Co. v. Kuhn, 211 (with note), 214.
Perkins, In re, 507.
Peoria, Pekin & Jacksonville R. R. Co. v. Peoria & Springfield R. R. Co., 45.
Pettibone, Hamlin v.. 404, 423.
Phila. & Balt. R. R. Co. v. Brown, 63.
Phila. Passenger R. R. Co. Hassard (with note), 373.
Phila. & Reading R. R. Co. v. Long, 171.
Phœnix Fire Ins. Co., Cheek v., 465.
Pittsburgh & Connellsville R. R. Co. v. Andrews, 489.
Planter's Bank v. Sharp, 174.
Pollard v. City of Pleasant Hill, 155.
Pollard v. Lyon, 424.
Pomeroy, State v., 411, 414.
Pondrom, Chicago & Alton R. R. Co. v., 490.
Portwardens, Steamship Co. v., 414.
Pratt, In re, 290.
Prescott, Kansas Pacific R. R. Co. v., 349.
Prickett, Sawyer v. 223.
Priestly v. Fowler, 112.
Prior, Roswell v., 307.
Provost v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., 502, 509.
Pueblo Co., Denver and R. G. R. R. v., 218.
Pugsley, Sterick v., 106.
Putnam Co. v. Nugent, 136, 153.

Queen v. Francis, 481.
Quesenberry v. State 172.

Rahilly v. Wilson Assignee (with note), 80, 84.
Ramsay v. Holger, Collector, 321.
Ramsay v. Quinn, 478.
Rasch, Taylor v. 555.
Ray, Slack v., 454.
Redhead v. Midland Etc., R. R., 463.
Redfield & Co., Steadman v., 569.
Reed, State v., 262, 87.
Reeders, Crane v., 132.
Rees v. Watertown, 124, 159, 161.
Reid, State v., 184, 219.
Reiman & Friedlander, In re, 590.
Rex v. Inhabitants of Birmingham, 236.
Reynolds, Carroll Co. v., 226.
Richards, French v., 308.
Riches, Coleman v., 399.
Ritter v. Ritter, 100.
Robinson, Ex parte, 280.
Rogers, In re, 470.
Rose, Chapman v. 235, 242.
Rosenfields, In re, 583.
Roswell v. Prior, 307.
Rubey v. Rubey, 100.
Rutherford, Carew v., 232.
Ryppon v. Bowles, 308.

Saint Joseph City v. Kansas City Saint Jo. Etc., R. R. Co., 184.
Saint Paul & Sioux City R. R., Chamberlin v., 51, 53.
Saint Paul & Chicago, R. R. Co., Jacobus v., 375.
Saint Louis, Market v., 211.
Saint Louis, Kansas City & Northern R. R. Co., Morris v., 591.
Saint Louis R. R. Co. v. Northwestern St. Louis R. R. Co., 521.
Sanders. Exparte, 514.
Saunders v. Bartlett, Gould & Heath, 84.
Saunders, Ogden v., 114.
Saunders v. State, 464.
Sawyer v. Hoag, Assignee, 43.
Sawyer v. Prickett, 223.
Scammon, In re, 328, 564.
Schlesinger, Adams Exp. Co. v., 360.
Schulenberg v. Harriman, 411.
Schuyler Co., Thomas v., 216.
Scotland Co., Thomas, v., 216
Scruggs, Viser v., 313.
Scull, In re, 399, 564.
Searle v. Laverick, 302.
Second Nat. Bank Chicago, Main, Assignee, v., 232.
Seeley, Myers v., 451.
Sharp, Planters' Bank v., 174.
Siddle, Chandler v., 341.
Silvus v. The State, 148.
Simmon, In re, 440, 565.
Simmons, Castellar v., 236.
Simmons, Commercial Bank v., 371.
Simpson v. State, 274.
Sioux City & Pacific R. R. Co., Stout v., 76, 202.
Slack, Adm'r. v. Ray, Collector, 454.
Smith & Guion v. Tuggle, 67.
Smith & Hall v. Clark Co. (with note), 4, 5.
Smith v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. (with note), 76, 171.
Sneesby v. Lancashire & Yorkshire R. R. Co., 297.
Spaulding v. Andover, 197.
Spencer v. Klinger, 4.
Sprayberry, Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co. v., 541.
Stanley v. State, 626.
Starr v. Stark, 446.
State, ex rel., Aull v. Macon Co., 225, 226, 229.
Steadman v. Redfield & Co., 569.
Steamship Co. v. Portwardens, 414.
Steele v. Steele, 608.
Stern Bros. v. Clinton, Auditor, 160, 164.
Stephenson v. Osborne, 174.
Sterrick v. Pugsley, 106.
Stevenson v. Williams, 300.
Stout v. Sioux City & Pacific R. R. Co., 76, 202.
Stowe, Harriman v., 400.
Strasburger. Lehman Bros. v., 50.
Stuart v. State, 579.
Stuyvesant Bank, In re, 83.
Sullivan v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 590, 595, 614, 622.
Supervisors, Olcott v., 63.
Sutherland v. Lake Sup. Ship Canal Co., 127.
Sweet v. Barney, 446.
Swift v. Jewsbury, 160.

Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co., 171.
Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank of Chicago, 239.
Tappan v. First Nat. Bank of Chicago, 183.
Taylor, Assignee, v. Rasch, 555.
Taylor v. Steamer Commonwealth, 502.
Thayer v. Montgomery (with note), 365.
Thirkell, Fisher, v., 308.
Thomas, In re, 347, 362, 371.
Thomas v. Schuyler Co., 216.
Thomas v. Scotland Co., 216.
Thompson v. Whitman (with note), 308.
Tiffany v. Boatman's Savings Institution, 99, 104.
Tilton v. Oregon Central Military Road Co., 267.
Toombs, Hornbuckle v., 324.
Townsend, Assignee, v. Leonard, 69.
Trask v. Iron Mt. R. R. Co., 171, 175.
Tribblecock, Waite v., 570.
Tuggle, Smith & Guion v., 67.
Turnbull, First National Bank v., 27.

Udderzook case, 50, 347, 352.
United Society of Shakers v. Underwood, 250.
United States v. Boutwell (with note), 231.
Underwood. Davenport v., 250.
Union Pacific R. R. Co., Fort v., 39.
Union Pacific R. R. Co., Sullivan v., 590, 595, 614, 622.
Union Pacific R. R. Co., United States v.,566.
Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Durant, 581.
Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Fort, 112 (with note), 118.
Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Lincoln Co., 3 (with note), 106.
Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. McShane, 347.
Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Merrick Co., 359.
Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Peniston, 51, 58.
United States, Dollar Savings Bank, v., 261.
United States v. Ebert, 205.
United States ex rel. Hall & Morse v. Directors U. P. R. Co., 288.
United States v. Lange, 147.
United States v. Leavenworth, Lawrence & Galveston R. R., 423, 425.
United States v. Louisville & Portland Canal Co. (with note), 99, 101.
United States v. Missouri, Kansas & Texas R. R., 428.
United States v. O'Brian (with note), 11.
United States v. Owens, 99.
United States v. Steamship City of Mexico, 191.
United States v. Tract of Land in Mouterey Co., 124.
United States v. Messman, 121, 159.
United States ex rel. Hall v. U. P. R. R. Co., 566.
United States Express Co. Oppenheimer v., 107.
University R. R. Co. v. Holden, 112.
Upton, Assignee, v. Englehart, 335.

Vanderhoff Bros. v. City Bank of St. Paul, 15.
Vaughn v. Nashville & Chattanooga R. R. Co., 568.
Vernon Co., Huidekoper v., 223.
Viser v. Scruggs, 313.
Virginius, case of the, 303.
Vogler v. Montgomery, 65.
Voorhees v. McCartney, 562.

Wade v. Kalbfleisch, 99.
Waggoner v. Cheek. 186.
Waite v. Triblecock, 570
Wald & Aehle, In re, 531.
Wall, Ex parte (with note), 592.
Ward v. Flood, 199.
Warren v. Ives, 312.
Warren Savings Bank v. Palmer, 565.
Washington University v. Finch, 35, 66.
Waterloo, Hubbell v., 124.
Watertown, Rees v., 124, 159, 161.
Wells v. Bain, 3.
West v. Aurora City, 27.
Western Union Tel. Co. v. Eyser, 87.
Whaley v. Bank of Charleston, 211.
Wheeler v. Whytock, 238.
White, McGinnity v , 241.
Whitman, Thompson v., 308.
Whitson, People v., 552.
Williams, Stevenson v., 300.
Williams v. Byrne, 27.
Williams v. Williams, 479.
Wilson, N. American Life Ins. Co. v., 290.
Wilson, Rahilly v., 80, 84.
Wilson, Assignee, v. City Bank of St. Paul, 40, 135.
Winsor, Oregon Steam Navigation Co. v., 350.
Winter & Steele, Graves v. 178.
Wiswell, Norton v., 571.
Wolf v. Connecticut Mutual L. Ins. Co., 301.
Woodhouse v. O'Donohoe, 462.
Woodland. Bark, Fichtenburg v., 60.
Woods v. Hare, 3.
Woodson & Ewing v. Murdock 619, 628.
Woolsey, Dodge v., 412.
Wright, Keuchler v., 627.
Wyethe, Barnes v., 236.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JANUARY 1, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION:
$8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

WE present to the legal profession and the public, the first number of the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL. We have not undertaken this enterprise without due consideration of the nature of the task before us, nor without making extensive enquiry, by correspondence and otherwise, to ascertain the needs and expectations of the profession in regard to such a publication. We have chosen to make it a weekly in preference to a monthly or quarterly, not because this form promises more profit in proportion to the labor and money expended upon it, but because a paper published weekly, will afford, as we conceive, the highest degree of usefulness.

It concerns the bench and bar to know, at the earliest possible period, the rulings which are being made in courts of eminent character and of last resort. This information we shall endeavor, as far as practicable, to supply. Opinions which possess a general interest or peculiar local value, will be published in full, with carefully prepared head-notes, and such other annotations as may seem appropriate. Other decisions will be presented in the shape of editorial notes of greater or less length, according to the supposed importance of the questions adjudicated. This plan, while it involves more labor, seems to us preferable to the "digest" plan adopted by most of the legal publications. It gives us more freedom of expression, enables us to add where it seems necessary, our own notes and comments, and brings us more nearly into a sort of conversational connection with our readers.

Most of the matter used in these notes, coming from courts in the Mississippi Valley, will be furnished by our own special correspondents and reporters. For such as comes from courts at a greater distance, we shall be indebted, principally, to our legal and other exchanges.

In view of the growing importance of the Federal Courts, it will be a special feature of the JOURNAL to advise its readers at the earliest practicable date, of the important questions therein adjudicated. It will give, from week to week, a summary of the proceedings had in the Supreme Court of the United States during its sessions; and special pains will be taken to keep its readers fully advised of the important questions decided in that court. It will also contain early advice of the important matters transpiring in the English courts.

In a department of "Notes and Queries" we shall answer, as well as we can, any questions of general interest propounded to us by correspondents.

Some space will also be devoted to news items of interest to lawyers; embracing such matters as the death of eminent judges and lawyers; changes in the constjtution of important courts; the doings of Congress, of constitutional conventions, and of the state legislatures, so far as they involve important legal matters; and any like items of news that may be supposed to be of interest to the profession.

We shall examamine, with what care our time will permit, and notice editorially, any important law book sent to us for that purpose. While we cannot hope to devote to any book more than a hasty examination, we shall endeavor in these notices to be candid and impartial; to avoid extravagant praise on the one hand, and unjust censure on the other. The department of "Book Notices" will not be kept open as an advertising medium; it will be under the exclusive control of the editors; the publishers will have nothing to do with it.

Judges and counsel, who furnish us with early copies of important decisions, will place us under special obligations to them. We shall be under like obligations to reporters who may favor us with advance sheets of their reports.

Correspondence on topics of current legal interest, is solicited. It will be scarcely necessary to advise correspondents to be brief. In a busy profession, like that of the law, few persons can afford the time or find the patience to peruse long articles; nor can a weekly journal, dealing with a great variety of topics, afford the space to print them.

Hoping to be able to improve upon each number of the JOURNAL, until it approximates somewhat to our conception of what such a legal serial should be, we commit this first number to the criticism of the legal profession, and, we trust, to their support.

The Bankrupt Act—Shall it be Repealed?

In a commercial, manufacturing and trading country, a bankrupt system so framed as to be adapted to the circumstances of the people, is beneficial alike to the debtor and the creditor. Such a system is particularly desirable in a country of vast extent. Divided, as the United States is, into forty states, each of which, in the absence of a bankrupt enactment, makes the laws which regulate the relation and rights of debtors and creditors within its limits—if credit is to be extended and commercial intercourse freely maintained between the people of the different states and sections, a bankrupt system, wisely conceived, becomes almost a necessity.

Without a bankrupt law, each state has its separate collection and attachment laws, under which the creditor who first moves, secures a preference over the rest; and the local or the favorite creditor fares well at the expense of all the others. A bankrupt law, also, affords the only means by which debtors who have failed in business, can be relieved from the load of hopeless insolvency.

We doubt whether the present bankrupt law is worse than the system which it superseded. Doubtless, it has many faults and defects. Most of these, however, are not intrinsic, but remediable by well-considered legislation. Undoubtedly, that portion of the involuntary feature of the present law, which makes it an act of bankruptcy merely to suspend payment, or fail to meet one's commercial paper for fourteen days, is, under the existing state of the finances of the country, harsh and oppressive, and it ought to be immediately repealed, or essentially modified. There is no such feature in the English bankrupt laws. By the English acts, "the suspension of payment by a banker, merchant, or trader, of his commercial paper and liabilities, is resolved into an act of bankruptcy by summoning him before the court of bankruptcy, and if the debt or demand be not paid or arranged to the satisfaction of the creditor within a prescribed time, the non-arrangement or non-payment, within such prescribed period, constitutes an act of bankruptcy." (James, Bankrupt Law, 261; In re Clemens 2 Dillon C. C., 536.) This provision is much preferable to the similar one in our act, and even this might be too stringent at the present time.

Digitized by Google

In a gust of seeming popular feeling, the house of representatives recently passed a bill for the absolute repeal of the bankrupt act. The senate seems wisely to insist upon time for consideration. In a matter of so much consequence, it would appear to be the part of true wisdom, to repeal at once only those portions of the law which are not adapted to existing circumstances, and which work harshly, and then, following the course which is so often adopted in Great Britain in respect to important legislation, appoint a commission to investigate the defects and imperfections of the present act, and report such changes as experience has demonstrated to be necessary for the successful working of the system. Such a commission, composed, in part, of members of congress and of one or more of the federal judges, and an attorney of large experience in bankruptcy proceedings, would doubtless be able to suggest such amendments to the existing law, as to make its workings satisfactory to the country at large.

The Late Mr. Justice Nelson.

The death of this distinguished jurist, which occurred on the 13th of December last, at his home in Cooperstown, N. Y., makes it fitting to refer to his life and character, and to draw from them the lessons they are so well calculated to teach. We have long regarded him, in his personal and judicial character, as the highest type of an American judge. His whole life was given to his profession. Born in 1792, he was admitted to the bar in 1817, and continued in the practice until 1823, when he was appointed one of the circuit judges of the state. In 1821, however, he was a member of the constitutional convention of New York, and it is said that it was in this body that his great legal abilities first became generally known, and that this led to his selection and appointment to the bench two years afterwards. He went upon the circuit bench in 1823, and remained there until 1831, when he was transferred to the supreme bench of the state, in the place of Judge MARCY, elected to the senate, and he continued to be an associate justice of that court until 1837, when he was commissioned to be its chief justice, and he remained such until 1845, when he was appointed by President Tyler, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and remained such until his voluntary retirement from the bench in November, 1872.

Lacking but a few months, therefore, he was a judge, without interruption, for fifty successive years. He was, in fact, judicially employed for more than fifty years; for, after his retirement, he investigated a most complicated cause, and prepared an elaborate and masterly opinion in it, which was completed only a short time before his death.

Judge NELSON'S personal appearance was impressive. No one who ever saw his erect bearing, his massive frame, his large head, with its flowing white hair, the clean cut features of his handsome but strong face, could forget his striking presence.

But his character as a judge is that which endears his memory, and will perpetuate his fame. His integrity—that commonest, but indispensable quality in a judge—no man ever questioned. The simplicity of his nature was never corrupted, nor its strength enervated by the luxurious and extravagant tastes and habits which, unhappily, have become too prevalent in these latter days. To the end, he preferred the quiet of his rural home, beside the waters of the beautiful lake on which he lived, to a residence in the great metropolitan city, within his circuit, or in the feverish atmosphere of the capital.

His love of justice was intrinsic, predominant and supreme. He had been favored by nature, in an extraordinary degree, with what may be called the judicial temperament.

His patience was invincible; his equanimity of temper never deserted him; and he was incapable of becoming a partisan in the trial or hearing of a cause, or of receiving an undue bias, or of yielding to hasty and crude views.

We have good authority for the statement, that in the heat and ardor which sometimes attend the discussions of the conference room, one member was never known to lose his evenness of temper, and that was the illustrious deceased.

His judgment was almost unerring, and was noted for its breadth and soundness. His learning was varied and extensive, and he brought to the discharge of his duties in the federal courts, the great experience of his long service upon the nisi prius and appellate bench of the state.

The opinions of no judge in the country were more deferentially submitted to than his; and he seemed equally conversant with the peculiar and difficult questions of federal jurisprudence, which arise under the constitution and statutes of the United States, and with questions of commercial, international and admiralty law. His knowledge of the law relating to patents for inventions, and his skill and judgment in the decision of questions of novelty and infringement have, perhaps, never been surpassed.

An admirable judicial quality of Judge NELSON'S was his utter want of pride of individual opinion. He seemed to care nothing for views which he had expressed when upon the supreme bench of the state or upon the circuit. If satisfied, after more reflection and further argument, that he was mistaken, he would be the first to insist on setting the law right, and correcting his own errors. The judgment of the future will confirm the verdict of the present, that the deceased waa great judge; not great in the sense of originating legal reforms, or in the field of original investigation, but great in the power to decide correctly, according to the principles which the courts and legislature have established for the settlement of judicial controversies. The judicial annals of America are bright with the names of MARSHALL, STORY, TANEY, KENT, GIBSON and SHAW. To these is now to be added the name of NELSON, the mild lustre of which will remain undimmed as long as the constitution endures, and the law is reverenced.

Digitized by Google

Power of Constitutional Conventions—New Constitution of Pennsylvania.

The extent of the power of a convention "to revise and amend the constitution" of a state, or rather the right of the legislature in the enactment authorizing the calling of such a convention to limit the powers of the convention, and to prescribe its mode of action, has been recently considered by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in a case which has attracted great attention throughout the country.

On July 2, 1871, pursuant to provisions in the existing constitution, the legislature passed "an act to authorize a popular vote on the question of calling a convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania;" and the proposition having been carried, the legislature, on the 11th day of April, 1872, passed "an act for calling a convention to amend the constitution." Among other things, this act contained a provision (Sec. 6) "that the election to decide for or against the adoption of the new constitution, or specific amendments, shall be conducted as the general elections of this commonwealt hare now by law conducted."

The convention, before adjourning, passed "an ordinance" regulating the time and manner of holding the election for voting on the proposed constitution, which ordinance was opposed in its provisions, to the general election laws of the state.

A bill was filed to enjoin the commissioners appointed by the ordinance from acting under the ordinance, and from appointing election officers, or making a registration of voters, or directing or controlling the election; and in the case of Wells v. Bain and Fitler et al (Phila. Legal Gazette, Vol. 5, p. 400, Dec. 12, 1873) the supreme court sustained the bill and awarded the injunction. The opinion of the court appears to have been unanimous, and was delivered by Chief Justice AGNEW, on the 5th day of December, 1873.

Grave doubts, however, attend the doctrine of the supreme court, that it is competent for the legislature in the absence of constitutional provision, or a vote of the people upon the point, to limit in this manner the mode of action of a constitutional convention, lawfully assembled. The view of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, however, is very strongly argued by the chief justice, and the substance of his argument appears in the syllabus of the case, which, as found in the Legal Gazette, supra, is as follows:

The constitutional convention of Pennsylvania, before adjourning, passed an "ordinance," regulating the time and manner of holding the election for voting upon the proposed new constitution prepared by them. The ordinance provided, inter alia, for the appointment of election commissioners for the city of Philadelphia, who were to conduct the election in that place, in accordance with the regulations laid down for their guidance in the ordinance. These regulations being contrary to the general election laws of the commonwealth, as applicable to Philadelphia, an injunction was sought or to restrain the commissioners, and the officers appointed by them, from conducting the election, and to restrain the city officials from furnishing blanks, etc., to the commissioners, or otherwise expending the city moneys for the expenses of said commissioners. The supreme court at Nisi Prius granted the injunction, holding as follows:

1. The constitutional convention was the offspring of law, which law was the only form in which the legislature, the body invested with the powers of government, could act, and thereby its (the legislature's), own consent be given and revolution avoided.

2. The law being the instrument of delegation, the act of assembly, or warrant to the delegates from the people (i. e., the members of the convention) was the only chart of their powers.

3. The delegates possess no inherent power, and when convened by law at the time and place fixed in it, sit and act under it, as their letter of attorney from the people themselves.

4. The act of assembly of April 11th, 1872, which provided "for calling a convention to amend the constitution," gave the convention no power to frame the ordinance in question, which is, therefore, illegal and void.

5. The court has jurisdiction to restrain invasions of right, without authority under the exising laws, and therefore has jurisdiction of this case.

We may observe, that in the case of Woods v. Hare, 5 Phil. Legal Gazette, 397, the court of common pleas of Allegheny county, held the following propositions:

"1. The act of assembly of 1871, providing for a vote of the people upon the question of calling a constitutional convention, and the act of 1872, which provided for calling it, were both constitutional and valid.

2. There is underlying our whole system of government, a principle of acknowledged right, in the people, to change their constitutions, except where specially prohibited in a constitution itself, in all cases and at all times, whether there is a way provided in their constitution or not.

3. A convention to amend the constitution without the power passed upon by the people, in determining the question of amendments, has inherently, by the very nature of the case, under the great principle, quasi-revolutionary in its character, above mentioned, absolute power, so far as may be necessary, to carry out the purpose for which they were called into existence by the popular will.

4. Unless prohibited or restricted in the manner specified by the people, the convention has a right, untrammeled by mere legislative limitations, to propose to the people for their consideration and adoption, any plan they may see fit."

But this last named court did not pass upon the question of the right of the convention to provide a mode of submission to the voters, differing from, and in substance, repealing the act of the legislature under which the convention was called together.

The general subject is exhaustively discussed by Judge JAMESON in his valuable work on Constitutional Conventions, and his views favor the judgment of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. But the doctrine that a convention lawfully assembled, to amend a constitution, can be trammeled and restricted as to the mode in which it shall submit its work to the people, by an ordinary act of legislation, is by no means clear to our mind, and seems to be open to grave objections, and might be used to perpetuate abuses, or deprive the people of powers and rights which justly belong to them.

Taxation of the Union Pacific Railroad by the States.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company is a corporation chartered by congress, and was aided by the general government by bonds and lands, and subjected to military and postal duties. The relation of this corporation to the public, and to the state of Nebraska traversed by it, is anomalous and peculiar, and has given rise to some interesting and important questions. The circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, in 1871, held that the state had the power to tax the road-bed and rolling stock of the company, for the reasons which appear in the report of the case. Union

Digitized by Google

Pacific Railroad Company v. Lincoln county, 1 Dillon C. C. R., 314.

Its judgment in this case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States a few days since, the case in that court being entitled "The Union Pacific Railroad Company v. Peniston, Treasurer of Lincoln county." The case in the Supreme Court was argued in behalf of the state by Mr. Woolworth, and for the company by Mr. Evarts. The main ground urged against the power of the state to tax was that the road was a federal instrumentality, and that the recognition of the right of the state to tax and sell the road, was inconsistent with the purpose of congress, in creating the corporation, and with the rights of the government in the road. The act of congress is silent as to taxing the road. A majority of the court decided against the implied exemption of the road from the power of the state to tax it. We have not seen the opinion of the court, which was delivered by Mr. Justice STRONG; but it proceeds, we understand, upon the ground that "the tax in question is too remote in its effects upon the efficient exercise of the federal power, to be for that reason inhibited by the constitution. To hold otherwise would be to deny to the states all power to tax persons or property; for every tax levied by a state withdraws from the reach of federal taxation, a portion of the property from which it is taken, and to that extent diminishes the subject upon which federal taxes may be laid. Admitting fully that the company is an agent of the general government, both military and postal, no constitutional implications prohibit a state tax upon the property of an agent of the government, merely because it is the property of such an agent. United States mails, troops, and munitions of war, are carried upon almost every railroad. Telegraph lines are employed in the national service; so are steamboats, horses, stage coaches, wagons, foundries, ship yards, and multitudes of manufacturing establishments. These are the property of natural persons or corporations who are instruments or agents of the general government. Were they exempt, as here claimed, it is manifest that the state government would be paralyzed. The decree below is affirmed."

Mr. Justice BRADLEY, dissenting, says, that if the road-bed may be taxed, it may be seized and sold for non-payment of taxes, separated by county or state lines, and thus the whole purpose of congress, in creating the corporation and establishing the line, may be subverted. In his judgment the tax was unconstitutional. Mr. Justice FIELD concurred with Mr. Justice BRADLEY. Mr. Justice HUNT dissented from the opinion of the court, but wrote no opinion.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE wrote an opinion, concurring in the result reached by the majority of the court.

Railway Aid Bonds.

We publish elsewhere the elaborate opinion of NAPTON, J., in the case of Smith & Hall v. Clark county, as well as the two brief opinions delivered in overruling the petition for a re-hearing. The great importance of this case, not only to the state of Missouri, but to the profession, and to the holders of municipal bonds throughout the country, justifies us, notwithstanding its length, in publishing it in full, and in accompanying it with a note intended to show the views of the supreme court of Missouri, from the beginning to the present time, upon the nature of such securities, and the defences which may be made thereto, when in the hands of innocent holders for value. In many respects, the law applicable to city and county bonds issued under authority from the legislature, has, so far as respects the federal tribunals, been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. But under the constitutional provision, and the legislation of Missouri, some cases have arisen novel in their facts, if not in the principles upon which they must be decided; and the decisions which have recently been made upon these securities by the federal courts in Missouri, we shall publish from time to time, as opportunity and space will permit, commencing next week.

As to the nature of the power to issue such securities, and the defences which may be made to them, there exist some differences of opinion between the Supreme Court of the United States and some of the state tribunals. This difference will be illustrated by the very recent decision of the supreme court of Kansas, in the case of Lewis v. Bourbon county, which will appear in our next number.

Constitutionality of Acts Passed Under a Former Constitution.

In Spencer v. Klinger, determined at St. Louis, November 24, 1873, the supreme court of Missouri put to rest a very important question in a few words. The action was ejectment. The plaintiff had, in 1864, conveyed the land to the defendant, and now brought suit to recover it, on the ground that she was a minor at the time the conveyance was made, and that the conveyance was hence void. The defendant was in her eighteenth year when the conveyance was made, but had previously procured a special act of the legislature, declaring her of lawful age, and legally competent to transact her own business. It was now insisted that the act was unconstitutional and void, and that the deed made in pursuance of it, therefore passed no title.

WAGNER, J., said: "Whatever might be our opinion in regard to the policy or even validity of such acts under different circumstances, we are constrained at the present day to hold them good. An examination of the session acts will show, that from an early period in our state's history, acts of this description were passed at almost every session, that their legality was never challenged, and that they were constantly acted upon.

It would be entirely safe to say that millions of dollars have been invested upon the strength of these titles, and for the court, at this day, to declare the acts and titles made in pursuance of them void, would be a hazardous undertaking, and would unsettle property rights to an alarming extent.

"We must therefore decline to go into the question, or consider it open to discussion. The constitution of 1865, very wisely prohibits, in express terms, the special enactment of such laws; and the abuses which were practiced under the former constitution in this respect cannot again occur. But past titles which were made and received when the acts giving them validity were universally acquiesced in, cannot be disturbed. The court below decided for the defendant, and its judgment must be affirmed."

The other judges concurred.

JUDGE HALE of New York, now a member of the National House of Representatives, has been tendered by Governor Dix, the position of judge of the court of appeals in that state, and it is understood he will resign his seat and accept.

Digitized by Google

Validity of County Bonds Issued to Railroad Companies.

SMITH & HALL v. CLARK COUNTY.

Supreme Court of Missouri, Saint Louis, October Term, 1873.

WASH ADAMS,
DAVID WAGNER,
W. B. NAPTON,
H. M. VORHIES,
A. T. SHERWOOD. } Judges.

1. Jurisdiction—Pecuniary Limit.—Although the Circuit Court of Missouri is limited in its jurisdiction in actions upon contracts, to amounts not less than one hundred dollars, yet it may entertain an action upon a number of coupons for thirty-five dollars each, detached from the same series of bonds, if such coupons amount in the aggregate to one hundred dollars or more. [The same principle in the Federal Court. Judson v. Macon County, 2 Dillon, C. C. 213.]

2. Coupons—Negotiability—Coupons, although not payable to any particular person, are, nevertheless, negotiable. [Acc. McCoy v. Washington County, 3 Wall., Jr. 381.]

3. Construction of Railroad Charter—Privilege.—The charter of the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, provided that the company should be entitled to all the privileges, rights and immunities which had been previously granted to the North Missouri Railroad Company. The charter of the latter company provided that the county courts of any county through which any part of the road passed, might subscribe to the capital stock of said company. Held, that the effect of this provision in the charter of the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, was to re-enact, as to that company, the provision above stated of the charter of the North Missouri Railroad Company, so as to authorize the county court of a county in which the former road was situated, to subscribe to its stock. The power thus conferred on the county courts to subscribe to the capital stock of a railroad company, may well be termed a "privilege" granted to the company.

4. Repeal of Special Provision in Charter by General Law.—A provision in the charter of a railroad company, authorizing the county courts of the counties through which the road passes to subscribe to its capital stock, without requiring a vote of the people of the county, is not repealed by a general law subsequently passed, prohibiting such subscriptions without an affirmative vote of the people of the county, when such subscription is proposed. [Acc. State ex rel. Mo. and Miss. R. R. Co. v. Macon County Court, 41 Mo., 453.]

5. Recitals in Bonds—Estoppel.—If the power existed in a county court to issue certain bonds, a false recital of such power on the bonds themselves, will not vitiate them in the hands of an innocent holder; although it might create an estoppel against the county or its agent. Thus, where certain county bonds purported to be issued under the general law of 1855, the holder was not estopped from showing that they were, in fact, issued under a special act chartering a railroad company, passed in 1857. [Per NAPTON, J., arguendo. See opinion on motion for rehearing.]

6. Agent of Municipal Corporation—Derivation of Power.—The doctrine recognized, that the agent of a municipal corporation, derives his power to subscribe for stock in a railroad company, or to issue bonds of the corporation, not from the people of the municipality, but from the legislature. The law gives the power, but restricts its exercise, by requiring a vote of the people. [Per NAPTON, J., arguendo. See opinion on motion for re-hearing.]

7. The Same—Ultra Vires.—If there has actually been a grant of power to an agent to execute a negotiable instrument, the instrument is valid in the hands of an innocent holder, and the principal is bound, although the agent may have exceeded his instructions in executing the power, or may have executed it in a different manner from that prescribed. [Per NAPTON, J., arguendo. See opinion on motion for re-hearing.]

8. The Rule Applied to Municipal Bonds.—In accordance with this principle, a bona fide holder for value of a bond of a municipal corporation issued under an act of the legislature of a State, has a right to presume that all precedent requirements of the act conferring the power have been complied with If, therefore, the act under which such a bond purports, on its face, to have been issued, or its amendments, required an election by the people of the municipality, and an affirmative vote, before such bond should be issued, it is no defence to a suit on such bond by a bona fide holder for value, that no such election was, in fact, held. [Per NAPTON, J., arguendo. See opinion on motion for re-hearing.]

ON MOTION FOR RE-HEARING:

9. Provision in Railroad Charter—Vested Rights.—The court does not mean to intimate that the provision of a railroad charter, allowing the county courts of counties through which the road passes, to subscribe to its capital stock, and issue the bonds of the county in payment of the same, is a franchise which it was not competent for the legislature to repeal, either before or since the adoption of the new constitution.

10. Action of County Court—Estoppel.—A majority of the court hold that the recitals in the bonds issued by the county court to the railroad company in this case, are not conclusive, and do not amount to an estoppel against the county, notwithstanding the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States to the contrary; and that it was not necessary to the determination of this case, so to hold.

11. Opinions of Supreme Court—Arguments—Illustrations.—In delivering opinions, the judge who delivers them is allowed to make his own arguments and illustrations, without compromitting the other judges; and in concurring in the result, the other judges do not necessarily sanction the illustrations used by the judge who delivers the opinion.

12. Bonds Issued to Defunct Corporation—Collateral Proceeding.—It is no objection to the validity of bonds issued by a county court to a railroad company, that the charter of the company had expired before the company was organized, if the corporation existed as a matter of fact, and was in the exercise of its chartered franchises, at the time the subscription was made and the bonds issued. In such a case, whether or not the corporation had a legal existence before the subscription was made, cannot be tested in this collateral way. Such a question can only be raised in a direct proceeding by quo warranto, on the part of the State.

Barrow & Higbee, Dryden & Dryden, and R. E. P. Anderson, for plaintiff in error; Spangler, Givens & Day, for defendants in error.

NAPTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in August, 1867, on seven coupons, detached from bonds, dated January 1, 1865, due in twenty years and payable to the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company or bearer. The bonds are in these words:

"$500. United States of America. No. 51. Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, county of Clark, state of Missouri, bond due in twenty years from date. Know all men by these presents, that there is due from the county of Clark to the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company or bearer, five hundred dollars, lawful money of the United States, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable annually on the first day of each year, at the treasury of the said county of Clark, on the presentation and surrender of the annexed coupons; the principal to be due and payable twenty years after date hereof; for the performance of all of which, the faith of said county of Clark is irrevocably pledged, as also the property, revenue and resources of said county of Clark. This bond being issued and pursuant to orders of the county court of Clark county, as authorized by an act of legislature of the state of Missouri, entitled, "An act to authorize the formation of railroad associations and regulate the same," approved Dec. 13, 1855. In testimony whereof, the said county of Clark has executed this bond by the presiding justice of the county court of Clark county, under the order of said court, signing his name hereto, and by the clerk of said county, under the order thereof, attesting the same and affixing the seal of said court. This done in the town of Waterloo, county of Clark aforesaid, this, the first day of Jannary, 1865. HARVEY SEYMOUR, Attest: Presiding justice of county court of Clark county.
G. M. OCHILTREE, clerk of the county court of Clark county."

Coupons are as follows:

"State of Missouri. Bond No. 51. $35. The county of Clark will pay thirty-five dollars on this coupon on the first day of January, 1867, at the treasury of said county. G. M. OCHILTREE, Clerk of the Clark county court."

The petition states that the coupons due in 1866 were paid, but that the coupons sued on, due in January, 1867, were not paid, although duly presented. There were separate counts on the seven coupons sued on.

The answer denies that said bonds were issued in conformity to the law of Dec. 13, 1855; asserts that no vote of the qualified voters of the county authorized the issue of the bonds for $50,000.

After a trial and a multiplicity of pleadings and a change of venue, the case was finally determined in the circuit court upon an agreed state of facts, which were substantially these:

1. That the A. & B. R.R. Co. was incorporated by the act of February 9, 1857, and subsequently, to-wit, on the 17th of September, 1864, duly and legally organized.

2. It is admitted that sections 8, 9, 10, 11, 14 and 19 of the act incorporating the N. M. R. R. Co. (approved March 13, 1851,) were on the 17th of September, 1864, specially adopted by said A. & B. R. R. Co.

3. That after the organization of said company, to-wit: on the ——— day of ——— 1864, the following entry was made on the books of said company:

"We, the undersigned judges of ——— to subscribe

Digitized by Google

$200,000 to the A. & B. R. R. Co., payable in county bonds, due in twenty years, at seven per cent. per annun, for said county of Clark, state of Missouri.

"Harvey Seymour, B. P. Hannan, Jacob Tinsman. Number of shares, 20,000; amount, $200,000."

That said H. Seymour and B. P. Hannan, signed the same at Luray in said county, and Tinsman at his residence during the vacation of the county court.

4. That afterwards, to-wit: on the ——— day of ——— by an order of said county court, duly entered of record, the question as to whether said county should subscribe 200,000 dollars to the capital stock of the A. & B. R. R. Co., was submitted to the resident qualified voters of said county, to be voted upon at the general election for state and county officers, held on the first Tuesday of November, 1864, at which said election a majority of the resident voters of said county voted not to subscribe said sum; that afterwards, to-wit: on the 6th day of June, 1865, the said county court, by its order duly entered of record, having ordered the same, a special election was held for the purpose of voting upon the question submitted to the resident voters of said county, as to whether said county would subscribe 100,000 dollars to the capital stock of said company, at which election a majority of the resident voters of said county voted not to subscribe said sum.

5. That afterwards, to-wit: on the 10th day of June, 1865, and at the dates subsequently, as the same appear in the transcript from the records of said county court hereto attached, marked "A" and made a part hereof, the said county court made the order, as in said transcript set forth, that on the said 10th day of June, and in pursuance of said order of that date, the county court issued and delivered to the A. &. B. R. R. Co. one hundred $500 negotiable bonds, with twenty interest coupons thereto attached to each of said bonds, of which exhibit "B" herewith filed, is admitted to be a copy, each coupon for the sum of $35, said bonds payable to said company or bearer, of which the bonds and coupons described in plaintiffs' petition and the coupons sued on, were a part; that said bonds were dated January 1, 1865; that afterwards, J. H. Crane, the duly authorized agent of said railroad company, before the maturity of said bonds and coupons sued on, for a valuable consideration, sold, transferred and delivered the said bonds and coupons to plaintiffs, who were then partners doing business under the firm name and style of Smith & Hall, who received said bonds and coupons in good faith, without actual notice of any defects in their issue, and that upon the representations of said Crane, that said bonds and coupons were issued to said company in payment of subscription of said county of Clark to the capital stock of said company; that the bonds and coupons now belong to plaintiffs, and are due and upaid.

6. It is admitted that, in pursuance of the order of the county court, authorizing him so to do, as the same appears in the exhibit hereto attached, marked "A," G. M. Ochiltree was present at an election held by said railroad company for the election of officers, on the first Monday of May, 1866, and as the agent of said county cast the vote of said county, in which he represented and cast 500 votes for and on behalf of said county, which said votes represented $50,000 stock of said company.

7. It is admitted that the first annual and a large proportion of the second annual instalment of coupons on the bonds described in plaintiffs' petition, were paid by the said county, on the presentation of said coupons at the county treasury; that the coupons sued on were presented to the county treasury on the 29th March, 1867, and payment demanded, and payment was refused, as will be shown by reference to endorsements on the back of said coupons. The coupons sued upon were made part of this statement.

Signed by Hagerman, attorney for plaintiffs, and Lipscomb & Anderson for defendants.

The order of the county court, referred to in the foregoing agreement, is as follows: "Whereas, heretofore, on the —— day of ——, 1864, the county court of Clark county, entered into a certain obligation to and with the A. & B. R. R. Co., by signing the books of said company, and subscribing $200,000 to said company's stock, by which obligation the county became liable to a prosecution for the said sum of $200,000; therefore, it is ordered by the court, that the county of Clark issue the sum of $50,000 in seven per cent. bonds, payable twenty years from date, interest payable annually, which is to be received by said A. & B. R. R. Co., in full satisfaction for the adjustment of said former liability, and that said bonds be placed in the hands of the county treasurer, to be by him paid out to said A. & B. R. R. Co., as other subscriptions are by the rules of said court required to be paid."

Section 14 of the North Missouri railroad charter, which is incorporated in that of the A. & B. R. R. Co., as authorized by section 10 of its charter, reads as follows:

"14. It shall be lawful for the county court of any county in which any part of the route of said railroad may be, to subscribe to the stock of said company, &c."

Section 10 o the A. & B. R. R. charter (Feb. 9, 1857), is as follows:

"Said company shall in all things be subject to the same restrictions, and entitled to all the privileges, rights and immunities which were granted to the North Missouri Railroad company, by an act entitled 'an act to incorporate the North Missouri Railroad company,' approved March 3, 1851, so far as the same are applicable to the company hereby created, as fully and completely as if the same were herein enacted."

Various declarations of law were asked, but the plaintiff had a judgment on the facts agreed.

I. A question is raised here whether the court had jurisdiction, on the ground that each count declared on a coupon for $35, which is a sum below the jurisdiction of the circuit court, but the aggregate of the coupons sued on, is admitted to be within that Jurisdiction. In the United States courts where the amount of $500 is essential to confer jurisdiction, the aggregate of the coupons sued on, has been always, impliedly or expressly assumed as determining the question of jurisdiction. The point was expressly decided by Judge DILLON at the spring term of the circuit Court in Jefferson City. We know of no decisions in our courts to the contrary.

II. Another point made in the case, is that the coupons in the case, not being made payable to any particular person, are not negotiable. That point is decided in McCoy v. Washington county, 3 Wallace, Jr., 381.

III. It is apparent from the agreed statement in the case, that the main and important question in it is, whether the court had the authority to issue the bonds in question under the act of 1857, which was the charter of the company, or whether the recitals in the bonds that they were issued under the General Statutes of 1855 were obligatory, and therefore, that the failure to call an election the recited act requires, vitiates the bonds.

The ground on which the circuit court decided the case, was that the charter of the company authorized a subscription without a vote; and we will examine that point first.

The charter of the A. & B. R. R. Co. was passed in 1857. It was enacted that the company should be entitled to all the privileges, rights and immunities which were granted to the N. M. R. R. Co., as fully and completely as if the same were re-enacted in the charter.

The charter of the N. M. R. R. Co. contained a provision that the county courts of any county in which any part of the road passed, might subscribe stock.

It is objected that the right of subscription granted to the counties on the line of the N. M. R. R., is not a privilege or immunity of the railroad company, but of the counties, and is therefore not transferred to the A. & B. R. R. Co. The section (14) conferring the power, as it appears from the agreed statement of facts, was expressly adopted by the A. & B. R. R. Co. It was undoubtedly the intention of the legislature to give to the last named company the same privileges that had been granted to the former. The county court had no power to subscribe to the stock of the railroad corportions, without a special authority from the legislature, either express or implied. The power thus conceded to the courts or other municipal bodies, may well be termed a privilege to the corporations, and we see no substantial objection to a transfer of such a privilege, by simply, in general terms, embodying the section of the original act which granted it, into the new law. That such was the intention of the legislature and of the railroad, company, is clear; and if the word "privilege" admits of the narrow construction claimed, the practical construction it has received in this State, as may be seen by reference to the decisions of our courts, would preclude any enquiry into the subject now. These provisions were the principal means by which this and other roads were built, and without them the charter would have been of no value. Hannibal & St. Joe Railroad Co. v. Marion county, 36 Mo., 295.

Digitized by Google

IV. The important question however remains: Whether this charter granted to the A & B. R. R. Co., on February 9, 1857, or rather, whether the section of it referred to, allowing subscriptions from county courts of counties along the line of the road, without a previous vote of the people, is not repealed by the subsequent acts of the legislature passed in 1860 and 1861, and before the subscription made in this case.

The law in the Revised Code of 1855, concerning railroad corporations does not require any election. The thirtieth section reads: "It shall be lawful for the county court of any county, and the city council of any city, to subscribe to the capital stock of any railroad company duly organized, under this or any other act in this State, and the county court or city council subscribing or proposing to subscribe to such capital stock, may for information cause an election to be held to ascertain the sense of the tax-payers of such county or city as to such subscription, and as to whether the same shall be paid by issue of county or city bonds, as the case may be, or by taxation."

The act of January 14, 1860, amendatory of this law, merely changes the words, "may for information," into "shall for information."

That of March 3, 1861—which was also an act amendatory to the general statute in the Revised Code of 1855—requires an election to be held, and positively prohibits a subscription, if the result of such an election shows a majority of the votes of the county against it.

It is not of any importance, therefore, to enquire, whether the act of 1855 would not, of itself, be regarded as an expression of the intention of the legislature to prohibit the county and city authorities from subscribing to railroad corporations, without ascertaining the wishes of at least a majority of the people within their respective municipalities, because the amendatory act of 1861, undoubtedly so declares; and this act, as well as that of 1860, was passed before the subscription now in question was made.

At the same time, the charter of the A. & B. R. R. Co.—and we may add, without going outside of the history of various and repeated State adjudications and State legislation, the charters of a number of other railroad companies—allowed the counties, cities and towns, to subscribe without any vote of the people. The question is, whether the provisions in the general law, on the subject of railroad corporations, repealed the specific provisions of the special acts, chartering particular companies.

In 1867, the Macon county case was decided (41 Mo., 450) and the subject was there discussed and decided. It is true that the act of 1861, though referred to by counsel, is not particularly noted in the opinion of the court, but the act of 1865, which passed before the subscription made in that case, is fully considered, as well as the prohibitory clause of the constitution of 1865. The act of 1865 is just as stringent as the act of 1861, so far as the necessity of the vote is concerned, and it was more so in regard to the number of votes essential to authorize the subscription. The subscription in that case was made in 1867, after the adoption of the new constitution, and after the passage of the act of the legislature carrying into effect the constitutional provision.

In this case, (the Macon county case), the case of Alexander v. Saint Louis, 23 Mo., 483, is particularly examined, and the opinion of the court in this last named case is reaffirmed, and the doctrine applied to the case under consideration. It was held that a general prohibition is not inconsistent with a special indulgence, and that a special indulgence is not repealed by a general prohibition, though the latter is subsequent in time to the former. In the case of Alexander v. St. Louis, the city was, by its charter, expressly prohibited from subscribing to the stock of any corporation, and a special act passed before the passage of the charter allowing it to take a certain amount of stock in the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, was held to be valid, and not affected by the general provision of the charter. In the Macon county case, the same doctrine is adopted; and the same subject—though not in regard to railroad corporations—is discussed in Deters v. Renick, 37 Mo., 597; in Vastine v. Probate Court, 38 Mo., 529; and in the City of St. Louis v. Md. Ins. Co., 47 Mo., 149; and a similar conclusion reached.

Moreover, the Macon county case was followed by the Nodaway county case, decided in 1871, [47 Mo., 346; S. C., 48 Mo., 339,] and the Sullivan county case, decided by this court at the February term, 1873, [51 Mo., 522], re-affirming the former decisions.

So that the provisions of the Rev. Code of 1855, and the amendatory acts of 1860 and 1861, and the constitutional prohibition and the legislative adoption of that prohibition, immediately after its passage, have been held by repeated adjudications, and without any conflicting opinions of the court, or any individual judge thereof, so far as the reports show, not to affect the repeal of the privilege contained in special charters.

That this was understood to be the law of the state, appears also to have been recognized by the legislative department of the government; for in 1872 the legislature passed "an act to repeal certain sections of the law, granting to county courts and other corporate bodies the power to subscribe stock to railroad corporations." This act was approved January 30, 1872, and specifically repeals certain designated sections in certain acts particularly specified and including among the twenty or thirty charters enumerated, the charter of the A. & B. R. R. Co. This was, or would have been, a mere act of supererogation if it had been understood or supposed, that previous legislation on this subject had already effected this object.

Thus it will be seen that, up to January, 1872, the decisions of the Supreme Court had been acquiesced in, and no doubt acted on, by the railroad corporations and the municipal authorities, of various counties, cities and towns; as the judicial history of the state undoubtedly shows. The necessary result was the investment of vast amounts of money in securities issued by counties, cities and towns, by virtue of the provisions in the charters of railroad corporations. After the acts of 1855, 1860, 1861, 1865, the subject was regarded as res adjudicata, and upon this view, millions of dollars have been invested.

Whatever, therefore, might be the opinion of this court, or of any individual judge, had the question come up for examination, as an open one, we are all of opinion that it is now too late to disturb the received construction.

V. But it is objected in this case, that the bonds, upon their face, purported to have been issued under the act of 1855, and that the holder is estopped from claiming that they were issued under the special act of 1857, which was the charter of the company.

Whether the recital in the bonds, would constitute an estoppel against the makers, it is not important to enquire; if it were so, it would not follow that the purchaser or holder is bound. If he can show that the power existed, a false recital of it, however obligatory upon the county or its agent, would not defeat its efficacy, in the hands of a party in nowise concerned in the perpetration of the falsehood. Crane v. Lessee of Astor, 6 Peters, 598.

Digitized by Google

Conceding, however, that the law is otherwise in regard to this recital, the question would still remain, whether a recovery on such bonds could be defeated by proof on the part of the county, that no election was held. This question was presented by instructions in the circuit court, and decided; and, although it might be passed by in the case, yet as it is an important question, and arises in other cases, now before the court, it may as well be considered here.

In the examination of this question, it is proper to enquire what determination, if any, has been reached by the Supreme Court of the United States, on this point. The decisions of that court are not obligatory on this court, in questions of that character; but it is certainly very desirable, and of great importance to such of our own citizens as may have invested in such securities, that they should not be depreciated below their value in the hands of citizens of other states, or foreigners. The federal courts, having long since determined that these securities occupy the footing of commercial paper, do not consider themselves bound by the decisions of the courts of the state where they are issued, and have, in fact, utterly disregarded them in various instances, as the numerous cases in the Supreme Court from Iowa, and some from Michigan, show. The only effect, therefore, of contradictory decisions here, if such should occur, would be to compel our citizens, who hold such bonds, to sell them, perhaps at a ruinous discount, to citizens of other states, who can sue in the federal courts.

I do not propose reviewing the numerous cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, on this subject. They run over a considerable period, commencing, perhaps, with the case of Knox county v. Aspinwall, 21 How., 539, and terminating, so far as the published decisions go, in the case of Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wallace, 355. There may be more recent cases, but I have not access to them.

In this case of Grand Chute v. Winegar, the question came up in a shape which renders the view of that court on it clear and unmistakable. The point is presented by a plea and demurrer, and is, therefore, not liable to be misunderstood, or to admit of conflicting constructions, as the general issues or abstract propositions stated in other cases, seem to have been considered. The seventh plea was, "that no special election, such as the act prescribed, had been called or held, previous to the issue of the bonds." The act, under which the bonds were issued, § 6, declared, "no bonds shall be issued by any town, in pursuance of this act, unless a majority of the votes, cast in said town, at the election hereinafter mentioned, shall be in favor of the same." Section 7, says, "a special election should be called and held in each of the towns before named, for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, within six months after the passage of this act," and then proceeds to specify particularly the mode of conducting the election. To this seventh plea, there was a demurrer, and the demurrer was sustained by the circuit court before which the case was tried, and on appeal to the Supreme Court, the judgment was affirmed.

Mr. Justice HUNT, who delivered the opinion of the court, refers to Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 Howard, 539, Mercer County v. Hackett, 1 Wallace, 83, and Meyer v. the City of Muscatine, 1 Wallace, 384, and quoting the language of Judge NELSON in the first named case, says that a bona fide holder for value of a bond issued under an act of the legislature, has a right to presume that all precedent requirements of the act conferring the power, have been complied with. He says emphatically that "the cases cited are an answer to the numerous offers to show want of compliance with the forms of law, or to show fraud in their own agents."

Now, in this case, "the form of law" not complied with, was the total absence of any election at all, which the law required; and this fact was specially pleaded, and to this plea there was a demurrer, which, of course, admitted the fact. There is, therefore, no room for misconception, as there was in some of the other cases which decided the same thing in general terms. The plea was held bad, and the want of an election held to be no defence.

The court, however, go further—I may say the court, for no dissent of any of the judges appears in the report—and quote with approbation the head-note of the reporter in the Aspinwall case, and apply it to the case then under consideration. In the Aspinwall case there had been an election, but upon an insufficient notice; but the court in the Winegar case, where there was no election at all, apply the principle or doctrine as announced by Judge NELSON, and put at the head of the case by the reporter, "that where the bonds on their face import a compliance with the law under which they issued, the purchaser is not bound to look further for evidence of a compliance with the conditions of the grant of power."

Notwithstanding some fluctuations of opinion as to the extent to which the doctrine in the Aspinwall case went, we may assert with confidence, that, with the exception of the case of Marsh v. Fulton County, all the cases since have conformed to the spirit and meaning of the Aspinwall decision. There were at first some dissenting judges who sought to establish different views, but recently it seems to be conceded, that the court has fully and finally settled on the doctrine of this leading case, and sustained the validity of municipal bonds in the hands of bona fide holders, wherever an authority to issue them is conferred by law although that authority may have been accompanied with conditions and limitations, which were disregarded by the municipal authorities. At times, this presumption of a compliance with the law on the part of the agents designated by the legislature, seems to have been based on estoppels, such as recitals on the face of the bonds, the fact that the county or city had levied taxes to pay interest on them, or had received in exchange for the bonds certificates of stock from the railroad companies. This last was the only estoppel in the case of Pendleton County v. Amy, 13 Wallace, 297. But the court ultimately take the broad rule heretofore stated, and which is announced in the City of Lexington v. Bullen 13 Wallace, 296, "that when a corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and are no more liable to be impeached in the hands of such a holder than any other commercial paper."

This being the result of the adjudications of the Supreme court of the United States, let us see how the question stood here at the time the bonds in question were issued and purchased.

In 1863, the case of Flagg v. the City of Palmyra was decided. In that case, the return of the city officers set up, as a defence, among other matters, that there was no election, though required by the act of the legislature authorizing the subscription. Issue was taken on this plea, but the evidence on the trial is not reported or noticed in the opinion of the court, for the manifest reason, as it will appear from the opinion, that the court regarded the issue as immaterial. For the court say: "In this case, if the bonds have been issued by the city of Palmyra, in apparent compliance with the law, and themselves gave no evidence of a want of performance of the prerequisites to their issuance, and no actual notice of any such defect is traced to the bondholder, we will not hold the bondholder to be affected by a failure of the officers of the city of Palmyra to perform all that was required by law of them, in anticipation of and preparation for the issuing of these bonds. Being issued in apparent conformity to the law, the public (any of whom might acquire the bonds) is entitled to view them as issued in actual conformity to the law, and to suppose that all the acts required of the people and officers of the city of Palmyra had been duly performed.

Digitized by Google

"To apply these principles to the present case, we hold the bondholder to a knowledge of all that is combined in the act of the general assembly, to incorporate the city of Palmyra and the assembly acts above quoted; but in the absence of actual notice, do not hold them bound to enquire whether an election had been held as to the making of a registration of stock in the Q. & P. R. R. Co., or as the regularity of such an election of the qualified voters thereat, or whether the city of Palmyra had actually registered its stock in the Q. & P. R. R. Co., or whether such registration was made by the proper officer or officers of the city of Palmyra, The issuing of the bonds authorized the receiver or purchaser thereof to suppose that all those things, if required by law, had been done in the true form and substance required by law."

This language is plain, pointed and unambiguous, and substantially enumerates the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases to which we have referred.

This was the law of this State in 1863, and continued to be the law, until the case of Steins v. Franklin County, 48 Mo. R., was decided, which was in 1871, eight years after the decision in Flagg v. Palmyra. The bonds in controversy in the case now under consideration, were issued in 1865, so that the law as declared by this court in the case of Flagg v. Palmyra, is the law which ought to govern the rights of the parties. Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wallace, 175; Thompson v. Lee County, 3 Wallace, 330; Havemeyer v, Iowa County, 3 Wallace, 303.

I have been unable to see the force of the distinction which this court has recently made, between the various prerequisites imposed by law upon the action of municipal bodies, and the grounds upon which a prominence is given to a mere election, without regard to the substantial defects which may accompany it.

It would seem that an election without notice, or upon insufficient notice, or one in which the requisite majority is not obtained, or at which disqualified votes are allowed, would be as worthless as no election at all. Of course, mere formal defects occupy a different position and may well be passed over, but it is conceded in all the cases, that every question as to regularity of the election and the result, is closed against the municipal body that issues the bonds, and it is only essential to their validity in the hands of bona fide holders, that some sort of an election should be held. It may be, that there is only a majority vote for the subscription, when the law requires two-thirds; it may be, that from want of sufficient notice, a mere fraction of the voters appear at the polls; it may be that hundreds of minors and other disqualified persons have voted; and in all these cases, the prerequisite of an election is as completely and essentially evaded, as if no election had been held. Yet the officers of the municipality are allowed to decide upon the question, and their decision is held conclusive. Why not hold it equally conclusive when no election at all is pretended? It is said that the power to subscribe is derived from the people of the county or city, and if this be conceded, a fraudulent or unfair and illegal election is as fatal to the exercise of the power, as a subscription without any election at all.

VI. But the power is derived from the law, without which the unanimous vote of every voter in the county or city could not confer it. The law gives the power, but restricts its exercise by requiring an election. The power is not derived from the people of the city, or the county, or township, but from the legislative branch of the government. The municipal subdivisions are allowed to issue negotiable securities upon certain conditions, and one of the conditions is not complied with. All the conditions and restrictions and limitations are equally binding. The absence of one of the prerequisites is as fatal as another. The securities are negotiable, and go to the market as negotiable paper. Is the buyer bound to enquire whether the prerequisites have been complied with? Or is he authorized to assume that these municipalities have done their duty, as the bonds on their face certify?

VII. As I understand the doctrine of agency, a negotiable instrument can not be defeated by a plea that the agent who executed it exceeded his powers; provided he was authorized to execnte such an instrument upon conditions such as he failed to observe.

If a clerk or cashier issues paper, as an agent, to an amount exceeding that allowed by his principal, the holder can recover from the principal. Farmer's Bank v. Butchers Bank, 16 N. Y. 125.

If a security on a negotiable instrument makes the principal his agent, and instructs him to deliver it only in case some other person signs it, and the agent delivers it without such additional signature, all the cases hold that the security can not defend on the ground of want of authority. This is decided in a case at the present term.

VIII. The result of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and of this court, at the time of the issuance of the bonds in controversy, is, that the holder had a right to presume that the act of 1855 and the amendments thereto had been complied with, and therefore, the defence of no election is unavailing.

It will, of course, be understood, that throughout this opinion, all the questions examined are in regard to the rights of bona fide holders of municipal bonds, and are not intended to indicate any opinion upon questions arising on mandamus or injunction, or other form of proceeding to arrest the action of municipal bodies or their officers. We have not referred to the decisions of this court on such questions, because very different conditions enter into such adjudications. Moreover, the law inflicts heavy penalties upon municipal officers who exceed or disregard their powers in subscribing to railroad companies, not only pecuniary, but personal.

In conclusion, I venture to copy and adopt the opinion of Judge GRIER, in Wood v. Allegheny County, 3 Wall, Jr. 267, whose opinion, however, bluntly, and, perhaps, quaintly expressed, seems to me quite as applicable to the condition of affairs in Missouri, as he supposes it to be in Pennsylvania:

"If the right of a municipal corporation to subscribe, even when authorized by the legislature, to purposes so alien to its general purposes, in the construction of works of improvement, and which, in the largest part, are in distant counties and other states, were open to me for consideration as a new point, I cannot say that I would hold such subscription other than simply void. The strongest arguments at law have been made against such subscriptions, and they are worth recurring to, as containing true and lawyer-like views of the extent and character of municipal powers. But the matter is not open in this court. The legislature of Pennsylvania has authorized counties to make such subscriptions, and the supreme court of the state has decided, though by a bare majority, that the act is constitutional.

"In spite, then, of all resistance by the county to paying these bonds, here are the bonds, upon which the county promises to pay. The county said to the railroad companies: 'We want to help you; we have not the money, but we will lend you our credit, our promise to pay.' That promise is, or ought to be, sacred. Doubtless many improper things have been done. The whole business of making cities and counties to subscribe to railroads, was unwise. This will be admitted now; though the counsels of the able and conservative men who took ground against it, were not heeded when given. Mercantile and popular clamor demanded 'subscription;' traders, politicians and all kinds of interested jobbers, urged and drove the matter, while commissioners, grand jurors and legislators have been led in the train. It is to be lamented that such things should be done, but they have been done. If the electors of our cities choose to hand over the great concerns of our public offices to ignorant and unprincipled administrators, they must suffer by it. They must, themselves, bear the burdens which they put it in the power of knaves to pile upon them. Whatsoever a man soweth, that he shall reap, and when he sows the wind, he is apt to reap the whirl-wind.

Digitized by Google

"The objections urged against the plaintiff's claim would have force, if the questions were between the county and the railway companies. But it is not. It is between an innocent holder for value of a bond payable to bearer, and the party who sent it out into the market, or handed it over to others to do so, where it has been sold in the course of trade. It is useless to bring forward here, as against the business operations of this day, abstract dogmas out of Blackstone or the Institutes of Coke. Such instruments as these were never dreamed of in their day. The laws of trade suggest and govern these matters. As I said in the beginning, there is the bond; here is the fact. Your promise to pay is put upon the market. You gave it this negotiable and coupon form, for the purpose of facilitating sale and preventing all questions of equity about it, and now, when the promise has been put upon the market and sold to an innocent holder, you set up these equities. That would do. Why did you issue your bonds if you meant that the holder should look to the railways? Why did you not leave the railways to issue their own? For this reason only, that you knew that capitalists would trust you and would not trust them. I esteem the bold, hardy and industrious people of this country; I feel for them, with this load of debt put upon them by the careless and unworthy persons whom they have elected to office. But they have allowed the bonds to be issued and sold, and they must pay for them."

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with the concurrence of all the judges except Judge SHERWOOD, who is absent.

AFFIRMED.

On a subsequent day of the term, a motion for rehearing was made; upon which ADAMS, J., delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

This motion was not filed within the time prescribed by the rule of this court, requiring such motions to be filed within ten days after the opinion of the court shall have been delivered. But, as it is a very important case, and as there seems to be some misunderstanding in regard to the precise points passed upon by the court, we have considered the motion, and in overruling it, I deem it proper to state briefly what was concurred in by us.

We assented to the proposition that the charter of the railroad company, which was enacted in February, 1857, allowed counties to subscribe to the stock of the company without taking a vote of the people. In regard to this matter, the charter is plain and positive. The next point was, whether this provision of the charter had been repealed by any subsequent legislation, or by the new constitution of 1865. This point was considered settled by repeated decisions of this court, to the effect that no subsequent act of the legislature or the constitution had repealed that provision of the charter.

On the faith of these decisions, large amounts had been invested, and we considered that the question had been put at rest, and had become a rule of property, which we had no right to disturb. This decision only applies to such charters as were granted prior to the constitution of 1865. There is nothing in the opinion which will warrant the conclusion that has considered that part of the charter, allowing such subscriptions a franchise which could not be repealed, either before or after the adoption of the new constitution.

It was not necessary to decide that the recitals, in the bonds issued by the county court to the railroad company, were conclusive or amounted to an estoppel. In my judgment, and in the judgment of a majority of the court, they do not amount to an estoppel. Although that is the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, it has not been sanctioned here so as to make it a rule of decision in this State. These bonds were issued after the opinion of this court in Flagg v. City of Palmyra, and before the Franklin county cases.

In delivering opinions, the judge who delivers them is allowed to make his own arguments and illustrations, without compromitting the other judges. It is unnecessary to say that the illustrations indulged in by the learned judge, who delivered the opinion under review, were his own, and it was not necessary for the other judges to sanction them in order to concur in the result.

The only new point in this motion, not passed upon by the court, is, that the charter of the company had ceased before the company was organized. Whether the corporation had a legal existence or not when the subscription was made, is a question that cannot be raised in a collateral proceeding. It did exist as a matter of fact, and was in the exercise of all its chartered franchises, when the subscription was made and these bonds issued. The only proper way to test this matter is by a direct proceeding by the sovereign power of the State. It is a question between the state and the company, and a proceeding by way of quo warranto is the proper remedy. State Bank v. Merchants' Bank of Baltimore, 10 Mo., 124.

The motion for a rehearing is overruled. Judge NAPTON filing a separate opinion.

The other judges concur.

NAPTON, J., said: In the opinion overruling the motion for a rehearing, I concur.

In the opinion of the court, heretofore filed, I discussed no question which was not raised by the record. The points were two: First, whether the laws passed since 1857, the date of the charter in question, repealed the privilege granted in that charter of taking subscriptions from counties without a vote, and upon that point the court was agreed that they did not, on the authority of various decisions referred to.

The next point was, whether, if the bonds were conceded to have been issued under the law of 1855, which, on their face, they purported to have been, the absence of an election defeated a recovery on them; and, upon this point, I referred to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to the decisions of this court anterior to, and long after, the issue of the bonds in controversy, and showed that both courts held such bonds valid, in despite of the want of an election, and as such was recognized to be the law, both in this state, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, at the time of the issuance and purchase by the holders, the bonds could not be defeated by such a plea; although this court might have held differently since, and might entertain a different opinion now.

Upon both these points, I adhere to the opinion heretofore given.

There was, of course, no opinion given, in regard to bonds issued under charters, general or special, granted since the new constitution; for no such question arose; nor could any such question arise in regard to special charters, as the new constitution prohibited any such charters.

NOTE.—The leading cases in the Supreme Court of Missouri, on the subject of municipal railway aid bonds, are Flagg v. Palmyra (city of) 33 Mo., 440, 1863; Steines v. Franklin county, 48 Mo., 167, 1871; Carpenter v. Town of Lathrop, 51 Mo., 483, 1873, and Smith v. Hall v. Clark county, above given, decided November 3, 1873. The case of Flagg v. Palmyra, was decided after the Commissioners of Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How., 539, 1858; Bissell v. Jeffersonville, 24 How., 287, 1860, and Moran v. Miami County, 2 Black, 722, 1862; and when it is read in connection with these cases, it will he seen that the observation of Mr. Justice NAPTON in the principal case, is quite correct, that it "substantially enunciates the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States." The bonds in the case of Flagg were issued under a special act of the legislature, authorizing their issue, by the city of Palmyra, in case a majority of the qualified voters should, at an election to be called by the City Council for that purpose, so determine. It appears that an election was held, and that the bonds issued by the city of Palmyra, were in the hands of bona fide holders for value. It was contended that the bonds were void, because proper notice of the election was not given, and because the bonds showed on their face that they were dated prior to the passage of the ordinance of the city, under which the bonds purported (according to their recitals) to have been issued, etc. These defences were held to be unavailing, and, in giving the judgment of the Court, BATES, J., uses the language quoted in the principal case.

Digitized by Google

In 1871, Steines v. Franklin county, supra, was decided, and it was there held where the county court issued bonds without any vote whatever of the people, when the statuted require a precedent vote, that such bonds were void even in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, though it was competent for the legislature to validate them. Mr. Justice WAGNER comments on the leading cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, and calls attention to the contray views asserted by some of the state courts. In the course of his opinion, he remarks: "But the Supreme Court of the United States, in a series of adjudications, have established a different principle, and one which we believe is more in consonance with justice and reason. We have heretofore conformed our ruling on this subject, with the decisions of the National Court, not on account of its paramount authority, for on this question it has none—but, because it inculcated an unbending principle of right, and a rigorous morality. Whether any of the cases have gone sufficiently far to warrant the holding of these bonds binding and valid, is now to be enquired into."

Commenting also on the language of the opinion in Flagg v. Palmyra, quoted by NAPTON, J., in the principal case, WAGNER, J., observes: "This language is exceedingly broad, and if it is construed as applicable only to the facts in the case, it is sustained by numerous cases. But, if it is intended to assert that a court or a city council, who have power under certain circumstances, to make contracts and issue bonds, may disregard these circumstances or conditions entirely, and then issue bonds purporting to be in pursuance of authority which will be binding, and against which no defence can be made, we dissent from it."

And the conclusion is reached in the Franklin county case, that it is consonant with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and with Flagg v. Palmyra, to hold that bonds issued without any election, when the statute conferring the power requires an election, and the sanction of a popular vote, are, in whosoever hands they may be, utterly void. [But on this point, see the decisions of the United States Supreme Court since pronounced: Pendleton v. Amy, 13 Wall. 297; Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 282, and particularly Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 355; Kennicott v. Supervisors of Wayne county, 16 Wall. 452; and Rogers v. St. Joseph Township, 16 Wall. 644; and on the other hand, Lewis v. Commissioners of Bourbon county, recently decided by the Supreme Court of Kansas, and which will be published in our next number.]

In Carpenter v. Town of Lathrop, supra, decided at the February term, 1873, 51 Mo., 483, which was a case in which the bonds were in the hands of an innocent holder, and recited that they were issued "under and pursuant to an order of the board of trustees of the town, * * and authorized by a vote of the people of the said town at a special election held for that purpose," and in which an election had been in fact held, the plaintiff was non-suited in the inferior court, and the judgment of non-suit was affirmed by the supreme court, on the ground that the holder of the bond, in order to recover must, by evidence aliunde the recitals in the bonds, "show, with reasonable certainty, that an election was held, at which the vote was taken, and that it had been taken and the result decided substantially in conformity to the law." In his opinion on this point, VORIES, J., 51 Mo., 498, says: "In a case like the present, it devolves on the plaintiff to show with reasonable certainty, that the authority to issue the bonds had been conferred by an election authorized by law, and that the vote had been preserved by poll-books or otherwise, by persons authorized to do so, and that the votes had at least been received and passed on by some persons authorized to pass upon them, and decide whether the election had been carried, or whether the voters had assented to the subscription. * * The recitals in the bonds are not sufficient evidence to bind the defendant, or to show that the power existed in the trustees [of the town] to execute the bonds. The recitals would, doubtless, be sufficient to justify an innocent purchaser in receiving the bonds, without being charged with notice of any mere irregularities in the conferring or exercise of the power necessary to their issue, and I think, that this is the only effect the recitals could have. The plaintiff would still have to show with reasonable certainty, that an election was held, at which the vote was taken, and that it had been taken, and the result decided substantially in conformity to the law."

This brief reference to the State adjudications prior to the principal case, in connection with the several opinions in that case, above given, will, it is believed, show with accuracy and sufficient fullness, the views of that tribunal on the subject of the power to issue bonds of this character, and the defences that may be made to them. This is the only purpose of the present note. We shall soon publish other decisions upon the same subject, rendered in the Federal Courts for Missouri, and by the Supreme Court of Kansas and elsewhere.

"Fleeing From Justice"—Construction of the Act of 1790.

THE UNITED STATES v. THOMAS M. O'BRIAN.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kansas, November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

Crminal Law—Limitation of Prosecution—Fleeing from Justice.—A "fleeing from justice" within the meaning of the Act of Congress limiting Criminal Prosecutions, is to leave one's home, residence or known place of abode, within the District, or to conceal oneself therein, with intent, in either case, to avoid detection or punishment for some public offence against the United States.

The defendant was indicted under the act of February 5th, 1867, Sec. 1, (14 Stats. at Large, 383), for selling to Hines & Eaves, bankers in Leavenworth, a check drawn by the Paymaster of the Army of the United States, upon the Assistant United States Treasurer at New York, with a forged indorsement of the name of the payee thereon, with the intent by the said Act prohibited. Under the plea of not guilty, the main question in the case was whether the offense was barred by the Statute of Limitations (1 Stats. at Large, 117, Sec. 32; 1 Bright. Dig. 322, Sec. 107). To take the case out of the Statute, the Government relied upon the proviso that the act shall not "extend to persons fleeing from justice."

In relation to this defence, the jury were charged orally as given below.

C. I. Scofield District Attorney, and Thomas Ryan, for the United States; Thos. P. Fenlon and J. W. English, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge: The offence is charged to have been committed on the 31st day of December, 1867, and the indictment was not found until the 6th day of May, 1873—more than five years afterwards. The indictment alleges also that the defendant is a person fleeing from justice in this district, and that he has been thus fleeing since the first day of December, 1869.

The limitation statutes of Congress require an indictment for an offence, such as that here charged, to be found within two years from the time the offence was committed; but the statute contains a proviso, that the bar or the limitation shall not "extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice."

It becomes necessary to construe this proviso, and to instruct you as to its meaning. It is in evidence that the defendant left the district of Kansas in August 1869, and that he was afterwards publicly employed in the Paymaster's Department of the army in New Orleans, and that he afterwards resided for a time in Little Rock, St. Louis, and in Colorado, where he was arrested after this indictment was found. Before August, 1869, he had resided for some years in Leavenworth, doing business as claim agent and was well known there, and evidence has been introduced by the defendant to show that after he left Leavenworth, he was seen by different citizens of that place, in the cities above named, and that his whereabouts was generally known in Leavenworth and among all his acquaintances.

There is also evidence that there was a criminal proceeding pending against him when he left Kansas, in the State Court at Leavenworth for a violation of the laws of the State. There is no evidence that the defendant voluntarily returned to the district of Kansas, or had been therein since his departure in 1869.

It becomes necessary for you to determine upon the evidence, the motives of the defendant in leaving the State in the summer of 1869—or more specifically to determine whether he at that time fled from justice.

What is "fleeing from justice," within the meaning of the statute? Having reference to the facts of this case, my answer is, it means to leave one's home or residence or known place of abode, with intent to avoid detection or punishment for some public offence against the United States.

Digitized by Google

It results from, or is implied in this definition, that if the defendant left his home in Leavenworth solely to avoid the criminal justice of the State of Kansas, and not to avoid the criminal justice of the United States — this will not deprive him of the two years limitation.

The criminal codes of the General Government and of the States are entirely distinct, as was held by this court in Hawthorne's case, (1 Dillon, C. C. R., 422); and in my opinion it can not be supposed that Congress intended to make any provision in respect to persons fleeing from the justice of the States.

It is implied also in the definition above given, that mere departure by the defendant from the limits of the District of Kansas, irrespective of the motives and purposes of such departure, is not a fleeing from justice. An offender may flee from justice, within the meaning of the statute under consideration, though he never left the limits of the District; as for example, by secretly concealing himself, or by not being usually and publicly known as being within it. If the defendant, after his departure from Kansas, publicly resided in various places in the United States, did not conceal his whereabouts, and kept up an open correspondence with his friends in Kansas, these facts may properly be taken into view by the jury in connection with the other circumstances in evidence, in forming their opinion of his intent and purpose in leaving the State in August 1869.

[The jury found for the defendant, on the ground that the prosecution for the offence was barred.]

NOTE.—The decisions upon the proviso of the Act of April 30, 1790, as to "fleeing from justice," are not numerous.

It was decided by Chief Justice ELLSWORTH in William's case, that it need not be a fleeing from prosecution already begun — so stated by Mr. District Judge EDWARDS in the United States v. Smith, which was a case in the Circuit Court for the District of Connecticut, reported 4 Day, 121, 1809, and where the same view was taken. Nor need it be a fleeing from process issued. United States v. White, 5 Cranch, C. C. R., 38, 1836; S. C. Ib. 116, 368, 457.

Whether mere departure from the United States is a fleeing from justice, or whether if the defendant fled the district, but within two years openly returned to it, he can avail himself of the Statute — see the cases above cited.

The case of O'Brian seems to be the first one which has ruled the point that the fleeing must have been from the criminal justice of the United States—and that it is not sufficient if the sole motive of the defendant in leaving his known place of abode was to avoid the criminal justice of the State. The point, however, is not free from difficulty.

Although the indictment in O'Brian's case alleged that the defendant had fled from justice, this is not necessary. The defendant may avail himself of the statute of limitation, either by special plea or under the general issue. If he pleads specially, the Government may reply that he fled from justice. And under the general issue, the prosecutor may introduce evidence to bring the defendant within the exception of the statute. United States v. Cooke, decided at the Dec. Term, 1872, of the U. S. Supreme Court, where the subject is fully examined by Mr Justice CLIFFORD; S. C., with valuable note, 12 Am. Law Reg, (N. S.) 682.

Trustee's Sale — Fraud — Payment of Debt Before Sale.

A. M. FERGUSON v. WILLAM COWARD.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Jackson, Nov. 5th, 1873.

A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
P. TURNEY,
ROBERT MCFARLAND,
JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
THOS. J. FREEMAN,
JOHN L. T. SNEED,

1. Practice—Ejectment—Fraud.—In an action of ejectment by the purchaser at a trustee's sale, to recover the land purchased, the defendant cannot set up as a defence that there was fraud in making the sale. Such a defence is not available at law.

2. Trustee's Sale—Payment of Debt.—It is a good defence in such a suit, that the debt secured by the trust conveyance was paid by the debtor before the sale; and the exclusion of evidence tending to establish this fact, is error. By the payment of the debt by the debtor, the legal title returned to him; and the trustee had no right to sell, and no title to convey.

FREEMAN, J.—Coward brought this action of ejectment to recover a lot in the city of Memphis. A judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendant prosecuted an appeal, in the nature of a writ of error.

The facts necessary to be stated are, that Ferguson conveyed the lot to Samuel H. Coward as trustee, to secure the payment of a debt due plaintiff, William Coward. The trustee sold the lot under the deed of trust, at which sale, William Coward, the beneficiary, became the purchaser; the trustee making him a regular conveyance for the same, under which he sought to recover the lot in this action.

Two questions are presented in the record for decision. First, it was proposed by defendant on the trial, to show that there were fraud and collusion between the trustee and the purchasing beneficiary, in making the sale, and thus obtaining the conveyance of the legal title. On this question, we approve the ruling of the circuit judge, that this could not be set up in a court of law, in the mode attempted, to defeat the operation of the deed.

The other question presented in the record—but not argued before us, there being no counsel for appellant in this court,—is founded on a proposition of defendant's counsel, to prove by a witness, A. M. Ferguson, the maker of the deed, that the debt secured by the deed of trust, had been paid before the sale by the trustee. Plaintiff objected to the introduction of this testimony, and the objection was sustained by the court.

In this the court erred; as we deem it now settled in Tennessee, that on payment of the debt by the mortgagor, the title returns to the former owner; not so, however, in case of payment by a third party, who, in such case would be held the assignee of the mortgage. Carter v. Taylor, 3 Head, 33. If the debt had been paid by Ferguson, before the sale, as was proposed to be shown, then the trustee had no right to sell, or title to convey. We are therefore compelled to reverse this case for the error referred to, and remand for a new trial. REVERSED.

Notes of Recent Decisions.

[We expect soon to have arrangements perfected, by which we shall be regularly furnished with notes of the latest decisions of several of the courts of last resort in the western and southern states, and also of several of the federal courts. Until then we shall be obliged to draw, to quite an extent, from our exchanges for our "notes of recent decisions." Such of the following "notes" of cases as were decided in Pennsylvania, are to be credited to the Pittsburg Legal Gazette. The files of our St. Louis contemporary, the Journal of Law, have assisted us in making notes of several Missouri cases, there published in full.]

Slander; Damages.—In an action of slander, it is not necessary that there should be an assessment of damages upon each count of the petition. Polston v. See, Sup. Court Mo., Oct. Term, 1873.

———; Condition in life of the parties.—The condition in life, both of the plaintiff and defendant, are proper subjects of enquiry in slander cases on the question of damages. Ibid.

———; Quantum of Proof to Establish Justification.—In an action for slander, when the truth of the words spoken is alleged as a justification, the defendant must make out such plea beyond a reasonable doubt. Ibid. SHERWOOD, J., dissenting.

Chancery Practice; Multifariousness.—A bill praying for a specific performance of a contract to convey land, and also that the defendant account for the rents and profits accruing while he was wrongfully in possession, is not multifarious. Duvall v. Tinsley, Sup. Court Mo., Oct. Term, 1873. Nov. 3.

Tax Title; Adverse Possession.—In Chapman v. Templeton, the plaintiff brought ejectment and exhibited a clear paper title. The defendant claimed under a tax deed, made in 1868, reciting a certificate of purchase made in 1858. This was offered as color of title to support the defence of the statute of limitations. The only evidence of possession was, that the defendants had permitted the city of Louisiana to build a hog-pen on the center of the block in controversy, which had been occupied about two years, and had then been abandoned and gone to decay, and that the defendants had paid taxes for ten consecutive years. Held—

Digitized by Google

1. That there was no evidence of a continuous adverse possession ten years, so that the bar of the statute of limitations would attach. The continuous payment of taxes is not of itself sufficient to show adverse possession.

2. There being no evidence of a continuous adverse possession during the time prescribed by the statute of limitations, it was not error to refuse to permit the tax deed to be read in evidence. Supreme Court, Mo., Oct. Term, 1873.

Outstanding Title.—Another point made in last case, related to the rejection of evidence that the former owner had conveyed the land in controversy by parol, for the purpose, it would seem, of showing an outstanding title in a third party. The rejection of this evidence was held proper. Since the introduction of the common law, lands cannot be conveyed in this state by parol.

Railway Negligence; Killing Stock.—Where it was proved that the plaintiff's cow was killed by being run over by a train on defendant's railway track, at a point where it passed through the open prairie, and where there was no fence nor crossing;—held, that in such cases, the law presumes negligence, and it does not devolve on the plaintiff to prove it. All that the plaintiff was required to show was, that the cow strayed upon the track, without his fault, or by reason of the track not being fenced. Lantz v. St. L., Kan. City and Northern Railway Co., Sup. Court Mo. Oct. Term, 1873.

Consideration; Compounding Debt Due by Insolvent.—Where the plaintiffs and other creditors of the defendant, who was in insolvent circumstances, without any fraud, agreed to accept fifty cents on the dollar in full satisfaction of their respective claims, and the plaintiffs had been paid such composition in full, and had surrendered to the defendant the note held by them upon him in pursuance of such agreement—held, that they cannot maintain an action to recover the unpaid balance of such debt. Murry et al. v. Snow, Sup. Court Iowa, Dec. Term, 1873; 7 Western Jurist, 685.

Tender; Admission.—An answer averring a tender of a sum to the plaintiff, and that it is brought into court, is a good plea of tender, and operates as an admission that the sum tendered is due the plaintiff, and authorizes a verdict for the plaintiff in an amount which the jury may find due him, which cannot be less than the sum tendered. Babcock v. Harris, Sup. Court Iowa, Sept. Term, 1873, 7 Western Jurist, 687.

Rape; Evidence of Immediate Outcry.—In Burt v. The State, 23 Ohio State, 394, which was an indictment for rape, the state was permitted to prove that the prosecutrix made declarations soon after the alleged assault, charging the defendant with being the guilty party. The part of the testimony indicated by the italics was objected to, and it was urged by defendant's counsel that, although it was competent to admit her declarations immediately after the offence, to show the fact that an offence had been committed upon her, yet that it was incompetent to admit her declaration that a particular person had committed it. But the supreme court held that there was no error in admitting the testimony. WELCH, J., said: "Undoubtedly the safer and better rule, in the generality of cases is, to limit the prosecution to a general statement of the fact that complaint was made, or the substance of her declarations, and leave the prisoner to bring out the details, if he chooses to do so. How far the prosecution shall be permitted to go into details, in giving the declarations of the female, must, to a great extent, at least, be left to the discretion of the court. Whether the court might, in any given case, so far abuse that discretion, as to render the proceedings erroneous, we need not now decide. It is enough for this case, to say that we are by no means prepared to lay down as law, the rule insisted upon by counsel, namely, that in proving her declarations, the fact that the prosecutrix charged the crime upon the prisoner, should be suppressed. If she was acquainted with the party, and recognized him at the time, his name would be almost the first word she would utter, in making her outcry or complaint; and the complaint would be constrained without it. It is because it is natural for a female to make immediate complaint, when so violated, that the law calls upon her to show the fact of such complaint, and the law will not require her to make a complaint that is unnatural and constrained. We think the court did not err in admitting the testimony."

Quo Warranto; Pleading.—The enquiry in proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto is limited to the charges in the information; and matter set up by way of plea is only material in so far as it shows warrant in law for the exercise of the authority alleged in the information to be usurped. State ex rel., etc. v. Cincinnati, 23 Ohio State, 445.

An information which charges a corporation with usurping certain franchises by acting through other parties, calls in question only the authority of the usurping corporation, and cannot be extended so as to include authority not derivable from the corporation, and which such parties exercise in their own right. Ibid.

Partnership; Dissolution; Preference of Creditors in Distribution of Assets.—The preference which creditors of a partnership may have over those of an individual partner, in the distribution of the assets of the firm, cannot be defeated by a mere executory agreement between the partners, for the sale, or transfer, of the assets of the firm to one of them, unaccompanied by any actual delivery or transfer. A delivery, or transfer, in such cases, will not be presumed, but must be shown, in order to defeat this right of the creditors of the firm; and, therefore, where such purchasing partner dies before the time fixed for the delivery or transfer of the property, assets of the firm subsequently found in the hands of the surviving partner, who is also executor of the deceased, will be presumed to be held by him in his character of surviving partner, and not as executor.

Thus, two partners, A. and G., agreed that the firm should be dissolved at a specified future time, and that A. should then take and own all its property and effects, and should pay all its debts. Before the time named, A. died insolvent, having by his will, appointed G. and another person his executors. Money belonging to the firm was placed by G. in bank in the name of the firm, subject to be checked out in that name, and was so checked out by G. in payment of debts of the firm with the knowledge and consent of his co-executors. Held, that so far as regards the rights of creditors so paid, the money is to be considered as assets of the firm, notwithstanding any private agreement or understanding between the executors that it belonged to the estate. Kreis v. Gorton, 23 Ohio State, 468.

Gift from Husband to Wife of Mortgaged Property; Subsequent Insolvency of Husband; Payment of Mortgage Debt Fraudulent as Against his Creditors.—Where a husband purchased lands subject to a mortgage and paid the purchase money less the amount of the mortgage debt, and for the purpose and with the intention of making a gift to his wife, procured the deed of conveyance to be made by the vendor to her, subject to the outstanding mortgage, and at the same time promised the vendor to pay the mortgage debt upon maturity: Held, that upon delivery of the deed to the wife she became seized of the equity of redemption only as a gift executed; that the promise of the husband to pay the mortgage debt for her benefit, did not inure to her as a gift, either of an interest in the land or of the money promised to be paid until payment in fact was made; and that, in case the husband became insolvent before payment of the mortgage, the payment thus made was fraudulent as against then existing creditors, although they became such after the delivery of the deed to his wife, and after the promise to pay the mortgage debt was made. Oliver v. Moore, 23 Ohio State, 473.

Book Notice.

A Digest of the Laws of Texas, Containing the Laws in Force and the Repealed Laws on which Rights Rest. By George W. Paschal of Austin, Texas. Vol. I., Containing the Laws from the Foundation of the Republic of Texas; until 1864 Vol. II, from 1864 to 1872. Third Edition. Washington: W. H. & O. H. Morrison, 1873.

We have had frequent occasion to consult the first volume of Paschal's Digest of Laws, and speak with some degree of knowledge as to its merits. We are aware that Judge Paschal takes pains, in the preface to these books, to set forth their good points, of which he shows plainly that he entertains a favorable opinion; and this fact has led some reviewers to dismiss him with little better than a sneer. We do not share in this feeling.

Digitized by Google

We think that Judge Paschal has, in these books, done a work of which he may be justly proud. We think it no exaggeration to say that his first volume stands unrivalled among the American codes. It possesses more elements of usefulness than any book of the kind we have ever had occasion to use.

Nothing is more perplexing to the practitioner, than a body of statute law built upon the basis of a highly refined and cultivated analysis, like that of Blackstone's Commentaries. Add to this the entire absence of cross-references, and the poor indexes which characterize many of the codes, and the difficulties of using them become almost insurmountable. Judge Paschal has wisely arranged his titles alphabetically, and has kept up a thorough system of polyglot references between kindred subjects, so as almost to dispense with the necessity of an index.

Immediately under the laws in force, are printed the repealed statutes on the same subject, on which rights may be supposed to be still pending. The old law and the new thus stand side by side, the old frequently furnishing a key to the interpretation of the new. The work also contains a system of exhaustive notes, embracing not only the decisions expounding both the old law and the new, but also, in many cases, extracts from public documents and other historical and political data—making a running commentary upon the text, acquainting the reader with the history and policy of the laws before him, and the exposition they have received in the supreme court of Texas, and in the courts of the United States.

We have but one complaint to make. The notes in the first volume are run together without much apparent system; and, with the evident view of saving space, are packed, so to speak, in very fine type, without paragraphs, and without catch-words to indicate the various subdivisions of the subjects treated of.

In the second volume the notes are thrown into paragraphs, but we miss the catch-words; which, though they might diminish the artistic appearance of the pages, would nevertheless add to the usefulness of the book.

The publishers have done their share of the work well. The second volume, in particular, is a model of typographical excellence.

Notes and Queries.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL—You would greatly oblige me, if you would give me your opinion (or refer me to authority) upon the following: Has a non-resident, owning property within the corporate limits of a town, the right to go into the federal court to test the validity of a tax, which the state courts, having jurisdiction, have decided said corporation has a right to levy.

ANSWER—If the tax upon the non-resident exceeded $500, we think he could file a bill in the federal circuit court, if he could bring his case within some recognized head of equity jurisdiction; but if the supreme court of the state had already decided the tax to be valid, and if this decision involved simply a construction of the local laws of the state, the federal court would follow the decisions of the state court.

Thanks.

We return thanks to the following publishers and reporters for sending us exchanges and advance sheets of reports in advance of our first issue:

To Messrs. King & Baird, 608 and 609, Sansom street, Philadelphia, for the Legal Gazette.

To J. W. & J. S. Murray, 73 Grant street, Pittsburgh, for the Pittsburgh Legal Gazette.

To J. M. Power Wallace, Esq., 132 South Sixth street, Philadelphia, for the Legal Intelligencer.

To Messrs. Mills & Co., Des Moines, Iowa, for the Western Jurist.

To John M. Shirley, Esq., of Andover, N. H., Reporter for that state, for advance sheets of Vol. 52 of the New Hampshire Reports.

To Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, for advance sheets of Vol. 23 of the Ohio State Reports.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE Supreme Court of the United States adjourned on the 24th of December until the 5th of January.

—THE supreme court of Missouri meets at Jefferson City on the 5th of January.

—THE supreme court of Minnesota is not in session. Judge McMillan is in Florida recruiting his health, and Judge Ripley has been stricken with paralysis. All opinions of any value determined up to this time will appear in the 19th Minnesota, which is nearly ready for issuance. It is not probable that any more opinions will be filed before April next.

—THE circuit court at Murphysboro, Ill., has just decided against the validity of certain bonds issued in compliance with an agreement entered into between the city of Carbondale and the Southern Illinois Normal University commissioners, to secure the location of that institution in Carbondale. The case will probably be taken to the supreme court.

—THE president has nominated for United States attorney for the eastern district of Virginia, Mr. James Lyons.

—THE new constitution of Pennsylvania has been adopted by over 150,000 majority.

—THE new constitution to be submitted to the people of Michigan, provides for an appointed judiciary.

—THE Kentucky legislature has passed a bill providing for a constitutional convention. The Courier Journal says: "The friends of constitutional reform achieved a victory in the Kentucky legislature Wednesday, which is of the first significance. The initiatory step for the calling of a convention to revise our organic law was adopted in the senate by a vote of twenty-three to eleven, and in the house by a vote of fifty-eight to thirty-nine—a majority of democrats voting for the measure. It will be seen that in the house seven votes more than necessary were cast for the bill, and of those present, there was a majority of eighteen. This result gives promise of a new and bright career for Kentucky. Those who argued and labored for the measure deserve the highest praise."

—MR. GAGE, the defaulting treasurer of Chicago, accounted for the interest in the public money in his hands, which his predecessors pocketed. In this way he saved for the city, during his term of office, about $130,000. His sureties now propose, in case they are sued for the amount of his defalcation, to endeavor to have the interest so accounted for, deducted as an offset from the amount of their liability. And it is said that legal opinion is divided as to whether this can be done.

—As instances of the extent to which the spirit of reform will go when it gets started, and of the rapid progress which it sometimes makes, particularly when dealing with subjects with which the reformer is not fully conversant, we may note the following:

In the Indiana State Farmer's Grange, which met the other day at Valparaiso, a resolution was introduced, and (we believe) passed, urging that the trial of all offences punishable by fine and imprisonment in the county jail, be committed to justices of the peace.

In the Illinois farmer's convention, which recently met at Springfield, the following resolutions were offered:

"WHEREAS, Our courts, as operated at present, are one of the most grevious burdens borne by the people, and are governed in their action to a great degree, by antiquated precedents of the dead past, in cases having often but little resemblance to the issues of the living present, and are a stigma on the boasted intelligence and progress of the American people, costing a vast amount of money to all tax-payers, simply, in many cases, to gratify a morbid taste for practicing the tricks, and for the beautiful uncertainties of the law; therefore,

"Resolved, As the sense of this convention, that the people should imperatively demand immediate legislation for the reconstruction of our courts on principles of common sense, prominent among which shall be a provision setting apart a portion of the time of each session, for the hearing of cases presented by parties in person making joint issue, the decision of the court to be final."

"Resolved, That the doctrine of vested rights, by which railroad corporations claim exemption from legislative control, belongs to a past age, and, as it cannot exist without infringing on the rights of citizens generally, it has no legitimate place in the jurisprudence of a free people."

We have not learned what was done with the last two resolutions. It would be well for those who, without being familiar with the present laws or with legal or constitutional history, propose the most radical and fundamental changes in the law, to remember the suggestion of Herbert Spencer, that the substitution of new laws for old ones, not only does not, in many cases, remedy existing evils, but sometimes brings a train of new evils, entirely unexpected and unprovided for.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JANUARY 8, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION:
$8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

The National Banks not subject to the Bankrupt Law.

We print elsewhere an able opinion pronounced by Judge BLODGETT in the United States District Court at Chicago, on the 30th ult., determining that the national banks in case of insolvency are not liable to be proceeded against under the bankrupt law. The novelty and great importance of this case induces us to publish it in full, notwithstanding the fact that in order to do so, we are obliged to continue a part of another very important case to our next number.

At the conclusion of the reading of Judge BLODGETT'S opinion, the attorneys for the petitioner gave notice that a petition for review before the circuit court would be filed.

Kansas Municipal Bonds.

Within the past two years, the supreme court of Kansas has affirmed the constitutional validity of the legislation of the state, authorizing the issue of bonds in aid of railway enterprises. Leavenworth county v. Miller, 7 Kan. 479; State ex rel. St. Joseph and Denver City Railway company, 7 Kan. 542; Morris v. Morris county, 7 Kan. 576. Before that decision was made, as well as since, a large amount of such bonds has been issued. The bond diathesis seems to have been very strongly marked in Kansas, and bonds for legitimate as well as illegitimate purposes issued in extravagant and improvident amounts. Acts authorizing municipal or local public aid to private enterprises, have been passed and bonds issued thereunder, but the issue of this class of securities has been effectually checked by the decision of the circuit court of the United States, in the case of the Commercial Bank v. City of Iola, 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 353, which case is now before the Supreme Court of the United States on error.

We commence in this number the publication of the recent opinion of the supreme court of Kansas in the important case of Lewis v. Bourbon county. The amount of the securities which this decision affects, is shown by the report of the auditor of state, just printed. He gives in tabular form the amount of county, city, and township indebtedness, from which it appears that $6,941,816 are county bonds, $2,360,199 are city, and $1,447,430 are township. The bonds issued in aid of railroads are $7,550,256; for bridges, $1,057,550; for other purposes, $2,141,639; total, $10,749,165. The actual debt is $13,379,775; namely, state, $701,745; municipal, $10,749,445; school, $1,928,585.

Extension of Time for Completion of the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad.

In the Senate of the United States on the 11th inst., Senator RAMSEY introduced the following bill for an extension of time to the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad company for the completion of the roads, which was read twice and referred to the committee on public lands:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That the time for the completion of the railroad from St. Anthony to Brainerd, in the state of Minnesota, as now limited by law, and of the railroad from St. Cloud to St. Vincent, in said state, as now located, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be extended for the period of eighteen months from the time limited by the acts of congress relating to the same, respectively, and if completed within said eighteen months, the said railroads shall be entitled to all the benefits of the several provisions of the acts of congress relating thereto, in the same manner as if said roads had been fully completed within the time therein limited.

This is the road for which the circuit court of the United States for Minnesota appointed a receiver to borrow money to build the extension lines, in order to save the land grant from lapsing (2 Dillon C. C. R. 248); but whose operations were interfered with by the financial panic which soon afterwards occurred. The Dutch bondholders, who have put some $15,000,000 of money into the enterprise, and the value of whose security depends so largely upon the land grant, upon the faith of which they advanced their money, would seem to have an exceptionally strong equity for the relief which the bill proposes to give them.

Bankruptcy Act—Fraudulent Preference—Lien of Execution Levied Before Bankruptcy Proceedings Commenced.

On the 22d day of December, the Supreme Court of the United States pronounced a very important decision under the bankruptcy act, in the case of Wilson, assignee in bankruptcy of Vanderhoff Bros., against the City Bank of St. Paul, upon a certificate of division from the circuit court of Minnesota.

In this case, Vanderhoff Bros., owing the bank, suffered their entire stock of goods to be seized on execution on a judgment by default obtained against them by the bank, and thus, as alleged, they fraudulently preferred the bank over other creditors, against the provisions of the bankrupt act, and the assignee sought to have the proceeds of the sale on execution applied in the claims of all the creditors. The case in the court below is reported in 1 Dillon C. C. R., p. 476, under the name of Vanderhoff's assignee v. City Bank, where the leading facts will be found stated.

On these facts the following questions arose, on which the court divided, and they were certified to this court for answer:

1. Whether or not an intention on the the part of the firm to suffer their property to be taken on execution, with intent to give a preference to the bank, or with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act, can be inferred from the facts stated.

2. Whether, under the facts, the bank in their proceedings had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended by the firm.

3. Whether, under the circumstances, the bank obtained by the levy and execution a valid lien on the goods as against the assignee in bankruptcy.

We have not yet received an authenticated copy of the opinion of the Supreme Court, but they are reported to have said, that in their opinion, something more than the passive non-resistance of the insolvent debtor to regular judicial proceedings, in which a judgment and execution are had when the debt is due, and he is without just defence to the action, is necessary to show a preferment of a creditor, or a purpose to defeat or delay the operations of the bankrupt act; that the fact that the debtor under such circumstances does not file a petition in bankruptcy, is not sufficient evidence of such preference, or desire to defeat the operations of the act; that though the judgment creditor in such a case may know the insolvent condition of the debtor, his levy and seizure are not void under the circumstances, nor any violation of the bankrupt law; that a lien thus obtained by him, will not be displaced by subseqent proceedings in bankruptcy against a debtor, though within four months of the filing of the bill. These propositions require the questions certified to be answered—the first two in the negative, and the third in the affirmative. This decision is supposed to overrule, or largely qualify, what was said by Justice CLIFFORD, in delivering the opinion of the Court, in the case of Buchanan v. Smith, reported in 16 Wall. 277. Evidently the opinion in this case is of great moment, in fixing the scope of the bankrupt act, and particularly of the thirty-fifth section; and on the assumption that the views of the Supreme Court are correctly indicated above, its judgment will somewhat surprise those who have derived their notions upon the subject of illegal preferences under the act, from the opinions of the district, and even the circuit courts, upon the subject. We shall place before our readers at an early day, the text of this important and, doubtless, well-considered opinion.

Digitized by Google

Railway Aid Bonds.

WILLIAM J. LEWIS v COMMISSIONERS OF BOURBON COUNTY.

Supreme Court of Kansas, Nov. 15, 1873.

SAMUEL A. KINGMAN, Chief Justice.
DAVID J. BREWER, D. M. VALENTINE. } Associate Justices.

1. Contracts — Province of Courts.—It is not the province of courts to make contracts between parties, but only to enforce contracts already made.

2. Principal and Agent—Estoppel.— A principal is not bound by the acts of his agent, unless authorized, or unless his own acts and representations estop him from denying the authority.

3. County Bonds — Justice to Tax-payers.— In controversies between a county and the holder of its supposed securities, good faith to the tax-payers requires that no charge be left on his property unless legally placed there, and that no contract be enforced unless legally made.

4. Issuing Bonds and Subscribing Stock — Form of Proceeding.— The form of proceeding in the submission of the question, of subscribing stock and issuing bonds to a railroad corporation, are designed as a protection to the tax-payers; and a due observance of those forms is essential to valid action.

5. To Whom issued—Corporation Must be in Existence.—Under the act of 1866, an existing corporation must be named as the recipient of the proposed subscription and bonds; and a submission of the question of issuing bonds to "any corporation now organized, or that hereafter be organized," that shall construct a certain line of roads, is unauthorized and void.

6. Power to Subscribe construed Strictly.—The grant of power to a municipality, to subscribe to the stock of a private corporation, is the delegation of an extraordinary power, and should not be extended beyond the fair import of the words used.

7. Necessity of Legislative Sanction.—Without legislative sanction, the assent of a majority of the voters would not authorize a municipality to make such a subcription.

8. Nature of the Authority Given by the Statute.—The authority given by the statute is not to give so much or pledge so much for the construction of a railroad, but to take so much stock in a railroad corporation.

9. Election on Question of Subscription—Canvassing Vote.—The statute does not make the county commissioners the canvassing officers, nor designate the time and place of making the canvass of votes cast at an election held on the question of subscribing of stock in a railroad corporation.

10. Majority of Votes—Condition Precedent.—A majority of the votes cast at such election is a condition precedent to the vesting of any authority in the commissioners to make the subscription.

11. Result of Election — Fraudulent Canvass — Returns from uncounted Townships are Notice to the World—Where the commissioners omit to prescribe by order the time and place of making the canvass, and where a majority of the votes cast are against the proposition, a canvass made by the commissioners which shows a majority in favor of the proposition, when the canvass appears upon its face to be partial and not to include the returns from some townships, does not conclude the county, as to the vesting of authority in the commissioners, and is notice sufficient to put every one on enquiry as to the actual state of the vote; and when the returns from the uncounted townships are filed in the county clerk's office, on the very day after the canvass, and are placed with the other returns, and so remain, every one is charged with notice of the actual result of the election.

12. Statute Construed—Curative Act of 1868.—The curative act of 1868, applied only to cases where "a majority of the persons voting" voted in favor of the subscription. It aimed to sustain, not to defeat, the will of the majority.

13. Statute Construed—Question of Subscribing Stock to two or more Corporations.—The statute does not authorize the submission to a single vote, of the question of subscribing stock and issuing bonds to two or more corporations. The question of making the subscription to each corporation, must be submitted separately.

14. No Recitals in Bonds—Holders Chargeable with Notice of Court Records.—Where bonds purporting to have been issued by a county, contain no recitals of an election, or of proceedings and orders of the county board, but are naked promises to pay, every purchaser and holder of these securities, is chargeable with notice of whatever appears upon the face of the county records.

15. The Same—Want of Authority shown by County Records a Defence.—If, in such case, it appears upon the face of the county records, that the commissioners had no authority to issue the bonds, the county may avail itself of that want of authority, as a defence to an action even of a bona fide holder.

16. Holder chargeable with Notice of Record referred to in Law.—Where a bond or other instrument purports to have been issued by virtue of a certain order, named and referred to, but not copied or described, every one claiming any rights by virtue of that bond or instrument, is chargeable with notice of the contents of the order.

17. Holder Chargeable with Notice of what Appears on Public Records.—Purchasers of negotiable paper issued by an agent, the nature and extent of whose authority must by law appear upon the face of the public records, are chargeable with notice of whatever appears upon those records.

All the justices concurring in the above syllabus.

BREWER, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an application to this court for a writ of mandamus, commanding the levy of a tax to pay the coupons on certain bonds issued by the county of Bourbon to the Tebo and Neosho Railroad Company, and by it sold and transferred to the plaintiff. Two questions exist and are discussed by counsel in their briefs with great ability. First, Had the commissioners the authority to issue these bonds? and, Second, If not, can this want of authority be set up as a defence to an action by the present plaintiff, who claims as a bona fide holder for value?

The material facts are these: On the 8th of March, 1867, without any prior petition therefor, the county commissioners of Bourbon county, ordered "that an election be called on the first Tuesday in May, 1867, for the purpose of submitting the question of voting $150,000 to any railroad running east to connect with the Tebo and Neosho railroad, as per order published." The order published proposed to subscribe $150,000 "to the capital stock of any railroad company now organized, or that shall hereafter be organized, that shall construct a railroad commencing at a point on the Tebo and Neosho railroad, running westward via Fort Scott, and that the bonds of said county be issued to said company for the same." On the 10th of May thereafter, being the Friday next succeeding the first Tuesday of May, the commissioners' record shows a canvass of the votes. In this canvass appears in one column the names of the townships, and in columns opposite the number of votes for and against the proposition. The columns are added and show 468 votes for the bonds, and 442 against. Then follows this recital: "Majority for bonds, 26 votes. And it was declared that there was a majority of twenty-six votes cast for railroad bonds. And, it is also further certified, that there was no evidence of an election having been held in the township of Franklin and Walnut." This record is not signed by the commissioners, nor attested by the clerk. The poll-book from Franklin township was filed in the county clerk's office on that day, placed with the poll books from the other townships, and has been there kept ever since. It appears, however, from the testimony, that it did not reach the county clerk's office, and was not filed, until after the commissioners had left the office. This poll book showed 4 votes for, and 134 against the proposition, which, with the votes already counted, would make a majority of 104 against the bonds.

Digitized by Google

On the 23d of July, 1869, more than two years after this election, the record of the commissioners shows that application was made by the officers of the Tebo and Neosho railroad for a subscription to the capital stock of that company in pursuance of this vote, and that the board resolved that it was not advisable then to make the subscription. At the same time, an order was made, submitting to the voters the question of issuing bonds to a company building a road west from Fort Scott. At the close of that order appears the following recital: "And, whereas, some question has arisen as to the propriety and legality of subscribing the stock and issuing the bonds provided for by the election of the 7th of May, A. D., 1867, to the Tebo and Neosho railroad; and, whereas, it is considered that the foregoing order, in addition to the one affirmed on the 7th of May, 1867, aforesaid, will be generally satisfactory to the people of this county: It is therefore ordered and provided, that the decision of this question by the qualified voters of said county, at the said election, in favor of such subscription, shall be also a decision in favor of the former subscription of the 7th of May, 1867, being made at once to the Tebo and Neosho Railroad company, and the Board of Commissioners will accordingly, in such case, make the subscription authorized by said election of May 7th, 1867, and will issue the bonds therein provided for, as soon as the terms and conditions of said subscription are complied with by said railroad company." A canvass of the votes cast at this election, showed 1428 votes for, and 703 against the proposition. This result was declared by the canvassers, and thereafter the bonds were issued, and for value transferred to the plaintiff.

Upon these facts, four questions are raised as to the authority of the commissioners to issue these bonds:

1. Was the presentation of a petition signed by one-fourth of the qualified voters a condition precedent to any action by the commissioners, and without which no power to issue bonds passed to the county authorities?

2. Did the failure to name the railroad corporation avoid the whole proceedings? Or, as counsel have stated the question in their brief, could a subscription be made to the stock of the Tebo and Neosho Railroad Company under and by virtue of the order of March 8th, 1867, and the vote of May 7th, 1867, that corporation not being named as the recipient of the proposed subscription? This question is discussed more fully by counsel in a case submitted subsequent to this, that of the Missouri River, Fort Scott and Gulf railroad company v. Miami County, and we may have occasion to refer to the briefs and arguments in that case.

3. A majority of votes having been cast, as a matter of fact, against the proposition, were the county Board authorized to subscribe the stock and issue the bonds.

4. If no authority existed therefor, did the proceedings of July 23d, 1869, and the subsequent vote, confer authority?

Before noticing these specific questions, it may be proper to consider an argument which is often used in cases of this kind and pressed with great force and ability by counsel in this,—the argument of good faith. The county gave the bonds to obtain the road; it has obtained the road; therefore, in good faith, it should pay the bonds. The company has fully complied with its contract; the county ought to do the same. The public conscience is weakened, and public morals suffer whenever a municipality avoids its contract through any technicality. Credit is shaken and confidence undermined whenever promises to pay are repudiated. Considerations of this kind, however, appropriate for individual consciences and as a guide to individual action, can never overthrow settled rules of law. A party may have given to another his note; every consideration of honor and good faith may demand that he pay it; but if suit be not brought till five years from its maturity have passed, and the statute of limitations be pleaded, the courts must sustain the o when so connected with other considerations as to present a case of equitable estoppel, that the courts can interfere. Courts will never make a contract, because they think the parties ought to have made one. Again, in cases like this, the bondholder is not the only party who can rightly press the demands of good faith. The tax-payer is entitled to equal consideration. He is guaranteed protection in property as well as person. He may not be heard in the courts to restrain the issue of these securities. If the authorities, through stupidity or collusion, are placing a burden upon his estate, he is powerless to prevent it. Craft v. Jackson County Commissioners, 5 Kansas, 518. A new election may enable him to change these officials, but the wrong is already done. He has a right, then, in the name of good faith, to demand of the courts that no charge shall be left on his property unless legally placed there, and that no contract shall stand, unless legally made. More than that he has no right to ask; less than that he ought not to receive. True, he is not a nominal party to this action, but he is the real party in interest. The simple enquiry, then, in cases of this kind, should be, whether the forms of law have been so far complied with, that a valid contract has been made. It they have, then the contract should be sustained, and the bondholder have his judgment. If they have not, then the county should have judgment. No considerations of supposed good faith will justify a court in making and then enforcing a contract between the parties. As protection to the tax-payers, the law has prescribed certain forms of proceeding that nothing be done without their consent. These forms are all the protection the tax-payer has; and it is only by insisting on an observance of these forms as a condition of valid action, that any security is offered him. If they are to be frittered away by judicial sanction, it were better to dispense with them altogether, and give the authority to the commissioners to act without the delay and expense of first consulting the voters.

We shall not stop to discuss the first question raised; simply saying, that if this were the only objection, we should deem it cured by the act of 1868 (Gen. Stat., p. 892).

No corporation was named in the proceedings of March, 1867, as the recipient of the proposed subscription and bonds. The proposition in effect was, whether authority should be granted to the commissioners to take stock in any corporation now organized, or that might hereafter be organized, that should construct a railroad from the Tebo and Neosho railroad westward via Fort Scott. That a vote authorizing a subscription to one corporation will not sustain a a subscription to another, even though the latter build the very line of road contemplated by the former, and sought to be secured by the vote, is settled. St. Joe & D. C. R. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Nemaha County, 11 Kas. See also Marsh v. Fulton county, 10 Wall. 676. The question now is, whether, under the statute, the people must select the corporation, or may they delegate authority to the commissioners to make the selection. The statute reads, "That the board of county commissioners of any county to, into, through, from, or near which, whether in this or any other state, any railroad is or may be located, may subscribe to the capital stock of any such railroad corporation, in the name and for the benefit of such county, not exceeding in amount ———, but no such bonds shall be issued until the question shall be first submitted to a vote of the qualified electors of the county," etc. This statute grants to the commissioners an extraordinary power. The constitutionality of such legislation has been questioned, though sustained. Its wisdom has been denied, even where its constitutionality has been sustained. To prevent abuse of this power, a specific, express authority from the voters is required. The manner of proceeding to obtain this authority is prescribed. Without legislative sanction, the assent of a majority of the voters would not bind the county, nor make valid, bonds issued in pursuance thereof. Pendleton county v. Amy, 13 Wall. 304. The assent of a majority binds defence. Mere good faith will never give a cause of action; it is the county no further than the legislature has provided it shall. And a statutory power so liable to abuse, should not, by construction, be enlarged beyond the plain warrant of the language used by the legislature. What is the county board empowered to do? It may make a subscription to the capital stock of a railroad corporation. A subscription is a contract. A contract requires two parties. There can be no subscription of stock without a corporation to receive the subscription. The county was not authorized to pledge its funds to aid in building a railroad. It could not bind itself to give so much for a road. The railroad project might be aided, it is true, but only by virtue of the fact that the corporation had obtained a responsible subscriber for a large amount of its stock. But before the board could make a subscription to the capital stock of any railroad corporation, the question must first be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors. What question? Manifestly the question of making the subscription—entering into the contract with the railroad corporation. The whole question, not a fragment of it—the question of authority to make the contract, not a contract. The whole authority delegated to the board by the first clause of the section, rests upon the expressed assent of the voters. It is an entire thing—the consummation of a contract—and to it as an entirety the people must assent. It may be said that the language used contemplates the submission of only the question of issuing bonds. "No such bonds shall be issued until the question shall be first submitted." "If a majority of the votes cast at such election shall be in favor of issuing such bonds, the board of commissioners," etc. But the issue of bonds is the last act of the board—the consummation of the contract. Bonds are to issue only in payment of stock already subscribed. If the language limits the question to that of issuing bonds, it limits it to that which implies a subscription already made—a contract already entered into—and therefore, an existing and named corporation, the recipient of the subscription and the party to the contract.

Digitized by Google

In the arguments made in the case of the Missouri River Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad company v. Miami county, to which we referred, some stress is placed upon the use of the verbs "is or may be," in the first sentence of the section, which authorize the commissioners of any county, "to, into, through, from, or near, which any railroad is or may be located, to subscribe to the capital stock of any such railroad corporation," and it is claimed that "is" is used in a continuing sense, and refers, not to the time of the passage of the law, but to the time of making the subscription, and that, therefore, the addition of the words, "may be" contemplates a location subsequent to the subscription. In support of that claim, the case of James v. City of Milwaukee, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and reported in Chicago Legal News, of Feb. 22d, 1873, is cited. It is unnecessary to determine whether the citation supports the construction, or whether the construction is correct. For the corporation must exist before it can locate its road, and all that such construction would warrant is, that the subscription might be made, and, therefore, might be authorized, before the corporation had finally located its road, and not that it might be authorized before any corporation existed. The citation might be pertinent, and the construction demand examination, if the language had been "any railroad corporation which is, or may be organized."

It may be asked, what difference does it make? The thing to be secured is the railroad, and if that be accomplished, it is enough. We reply, the legislature has not authorized counties to give their bonds, simply to secure railroads; it has authorized them to take stock in railroad corporations, and pay for it in bonds. It makes the same difference to a county that it does to an individual, as to the corporation in which stock is proposed to be taken. The county, like an individual, might be willing to take $150,000 of stock in a corporation, whose capital stock was only $250,000, thereby securing the control of the corporation, while it might not be willing to subscribe a like amount or any amount to one whose capital stock was $10,000,000, in whose control it would thus have little voice. Again it might be willing to subscribe to and risk its funds with a corporation whose managers were men of known good character and financial responsibility, and not be willing to do the same with one whose controlling men were wholly irresponsible. The fairness and good sense of the legislation is altogether on the side of the construction, which the natural meaning of the language so plainly demands. It seems, therefore, that some corporation must be named as the recipient of the subscription and bonds, or the proceedings will be without warrant of law and void.

A majority of the votes cast at the election of 1867, were against subscribing stock and issuing bonds. This is an undisputed fact. The statute reads, "If a majority of the votes cast at such election shall be in favor of issuing such bonds, the board of commissioners of the county shall issue the same." Laws 1866, page 73, § 1. That an election is a prerequisite to the issue of bonds, is unquestioned. Equally clear is it, that at such election a majority of the votes must be in favor of the issue. Power to issue is not vested in the commissioners by virtue of their office, but given only by express authority of the voters. Issuing bonds without a vote, is no more ultra vires, than issuing them against the vote of a majority. Express authority by an affirmative vote, is a condition precedent to the existence of the power. These general propositions will not be disputed, and if the commissioners had at their meeting, on May 10th, 1867, canvassed the entire vote of the county, and declared the result in accordance therewith, (namely, a majority of 104 against the proposition), no one would be foolhardy enough to claim that the commissioners had any power to issue these bonds, given by that election. It is claimed, however, that the commissioners were the proper canvassing officers; that at the legal time and place they made the canvass and declared the result, and that the county is bound thereby. It must be conceded that this claim finds ample support in the language of some of the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States. That tribunal has uniformly held that the determination of the county board was the adjudication of a competent tribunal, with full jurisdiction, and cut off all enquiry as to the facts upon which the determination, at least after the bonds had passed into the hands of a bona fide holder, was based. In the case of the commissioners of Knox county v. Aspinwall, 21 Howard, 539, Mr. Justice NELSON thus stated the proposition in his usual clear and forcible language: "Full power is conferred upon the board, to subscribe for the stock and issue the bonds, when a majority of the voters of the county have determined in favor of the subscription, after due notice of the time and place of election. The case assumes that the requisite notices were not given of the election, and hence that the vote has not been in conformity with the law. This would seem to be decisive, against the authority on the part of the board to issue the bonds, were it not for a question that underlies it; and that is, who is to determine whether or not the election has been properly held, and a majority of the votes of the county cast, in favor of the subscription? Is it to be determined by the court in this collateral way, in every suit upon the bond or coupon attached, or by the board of commissioners as a duty imposed upon it, before making the subscription? The court is of the opinion that the question belonged to this board. The act makes it the duty of the sheriff, to give the notices of the election for the day mentioned, and then declares if a majority of the votes given, shall be in favor of the subscription; the county board shall subscribe the stock. The right of the board to act in an execution of the authority, is placed upon the fact that a majority of the votes had been cast in favor of the subscription; and to have acted without first ascertaining it, would have been a clear violation of duty; and the ascertainment of the fact, was necessarily left to the enquiry and judgment of the board itself, as no other tribunal was provided for the purpose. This board was one, from its organization and general duties, fit and competent to be the depository of the trust thus confided to it. The persons composing it were elected by the county, and it was already invested with the highest functions concerning its general police and fiscal interests. We do not say that the decision of the board would be conclusive in a direct proceeding to enquire into the facts previously to the execution of the power, and before the rights and interests of third parties had attached; but, after the authority had been executed, the stock subscribed, the bonds issued and in the hands of innocent holders, it would be too late, even in a direct proceeding, to call it in question. Much less can it be called in question to the prejudice of a bona fide holder of the bonds in this collateral way." We have made this lengthy quotation, because it contains as clear and complete a statement of the views therein expressed, as can anywhere be found; and also, because it is from the leading case in that court. The views therein expressed have been uniformly adhered to by that tribunal: Bissell v. City of Jeffersonville, 24 How. 287; Moran v. Miami county, 2 Black, 722; Gelpcke, v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175; Mercer county v. Hacket, 1 Wall. 83; Van Hostrup v. Madison city, 1 Wall. 291; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 772; Pendleton county, v. Amy, 13 Wall. 297; City of Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 283. It will be observed that this language does not affirm that the determination of the county commissioners gives authority to issue bonds, but only that that determination estops the county from denying the authority. All that is asserted and all that can be found in any of the opinions is, that that determination is evidence of authority otherwise given — evidence that is conclusive in an action by a bona fide holder. It is like other canvass-evidence — nothing but evidence of facts already done, and power already given. It is by universal consent, open to enquiry and attack, unless made conclusive by statute, until, at least, rights have been vested on the faith thereof. It is no more potent to confer authority, than a canvass of votes cast for an office, is to give a right to the office. It should not be so weighty, even as evidence; for in the one case, it is necessary that offices should be filled, and that evidence of who are entitled to fill them, should be easily accessible; while in the other, it is not necessary that county bonds should ever be issued to railroad corporations, and the people's right to control the extent of their obligations should not be frittered away, on a mere matter of evidence. The substantial question is, did a majority of the voters grant the authority? the formal question, what does the canvass show? Reverse the status, for a moment, and suppose the canvass showed a majority of 26 votes against, while an actual majority of 104 votes was in favor of the proposition. Would not the authority to issue, pass to the commissioners, and could there be any question, but that bonds thus issued, even in the hands of the obligee himself, could be enforced. "If a majority of the votes cast at such election," is the language of the statute. Can the commissioners by a canvass destroy the power of the majority, and set at naught the will of the legislature? Can they in defiance of the statute, create an authority in themselves? It was well said by the supreme court of Ohio in State ex rel. Treadwell v. The Commisioners, etc., 11 Ohio State, 183: "The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States must rest on the assumption that it was competent for the commissioners of Knox county by some act of their own, to make their authority complete — an assumption we are not at liberty to make in this case." In that case, the county commissioners of any county, through or in which a railroad might be located by any corporation, were by statute authorized to subscribe stock and issue bonds. Under this statute, bonds were issued and passed into the hands of a bona fide holder. In a mandamus proceeding thereon, the answer alleged that the railroad had never been located through or in the county, and this answer was held good, and in holding it good, the court used the language above quoted. Starin v. the Town of Genoa, 23, N. Y. 439; The People v. Mead, 24 N. Y., 114; The People v. Mead, 36 N. Y., 224.

Digitized by Google

[CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

The National Banks Cannot be Thrown into Bankruptcy.

IN RE MANUFACTURERS' NATIONAL BANK.

District Court of the United States, for the Northern District of Illinois, Chicago, December 30, 1873.

Hon. HENRY W. BLODGETT, District Judge.

1. National Banks—Bankruptcy.—A national bank cannot be proceeded against under the bankrupt law: if insolvent, it can only be wound up in the mode pointed out by the national currency act and its amendments.

2. Statutory Interpretation—Repeals by Implication.—A statute, although so general in its terms, that its letter would comprehend all classes of persons and things to which it can relate, will nevertheless be construed by the courts as not applying to a particular class which has been specially provided for and regulated by another statute, relating solely to such class, if there is no language in the general statute repealing the former statute, or in any manner referring to it. Thus, the bankrupt act does not repeal those provisions of the currency act and its amendments, which relate to the winding up of insolvent national banks.

3. "Act of Insolvency."—What is an "act of insolvency," within the 52d section of the currency act.

Opinion by BLODGETT, J.

On the 15th day of November last, Messrs. R. J. Smith & Co., filed in this court their petition, setting forth that they are creditors of the Manufacturers' National Bank, of this city, for money deposited with said bank in due course of business, and alleging that the said bank had suspended payment on its commercial paper for over fourteen days, and had, when insolvent, made preferential payments; for which acts they prayed that the bank be adjudged bankrupt.

Being aware that grave doubts had been expressed by many lawyers and business men, as to the application of the bankrupt law to national banks, I directed notice of the application for a rule to show cause, to be served on the officers of the bank, and have heard arguments for and against the application. While the discussion upon the question has been unusually able and exhaustive on both sides, it has not, I must confess, left my mind entirely free from doubt as to the rule to be adopted.

The law now in force for the organization and government of national banks, was enacted on the 3d of June, 1864, and has been amended by the act of Feb. 4, [10?] 1868, the act of Feb. 19, 1869, the act of July 12, 1870, and the act of March 3, 1873. embodied in the original act, are very full and ample provisions for winding up and settling the affairs of these banking associations, mainly through the federal courts. The fundamental purpose of the act and its amendments, was to provide a national currency, and ensure its prompt redemption, and, incidentally, to provide banking or fiscal agencies through which the ordinary financial business of the country could be safely transacted.

The leading features of the system were:

1. The security of the circulating notes of those banks, by the pledge of government bonds in the hands of the treasurer of the United States, and in case of the failure of the bank to redeem its notes, then redemption of those notes by the government, for which it is to be reimbursed by the proceeds of the bonds deposited and a first lien on all the assets of the bank.

2. The responsibility of the stockholders of the bank to the extent of the par value of the stock held by them respectively, in addition to the amount invested in their shares.

3. The whole system to be under the surveillance of the comptroller of the currency, with full powers to examine into the affairs of each bank, and in cases of non-compliance with the provisions of the law, to appoint a receiver to administer and wind up their affairs.

On the 2d day of March, 1867, congress passed an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and by the thirty-seventh section of said act it is declared, "that the provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed, business and commercial corporations and joint-stock companies," and by the third clause of the same section it is declared, that "all payments, conveyances and assignments, declared fraudulent and void by this act, when made by a debtor, shall in like manner, and to the like extent, and with like remedies, be fraudulent and void, when made by a corporation and company."

Digitized by Google

The forty-eighth section declares that the word "person," when used in this act, shall be held to include and mean corporations; and by the ninth clause of the thirty-ninth section, it is made an act of bankruptcy for any bank to suspend payment of its commercial paper for fourteen days.

The bankrupt law is the latest expression of the legislative will, and its general terms and provisions must be held to repeal all previous statutes necessarily incompatible with it. The question then is, does the bankrupt law repeal and supersede the provisions in the currency act for winding up the affairs of insolvent national banks? or can its provisions be applied to those corporations, and leave intact the provisions of the currency act on the same subject? There is no doubt of the soundness of the general rule of interpretation cited by the counsel for the respondent, that a statute, although so general in its terms that its letter would comprehend all classes of persons and things to which it can relate, will nevertheless be construed by the courts as not applying to a particular class, which has been specially provided for and regulated by another statute, relating solely to such class, if there is no language in the general statute repealing the former statute, or in any manner referring to it. Hume v. Gossett, 43 Ill. 297; The People ex rel. Becker v. Miner, 46 Ill. 384; Hawkins v. Gathercole, 6 De Gex M. & G. 1; Williams v. Pritchard, 2 Term R., 2. "A thing which is in the letter of a statute is not within the statute, unless it be within the intention of the makers." Bacon's Abridgment, title Statute. "When the intention of the legislature is not apparent to the purpose, the general words of another and later statute shall not repeal the particular provisions of a previous one." Dwarris on Statutes, 117, quoted from Coke. The rule is thus stated in Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law: "In regard to the mode in which laws may be repealed by subsequent legislation, it is laid down as a rule, that a general statute, without negative words, will not repeal the particular provisions of a former one, unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent. * * * The reason and philosophy of the rule is, that when the mind of the legislator has been turned to the details of a subject, and he has acted upon it, a subsequent statute in general terms, or treating the subject in a general manner, and not expressly contradicting the original act, shall not be considered as intended to affect the more particular or positive previous provisions, unless it is absolutely necessary to give the latter act such a construction, in order that its words shall have any meaning at all." Sedg. Stat. and Const. Law, 123.

The currency act provides for the appointment of a receiver to wind up the affairs of a national bank, in the following cases:

1. For not keeping good a surplus—12th section.
2. For not keeping stock at a minimum—15th section.
3. For not keeping good its reserve—31st section.
4. For not selecting a place for the redemption of its notes—32d section.
5. For holding its own stock over six months—35th section.
6. For non-payment of its circulating notes—50th section.
7. For improperly certifying a check—section 1, act March 3, 1869.
8. For failure to pay up capital stock, and for allowing same to become and remain unpaid by losses—section 1, act March 3, 1873.

Upon the happening of either of these contingencies, the comptroller may appoint a receiver to take possession of all the books, records, and assets of the corporation, who shall proceed to convert the assets into money under the direction of a court of competent jurisdiction. And the money so realized shall be paid over to the treasury of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller, who, after deducting, in full, whatever amount shall be due to the United States, shall distribute the balance exactly among the creditors of the bank. The claims of creditors to be proven before the comptroller, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction. "The application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void. And by the 48th section, it is made unlawful for any such bank, after suffering a protest of its circulating notes, and after notice from the comptroller, to, in any manner, prosecute the business of banking, except to receive and safely keep its money and deliver its special deposits. And by the 53d section, any violation of the provisions of the currency act, done knowingly, by either a bank, or its officers, or agents, works a forfeiture of all its rights and franchises, to be adjudged by a federal court at the suit of the comptroller. The 8th section provides that said corporations, i. e. national banks, "may sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity, as fully as natural persons.

And by the 57th section it is declared, that "suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this act, may be had in any circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States, held within the district in which such association be established, or in any state, county, or municipal court in the county or city, in which such association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." And by the amendment to this section made by the act of March 3, 1873, it is further provided that "no attachment, injunction, or execution shall issue against such association or its property before final judgment."

I am not aware that any adjudication has yet been made, determining what is an "act of insolvency" within the intent and meaning of the 52d section; but it seems to me to be an act which shows the bank to be insolvent; such as non-payment of its circulating notes, bills of exchange, or certificates of deposit; failure to make good the impairment of capital, or to keep good its surplus or reserve; in fact, any act which shows that the bank is unable to meet its liabilities as they mature, or to perform those duties which the law imposes for the purpose of sustaining its credit.

It will thus be seen that while the currency act does not specify in detail, and provide for all the specific acts of bankruptcy enumerated in the bankrupt law, it yet does furnish, through the functions of an important public officer—the comptroller of the currency—a very complete and detailed scheme or plan for administering the affairs of an insolvent national bank. It is true, there is no provision for an individual creditor's putting this machinery in motion. But the presumption is that congress deemed it wiser to leave this duty to an impartial public officer, rather than entrust it to the hasty, inconsiderate, and perhaps, selfish action of one or more creditors. It was probably thought that the necessity of maintaining the public confidence in the system, was such as would compel the comptroller to act in all cases when a bank had become derelict or discredited, and that this consideration, together with the clear obligations of duty, thrown upon the officer, would be sufficient to ensure his action in all cases when he acquired the right to do so. At all events, the law, as it was enacted, contained ample and specific provisions for creating and managing these corporations, and for administering their affairs, when they became unable or refused to perform their public functions.

The system has been in operation nearly ten years; over 2,000 banks have been organized under it. Of these, 21 have been wound up through the agency of the comptroller and a receiver.

Digitized by Google

The greater part of them since the enactment of the bankrupt law. All the legislation of congress has looked toward the perfecting and perpetuation of the system; and ought we now to say that congress, by the enactment of the general bankrupt law, intended to place these corporations under the provisions of that law, and to repeal the elaborate plan which it had specially furnished for winding up their affairs, when they became insolvent or incapable of transacting banking business?

That it did not intend to repeal them, is conclusively evidenced by the fact that in two of the important amendatory acts, those of March 3, 1869, and March 3, 1873, especial reference is made to those winding up provisions of the original act, and they are treated as being in full force. So, too, in several cases which have been before the supreme court since the enactment of the bankrupt law, reference has been made to these winding up powers as still in force.

It being clear, then, that congress did not intend to repeal the winding up clauses of the currency act, the question arises, Did it intend that the two remedies, that is, the one given by the currency act, and the one given by the bankrupt act, should exist as co-ordinate or concurring remedies, and the affairs of an insolvent national bank be administered by that tribunal which first acquired control?

This construction might be admitted, if the two were entirely compatible with each other, or if each was equally as complete as the other. That is, if each could reach and administer upon all the assets of the debtor bank, so as to leave nothing to be done by the other.

But we find upon examination, that the important duty of paying the holders of circulating notes, and distributing the proceeds of the bonds deposited to secure them, or the surplus of those bonds, and of enforcing the liability of stock, is left with the comptroller, and can only be enforced by or through him. This latter point was fully discussed and decided by the supreme court, in Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. 498; when it was expressly held that the comptroller alone could enforce the personal liability clause. The court says: "The receiver is the instrument of the comptroller. He is appointed by the comptroller, and the power of appointment carries with it the power of removal. It is for the comptroller to decide, when it is necessary to institute proceedings against stockholders to enforce their personal liability, and whether the whole or a part, and, if a part, how much shall be collected. The questions are referred to his judgment and discretion, and his determination is conclusive. The stockholders cannot controvert it. It is not to be questioned in the litigation that may ensue. He may make it at such times as he shall deem proper, and upon such data as shall be satisfactory to him. This action on his part is indispensable, when the personal liability of the stockholders is sought to be enforced, and must precede the institution of a suit by a receiver. * * * The claims of creditors may be proved before the comptroller, or established by suit against the association. Creditors must seek their remedy through the comptroller, in the manner prescribed by statute."

Much stress was laid by the attorneys for petitioners, upon the inadequacy of the security for creditors under the currency act, mainly because creditors could not, of their own motion, initiate winding-up proceedings; but how much more inadequate would the bankrupt law be to the same end, if it cannot reach or distribute assets, and perhaps must pay what it gets over to a government officer for distribution. I do not say that an assignee would be obliged to pay over to the treasurer, but that there is grave ground for a claim that he should do so, and that collision might grow out of such claim.

The relief which could be afforded to the creditors of a national bank, then, being so incomplete, I cannot think it was the intention of congress, to clothe bankrupt courts with jurisdiction over this class of corporations. I have already cited the evidence which shows, to my mind, that congress did not intend to repeal the winding-up provisions of the currency act, by the passage of the bankrupt law; and a comparison of the provisions of the two acts, show with equal clearness to my mind, that it did not intend to inject the provisions of the bankrupt act into the currency act, so that creditors could apply the remedies of the bankrupt act, and the comptroller the remedies of the currency act. Because such a construction would inevitably produce collision and conflicts of jurisdiction, and the remedies given by the bankrupt act would be so far unavailing in regard to important assets, as to make it evident that there was no intention to apply such a remedy. Suppose this court were to adjudge the respondent bankrupt today, and send its messenger and assignee to take possession of the assets. The officers of the court, could in no event, enforce the personal liability clause, or obtain possession of the government bonds deposited to secure the circulation, or any surplus of those bonds, after fully returning the circulation. Those assets are beyond the reach of this court or its officers, and can only be approached by the way of the comptroller and his receiver. Then why should this court take cognizance of a case it cannot administer.

Why not, rather, say congress has acted upon the subject matter of insolvent national banks and made specific provisions for administering their affairs, and inasmuch as the general bankrupt law has not expressly repealed these specific provisions, nor necessarily contradicted them, the courts will presume it is the intention of congress to except this class of corporations from the operation of the later statute. Such conclusion seems to me consistent with authority; and is, in fact, the only conclusion that will not lead to inextricable complication and conflict of authority.

But it is urged that the currency act makes these corporations liable to all suits and actions which might be brought against national banks, and that they can therefore be proceeded against in bankruptcy. A sufficient answer to this might be found in the fact, that when the currency act was passed, there was no bankrupt law in force, no bankruptcy known to the law; and therefore, the general language must be held subject to this limitation. But I take it, there is no doubt that the legislative power which creates an artificial person or corporation, can also prescribe what remedies shall be had against it, and that such remedies would be held to be exclusive, and that the provisions of the general bankrupt law would not be held to apply to corporations at all, but for the exemptions of the act. Should they then be held to apply to a class of corporations which have, as it seems, a bankrupt law of their own, original with their own constitution and part of their organic law, by the same authority which enacted the bankrupt law? I think not. Nor does it seem to me that there is any necessary hardship in denying the remedies of the bankrupt law to the creditors of this corporation. There is no evidence that either this petitioning creditor or any other creditor has applied to the comptroller to take possession and administer the assets. Additional force is also given to this consideration, from the fact that in the very latest amendment to the currency act, it is expressly provided that no attachment, injunction, or execution shall issue against a bank until judgment is obtained.

It is well known that, in many of the states, proceedings by attachment may be taken by a creditor in the first instance, and, as a matter of course, and in nearly or quite all the states, attachments can issue upon affidavits showing the existence of certain facts, while injunctions are almost universally issued before judgment or decree in equity cases, when a case is made for one. And yet these corporations are, probably for reasons of public policy, simply exempted from liability to all this class of summary proceedings. Here we have a restriction upon the powers of the bankrupt court, almost, if not wholly, incompatible with the jurisdiction. For of what use would it be to proceed in bankruptcy against a debtor, in a large number of cases, unless he could be enjoined, or his property seized by a process of attachment. Before adjudication or judgment could be obtained, the property of the debtor might be wasted or spirited away, so that the adjudication would be barren of results.

Digitized by Google

I do not say that the prohibition to enjoin or attach property, necessarily implies want of jurisdiction, but only that it goes far to show that it was never the intention of congress to clothe a bankrupt court with jurisdiction as against these corporations.

I am therefore of the opinion that the rule to show cause should be denied, and the petition dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

PETITION DISMISSED.

Supreme Court of the United States.

[We give below the proceedings had in the Supreme Court of the United States, on December 24th, in several important cases, which we take from the New York Herald. The court adjourned until January 5th. We expect to be able to give a summary of its proceedings from the 5th to the 10th of January, in our next issue.]

No. 477. Knowles v. Logansport Gaslight Company—Error to the circuit court for Minnesota.—This is an action by the company to recover on a judgment obtained in Indiana. The defence was want of jurisdiction of the person of Knowles in the Indiana case, and the return of the sheriff certifying service of summons, but not showing where it was served, having been admitted as evidence of service against defendant's objections, he brings the ruling here, and raises the following questions: Was the certificate of service properly received as evidence of jurisdiction, and, if so, can it be contradicted on the trial of the action? The further question is raised: If service is made in an action for $3,000, does that give jurisdiction to render judgment for more than that sum? Submitted under the twentieth rule. H. R. Bigelow, for plaintiff in error; F. R. E. Cornell, for defendant.

No. 169. Buckley v. United States—Appeal from the court of claims.—This is another suit for damages for an alleged violation of a contract made with the government for transportation of military stores. The court below found that the government having simply failed to produce the amount of stores for transportation which were contracted for, were not guilty of a violation of the entire scope of the contract, and therefore refused the claimant damages for the profits of the contract lost in consequence of such failure, but allowed him the amount of the expense he had incurred in preparing for the transportation. It was, however, held that he had not sufficiently proven the amount of such expense, and the bill was, therefore, dismissed. From this decision the claimant appeals, insisting that he should have damages for his loss of profits on the contract. The government submits that the decision below was correct. Durant and Homer, for the claimant; C. H. Hill, for the government.

No. 542. McCarty v. Mann et al.—Appeal from the circuit court for Minnesota.—This was an action to quiet title to certain vacant and unoccupied lands in St. Paul, brought by the appellant. The appellees claim, under a conveyance from the patentee, made prior to his patent; and as the appellant disputes the validity of the entry of the patentee, the question arises whether an act of congress reinstating an entry made by the patentee, which had been cancelled by the commissioner of the general land office, so that the title in said lands may inure to the benefit of his grantees, so far as he may have conveyed the same, is such a recognition and ratification of the original entry as will sustain the title of his grantees, made in pursuance of such entry, and which is in the appellees. The appellant maintains that the patentee had no title until after his entry under the special act, and that if this be so, he (appellant) has the better title, derived from the grantees, who took from him immediately thereafter, and that the act did not renew an old title in the patentee, but created a new one. Submitted under the twentieth rule. W. P. Clough, for appellant; H. I. Horn, for appellees.

No. 134. Sohn v. Waterson et al.—Error to the circuit court for the district of Kansas.—This was an action on a judgment recovered in Ohio against the defendants, in 1854. The defence was the statute of limitations of the territory of Kansas (the defendant Waterson being, when the suit was brought, and the act was passed, a resident there), passed in 1859, providing that all actions founded on contracts, notes, bonds, judgments, etc., upon which liability accrued beyond the limits of the territory, should be commenced within two years next after the cause of action accrued. The plaintiff replied that the statute did not apply to his case, because it was passed after his cause of action accrued. The court held, that, as Waterson was a resident of Kansas, when the territorial act went into operation, the limitation began to run from that period, and that, as the action was not commenced within two years after, it could not be sustained. This judgment is sustained here, the court holding that the act was prospective in its operation, and affected existing causes of action only from the time of its passage. Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion.

No. 576. Sawyer v. Hoag—Appeal from the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois.—In this case it is held that a debtor of an insolvent cannot purchase claims against his creditor, having full knowledge of the insolvency, and have them set off at their full value against his indebtedness to the insolvent, and the decree below enforcing the same view is affirmed. Sawyer subscribed to the capital stock of the Lumberman's Insurance company, upon an understanding that 85 per cent. would be loaned back to him upon a secured note for the amount. The insurance company becoming insolvent after the great fire in Chicago, Sawyer bought up adjusted claims against the company and sought to have them set off against his indebtedness on the note. The decision treats him as an ordinary debtor of the company, and holds that the set off cannot be allowed. Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion. This decision also disposes of cases 579, Jaegar v. Voeke, and 580, Meyer v. Voeke, and the decrees in those cases are affirmed.

No. 165. Solomons v. the United States—Appeal from the court of claims.—Solomons was under a contract with the government to furnish a certain quantity of corn within a certain time, and delivered about three-fourths of it within the time fixed. Subsequently, a quartermaster agreed to accept a further quantity under the contract if delivered within another limited time. The amount was delivered and a voucher given. A part of it was used and a part damaged while lying in the fort. The department, subsequently, refused to pay for the portion not used, on the ground that the contract had expired and could not be extended by verbal agreement. The voucher was accordingly reduced, and payment tendered and declined. The court below sustained the department, and its judgment is here reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to enter a judgment for the amount of the voucher, the court finding that the time was extended verbally, and that such agreement was valid. Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion.

No. 480. Town of Ohio v. Marcy—Error to circuit court for the northern district of Illinois.—This was an action on municipal bonds issued by the town, and the defence was that they were not issued by the road for which the subscription was made, but to a consolidated road subsequently chartered. The judgment on the facts found was for the holder of the bonds, and the case was brought here for review; but the court say that the question of law raised is not presented in the record, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed. Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion.

Notes of Recent Decisions.

Creditor's Bill; Burden of Proof to show Insolvency.—In an action by a creditor for the purpose of subjecting property in the hands of a donee to the payment of his claim, it being made to appear that the debt was contracted by the donor prior to the making of the gift, the burden of showing the solvency of the debtor at the time of making the gift, rests upon the defendant. Oliver v. Moore, 23 Ohio State, 473.

Legacy; Interest.—Where a bequest of a certain sum of money is made, and time of payment is fixed, the same does not bear interest until the time of payment, except where the law infers an intention to pay interest from the relation of the testator to the legatee. Page's Appeal, 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 402.

———; ———. This inference does not arise from the relation of god-mother and god-daughter. Ibid.

———; ———. But where a trustee or executor is put in charge of a special fund for a legatee to manage for his benefit, his right to the product of the fund may be inferred from the fact of its being so set apart for him. Ibid.

Digitized by Google

Confusion of Materials; Cheese Factory; Interest subject to Execution.—Baxter and numerous other farmers delivered milk to a cheese factfactory; each was credited with the amount of his milk, and all was manufactured together; the company sold all the cheese; each farmer was charged with the expense, and received his share of the proceeds in proportion to the milk furnished; Baxter's interest in the cheese, etc., was sold under an execution against him. Held, that the sale by the factory converted his interest into a money demand, and this interest was, therefore, not the subject of a levy. The arrangement at the factory did not constitute the farmers partners nor tenants in common in the cheese; nor was there an agency or bailment as to the particular milk delivered. It was a sale of milk to be paid for in a certain time and manner. Butterfield v. Lathrop, 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 225.

Levy upon Real Estate; Inquisition; Deputy Sheriff.—The holding of an inquisition upon real estate levied under a fieri facias, is a judicial act, involving an exercise of discretion. The sheriff cannot, therefore, perform it through his deputy. Haberstroh v. Toley, Com. Pleas of Luzerne county, Penn. Reported, Pittsburgh Legal Journal, Dec. 10, 1873.

Trespass for Mesne Profits; Abatement.—Under the Pennsylvania statute of Feb. 24, 1834, § 28, trespass for mesne profits does not abate by the death of the defendant in ejectment, but survives against his personal representatives. Arundel v. Springer, 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 398.

———; Joint and several Liabilities.—Where trespass for mesne profits is brought against two, and one pays a certain sum in settlement, and a nol. pros. is entered as to him, this does not discharge the other defendant. Ibid.

State Insolvent Laws; Bankruptcy; Discharge of Sureties.—A debtor arrested under the Pennsylvania act of July 14, 1842, gave bond pending his application to be discharged as an insolvent. He appeared, and the hearing was continued from time to time, and whilst the proceeding was pending, he was adjudged a bankrupt in the federal court. Held, that the condition of his bond was discharged and the sureties released. The adjudications in bankruptcy suspended the operation of the state insolvent laws. Barber v. Rogers, 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 362.

Landlord and Tenant; Liability of Sureties.—A person became bound as surety for a tenant's performance of a contract of lease for one year, the rent payable monthly, and if the tenant held over after the time, the contract to continue for another year. Held, that if the tenant held beyond the expiration of the first year, the surety was bound for the subsequent rent. Coe v. Vodges, 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 383.

———; ———. That the premises were in an untenantable condition was no defence to the surety, the tenant having continued in possession. Ibid.

———; ———. The surety being informed by the landlord that the tenant was in arrears, gave him notice that he would not be further liable, the tenant paying the arrears to that time. This did not discharge the surety. He could not, by a mere notice that he would not be liable, dissolve the contract at his pleasure. Ibid.

Sale of Land by Metes and Bounds.—A parol agreement to sell 90 acres of land at $3.50 per acre, to begin on a certain line at a point named, "and go to the creek," makes the creek one of the boundaries; and the vendee must pay for the land within the enclosure, whether there be more than 90 acres or not. Ardery v. Rowles, 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 359.

Insurance; "Binding Receipt;" Contract with Broker.—An insurance company had a condition in their policies, that "no insurance proposed is to be considered in force until the premium is actually paid." Marland employed an insurance broker to effect an insurance; he prepared the application which was accepted by the company, who delivered him a "binding receipt," and afterwards the policy. Marland said to the broker it was not convenient to pay then, but if he was not safe he would get the money; the broker said he would be safe for thirty days; he showed Marland the policy, who asked him to keep it; the property was burned; the policy not having been delivered to Marland, nor the premium paid by him or the broker. Held, that the company was not liable. By giving the policy and receipt to the broker, the company gave him no authority to deliver them without payment of the premium, and his agreeing to give Marland credit, created no contract with the company. Payment was the consideration which gave life to the contract of insurance. Marland v. The Royal Insurance Co., 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 393.

Insurance of Mortgage Interest; Assignment of Policy.—An insurance was made to T., who gave a mortgage to W. T. assigned his policy to W. as security to W., who assigned to E. T. afterwards conveyed the property insured to C., and assigned him the policy; the insurance company refused to approve the assignment. E. afterwards became the owner of W.'s mortgage, and the company insured his interest as mortgagee. By the policy, on payment of a loss the mortgagee was to assign the mortgage to the company. The property was burned, and E. received the amount of his insurance, and assigned the mortgage to the company. Held, that the assignment was properly made; that T. had no claim upon the money paid for the loss, and that the company might recover from T. the amount due on the mortgage. Thornton v. Enterprise Ins. Co., 71 Penn. State, (21 P. F. Smith) 234.

1. Equitable Mortgage; Vendor's Lien.—Where a person purchases land, pays part of the purchase money in cash, and executes a note for the balance, together with a paper in the nature of a mortgage, but which is not sealed and not acknowledged according to law,—held, that such informal mortgage amounts simply to an acknowledgement that the vendor retains a lien on the land for the payment of the unpaid purchase money. Gill v. Blair, Sup. Court Mo., Oct. Term, 1873.

———; ———; Notice; Subsequent Purchaser.—A subsequent purchaser from the vendee, who has notice in fact of such lien, takes the land subject to the same. Ibid.

Practice of Supreme Court of Missouri; Non-suit.—In equitable actions the plaintiff cannot bring his cause before the supreme court for revision on the merits by taking a non-suit, and then appealing from the order of the circuit court refusing to set it aside; but there must be an adjudication in the circuit court on the facts and law, in order to allow the supreme court to pass upon them on appeal or writ of error. Ibid.

Practice of Supreme Court in Equity Cases.—In equity suits, the supreme court will examine the evidence, and decide the case according to the preponderance of testimony, and the law arising thereon. Ibid.

Conflict of Laws; Right of a Legatee residing in one State to sue in the Courts of Another.—A legatee residing in Kentucky, the will having been made and probated there, may maintain an action in the courts of Missouri against a person residing here, for a sum of money had and received of his testator, the title to which passed to him by the terms of the will, provided there are no creditors of the estate here. It is not necessary that the will should be proved in this state, in order to support such an action. Morton v. Hatch, Sup. Court Mo., Oct. Term, 1873.

Liability of Sureties who Sign Conditionally.—In Ayers v. Milroy, determined in the supreme court of Missouri, November 3, 1873, the oft-recurring question of the liability of a person who signs a bond or note as surety, upon condition that the signature of a certain other person as surety shall also be obtained, was presented for consideration. In this case, the instrument in question was a non-negotiable promissory note. WAGNER, J., said: "In a case of negotiable or commercial paper, it is very clear that the defence would not be held good. In a suit upon a note of that character, it was expressly held by this court, in the Bank v. Phillips, 17 Mo. 29, that it was no defence for an endorser who was sued upon a note, that he endorsed it on the express condition that it should also be endorsed by another person, where it did not appear that the plaintiff knew of the condition. In making this line of defence, there is a clear distinction recognized between bonds or other instruments that are not negotiable, and those which are negotiable. The question here presented has often been before the courts, and the almost universal holding has been, that where a bond or other instrument for the payment of money is executed by a surety, on condition that another person shall also sign it as surety, and if not so signed, then the principal obligor shall not deliver it, and if the obligor does deliver it in pursuance of this agreement, then the surety who signed it will not be bound."

Digitized by Google

In support of this rule the learned judge cited and reviewed the following cases: State v. Sandusky, 46 Mo. 377 Cutter v. Whittemore, 10 Mass. 442; Linn County v. Farris, 52 Mo. 75; Lovett v. Adams, 3 Wend. 380; Bronson v. Noyes, 7 Wend. 188; Leaf v. Gibbs, 4 Car. & Pay. 466; Perry v. Patterson, 5 Humph. 133; Bibb v. Reid, 3 Ala. 88; State Bank v. Evans, 3 Green (N. J.), 155; Carter v. McClintock, 29 Mo. 464; Pepper v. State, 22 Ind. 399; People v. Bostwick, 43 Barb. 9; S. C. in Court of Appeals, 32 N. Y. 445; Powling v. United States, 4 Cranch, 219; United States v. Leffler, 11 Peters, 86. And, after stating that Millet v. Parker, 2 Met. (Ky.), 608, was the only direct case he had found to the contrary, he concluded:

"The plaintiff here occupies the position of taking a security, to which the party giving it had no title. The defendant was merely a surety, and derived no benefit from the contract. If the rule of principal and agent applied, then the defendant would only be liable for such acts as he authorized. The power conferred in this case was conditional; and the condition not being performed upon which its execution depended, and, it being entirely unauthorized, the principal would not be bound. The rule is settled that an agent cannot bind a party contrary to his instructions, and a special authority must be strictly construed.

"In the case at bar, there was no delivery of the note upon which this action was brought, by the surety, who now defends. It was simply left with Jones on condition that he should not use it for the purposes intended, until after he had obtained the signature of another party. It was, therefore, incomplete, and the transaction was not consummated under such circumstances. Both upon principle and authority, the surety who signed the note is not liable until the condition is fulfilled."

The judgment below in favor of the surety was affirmed; all the judges concurring, except SHERWOOD, J., who was absent.

Suits by Corporations; Denial of Corporate Existence; Estoppel.—An important question has just been passed upon by the 5th District Court of New Orleans, CULLOM, J., in the case of the Working Men's Association Accommodation Bank v. Converse et al. We are indebted to John H. New, Esq., of counsel for defendants, for a copy of the opinion of Judge CULLOM, which, owing to its length, we regret that we are not able to publish in full. The bank brought suit on the bond of Converse, its general book-keeper, praying for judgment in solido against him and his sureties for certain moneys alleged to have been received by him in his character of book-keeper, and converted to his own use. The defendants filed several exceptions denying the corporate existence of the bank, or that it had any corporate existence at the date of the execution of the bond. The banking association was organized under the free banking law of Louisiana, Ray's Revised Statutes, §§ 275 et seq., which provides, among other things, that the articles of association, after being executed by a notarial act, etc., shall be published for four weeks in the official journal of the state. The articles of association of the plaintiff were not published in the official journal, but in another newspaper, the New Orleans Times. There was also a slight discrepancy (probably a typographical error) between the original instrument, and the instrument as published. Section twenty-one in the authenticated instrument, appeared as section 22 in the Times newspaper. It also appeared that the articles of association, as executed and published, made no mention of the residence of the corporators, as required by the free banking law, above named; nor did they make any mention of a corporate seal.

The question thus presented was, whether, after having in the contract sued on, recognized the corporate existence of the plaintiff, the defendants were estopped from denying it in this suit. This, the learned judge decided in the negative, after reviewing and distinguishing the following cases: United States v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. 392; Steam Navigation Company v. Weed, 17 Barbour 378; Meikel v. German Savings Fund Society, 16 Ind., 181; Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 480; Silvernagle v. Flukle, 21 La. An., 188; Dejona v. Steamboat Osceola, 17 La. An., 277; Lewis v. Homer, 23 La. An., 254; Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Horner, 17 Ohio, 407; Tarbell v. Page, 24 Ill., 46; Rice v. Rock Island Railroad Company, 21 Ill., 93; Eagle Works v. Churchill, 2 Bosworth, 166; Persse & Brooks' Paper-works v. Willett, 1 Robertson, 131.

Set off; Liquidated Demand; Demand for Conversion of Indian Trust Bonds.—A demand by the United States for the proceeds of Indian trust bonds, unlawfully converted to their own use, by persons who had illegally procured and sold them, and had afterwards become wholly insolvent, is a demand arising on an implied contract, or one which may be so treated by a waiver of the alleged fraud in the conversion of the bonds. It is, therefore, the proper subject of set-off by the United States, in a suit by the general assignees in insolvency of the parties who had thus converted the bonds to their own use, for the recovery of the price of certain property which had formerly belonged to the insolvents, and which had, by their said general assignees, been sold to the United States. The amount of the proceeds of the bonds, though not determined by judicial proceedings, was sufficiently liquidated, to be at any time the subject of set-off; since it could be stated with certainty, and interest could be computed and added. And even if, prior to the passage of the act of March 3d, 1863, amending the act establishing the court of claims, objection to the set-off existed in the fact that the demand of the United States was unliquidated, (assuming it to have been the fact), none could exist subsequently; since the fifth section of the act covers this class of demands. Allen v. United States, U. S. Sup. Court, Oct. Term, 1873.

Notices of Books and Exchanges.

The American Law Record, Cincinnati: Conducted and published by Herman M. Moos, Esq.

This is a monthly, in form and character much like the American Law Register. It is made up chiefly of decisions of various American courts, reported in full. It gives its readers, in each issue, 64 pages of reading matter, printed on small type. They thus get, in the course of the year, at a cost of $5,00, about the quantity of matter that would make three ordinary volumes of law reports. It is well printed, and its selections appear to be made with discrimination.

The Saint Louis Journal of Law: Weekly: $3 per annum. Edwards & Sage, 106 Market street, St. Louis, Mo.

The Journal of Law deserves the thanks of the bar of Missouri for reporting the decisions of the supreme court of this state, very soon after their rendition. This feature alone ought to insure the Journal a good support. It otherwise contains the usual matter found in a weekly publication of this character, and under its present management is well conducted.

In acknowleding in our last issue, the exchanges sent to us, by a lapsus pennæ, we changed the name of the Pittsburgh Legal Journal to the Pittsburgh Legal Gazette. The Legal Gazette is published in Philadelphia. Both are weeklies, and among our most valuable exchanges.

Reports of Cases determined in the Supreme Court of California, at the January and April terms, 1872, Vol. 43; Charles A. Tuttle, reporter.

The fact that from 1850, when California was little more than a desert, to 1872, at which date its population did not, perhaps, exceed 800,000 souls, the volums of litigation in its courts has been so great as to produce an average of nearly two volumes of reports a year, argues the great activity and prosperity of that state.

The present volume contains about 730 pages of printed matter; is printed on the largest type used in law reports, and is well leaded and spaced. The same matter, printed in the style of the New Hampshire Reports, could have been included in 400 pages. The reporter's head-notes are very full; perhaps they might be reduced in length without diminishing their accuracy. Mr. Tuttle is entitled to credit for stating fully each case where it is not fully stated in the opinion, and for presenting with sufficient fullness the arguments of counsel—duties which are so generally slurred over or neglected by reporters, that it is getting to be a standing observation, that the business of law reporting is one of the lost arts. It seems to us quite unnecessary, however, to set out, as he has done, at the head of each case, the full names of all the parties. It would seem that the names of the leading plaintiff and defendant, by which the case must be known, would be sufficient.

The opinions are models of brevity. Although an unusual number of the cases are devoted to questions of practice, yet many of them determine questions of general importance; and some of them we hope to find room to notice under the head of "Notes of Recent Decisions" in our next number.

The American Law Review, January, 1874. Boston: Little, Brown & Company.

Two widely different notions exist in regard to the office of a quarterly publication. By some, it is supposed to occupy about the same position among the weeklies, that the Devastation would occupy among a fleet of "tin-clads," such as we used in our late war. This conception makes it a receptacle of heavy and exhaustive disquisitions, such as can only be read by scholarly men, who are not overburdened with the cares of business. The other notion makes of it a sort of limbo, into which are tumbled the long and tedious essays, written by men who are unable to condense their thoughts into a brief compass, and which the smaller journals cannot print, nor the busier world read. Perhaps neither of these definitions does justice to the Law Review. Whilst the present number contains the usual amount of "heavy" editorial matter, "grated down and filed away with thought," it is not destitute of lighter reading, of a more varied and more enjoyable character. The first article is a fifty-page discussion, historical and legal, of the ever-to-be-remembered Dartmouth College case. The drift of popular sentiment within the past two or three years has given to this case peculiar prominence; and now, when the accumulated interests of fifty years rest upon the principle it declared, the people are beginning to think that it settled the law of vested wrongs rather than that of vested rights—that, instead of being the shield of the weak, it has become the sword of the strong. The writer in the Review argues that the decision was wrong, and suggests a declaratory amendment of the constitution as the least objectionable mode of obviating it. It is evident that the questions which gather around that case, are questions of to-day. They present issues which are knocking at the door, and which, like the slavery question, must be met and passed in some way. And the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, promises to acquire a popular fame equal to that of Dred Scott.

Digitized by Google

The next article relates to the San Juan boundary question, recently settled, and is political rather than legal.

The article on the Supreme Court of Judicature Act and Law Reform, will be read, we suppose, by every person who desires to acquaint himself with the sweeping changes, which have recently been made in the English judiciary system.

The Digest of Recent Decisions we pass over. We have never had much conceit in this feature of the law periodicals; and yet some will say, that if a law periodical were composed of this and nothing else, it would attain its highest degree of usefulness. The difficulty consists in the fact that the volume of adjudicated cases is so great, that such a digest can be at best but partial, and hence its value depends to a great extent upon the rule of selection. But even a partial selection is valuable as far as it goes, and helps the practitioner to form some idea of what the courts are doing.

The book notices in this number seem conceived not so much in a spirit fault-finding, as those of former issues. The praise of Mr. Holmes' new edition of Kent's Commentaries is harped by a most friendly hand; but, we doubt not, the work deserves the full measure of approbation accorded to it.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE Tichborne case has been postponed on account of the illness of Dr. Kenealy, counsel for the defendant.

—IT is stated that the late Lord Westbury, ex-chancellor of England, made his own will and actually omitted naming executors. It is also stated that he overlooked for a long time the simple fact in English law, that his second marriage invalidated a will previously made.

—A LARGE number of merchants of St. Paul have sent a telegram to their delegation in congress, begging them to oppose a total repeal of the bankrupt law. They say, "We have no objection to the modification suggested by the president. The clauses relating to dishonest actions on the part of debtors are our only protection, and ought to be retained."

—THE board of trade of Cincinnati has passed a resolution protesting against the proposed repeal of the bankrupt law, especially the involuntary clause; but recommending amendments reducing the expenses of enforcing the law, by reducing the fees of officers, and that § 39 be so amended as to make thirty instead of fourteen days, the time which must elapse, before proceedings can be commenced after a suspension of payment of commercial paper.

—THE late Justice NELSON was twice married; first, in 1819, to Pamela Woods, daughter of his former instructor in the law, and three years after her death, which occurred in 1822, to Catherine A. Russell, of Coopers-town. At the date of this second marriage, he settled permanently at Cooperstown, where he lived for more than 50 years. Those of his family who survive him, are his wife, who was with him at the last, two daughters and two sons, one of whom is the Hon. Renssellaer R. Nelson, United States district judge for Minnesota.

—A BILL has been introduced into the National House of Representatives, by Hon. C. L. Cobb, extending the time for filing claims with the commissioner of claims, appointed under the act of March 3, 1871, to March 3, 1875. The second section construes the terms "stores and supplies" to include buildings, and other structures and grounds used or occupied by the army or navy of the United States, in the states proclaimed as in insurrection, for barracks, quarters, hospitals, etc., for periods not less than thirty-five consecutive days; but does not allow any claim for damage or destruction incident to a state of war. The fourth section requires an itemized statement by the claimant. The sixth section authorizes the employment of five agents, in lieu of the three agents, now provided for by law.

—IN the United States district court at Jefferson City on the 17th ult., before Judge KREKEL, a question of some interest was determined in the case of Kappner, assignee of the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad company v. Ingles. The defendant and twelve others constituted the original corporators and directors of the road. These directors paid a small portion of their stock in cash, and then by a resolution of the board, declared the balance of the subscription paid in services. For the amount due for stock, which they thus voted themselves exempt from paying, the receiver brought suit against each. The instructions were such, as, under the evidence, required a verdict for the plaintiff. Verdict and judgment that the plaintiff recover $4,370.

—THE supreme court of Iowa decided on the 17th ult., at Des Moines, an important case respecting the law for restraining stock from running at large in the night time. The act provides that stock taken in the act of doing damage between sunset and sunrise, may be detained by the person whose property is injured, whether the fences surrounding such property were lawful or otherwise. The last section of the act provides that the law shall be submitted to a vote of the people of the counties, and shall not be in force in any county unless a majority, of the votes be cast in favor of its adoption. The court decides the last section unconstitutional—that no law can be passed to go into effect at a time to be fixed by somebody else; and also, that (except the last section) the law is in full force as a general law without regard to a vote of the people.

—ON November 19, at the sittings in Banco of the court of common pleas, before Justices Keating, Brett and Grove, the new lord chief justice, Sir John Coleridge, took his seat on the bench.

For some time before the usual hour for commencing business the court was crowded by gentlemen of the bar and other persons, who had got to know that the new lord chief justice was likely this morning to take his seat upon the bench, and that the preliminary process of investing him with the coif would be gone through in open court. The audience were kept waiting, for it was not until near close upon 11 o'clock that the judges took their seats upon the bench.

Sir John Coleridge almost at the same time made his appearance at the back of the bar, and advanced along a passage opened in the centre of it, until he got close upon the front row, where he halted, while the ancient form of "counting" in dower was gone through. Mr. Sergeant Parry and Mr. Sergeant Ballantine, the two senior sergeants, and Master Bennett, officiated in this proceeding.

Mr. Justice Keating, as soon as the "counting" was completed, said, Brother Coleridge, will you take your seat inside the bar?

Brother Coleridge accordingly stepped into the front row of the bar, and bowed right and left to the Queen's counsel, sergeants and other barristers present.

Mr. Justice Keating then said: Brother Coleridge, will you move anything?

Brother Coleridge, having nothing to "move," simply bowed to their lordships, shook hands with his professional brethren near him, and took his farewell of the bar.

Mr. Justice Keating observed that the court would adjourn for a few minutes in order to give time for the lord chief justice to take his seat.

On the reassembling of the court the lord chief justice appeared upon the bench robed in a judge's robe, and wearing his S. S. gold chain. Master Bennett administered to him the oath of allegiance to "Her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law," and also the oath that he would "well and truly serve our sovereign lady, Queen Victoria, in the office of chief justice in the court of common pleas," and that he would "do right to all manner of people after the laws and usages of this realm, without fear or favor, affection or good will." His lordship afterward subscribed these oaths upon the roll on which they had been engrossed, and this brought the proceedings to a close, and the ordinary business of the court was gone on with.—[London Daily News.

Digitized by Google

Salaries of United States Collectors—Decision by Judge Treat.

Judge TREAT, of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, has rendered an important decision in the case of the United States v. Donovan, in reference to the salaries of United States collectors. The case is stated by the Saint Louis Democrat, as follows: Donovan is administrator of his father, Daniel H. Donovan, who was collector and surveyor of the port of St. Louis at the beginning of the war. Following the precedent of many years, the late Mr. Donovan had charged $6,000 a year for his services, and the government contended that he was entitled to only $5,000. The suit was to settle the disputed question, which had remained undecided for a period of fifteen years.

The collector and surveyor of the port had always withheld $6,000 as his annual compensation, and the treasury department had credited him with $5,000, leaving a balance on the books against the officer. Bingham, Sanderson, and others, to whom the matter had been referred, had given the opinion that the collectors of St. Louis and other large cities were entitled to the same compensation as those of New York, Boston, etc. Judge TREAT, in his opinion, held that the ninth section of the act of 1822 gave the collectors of seven named ports $4,000 a year as compensation, such officers being classified as collectors of enumerated ports; that the same section gave to all other collectors $3,000; that the fifth section of the act of 1841, as expounded by the court in United States v. Walker, 22 How. 299, and in United States v. McDonald, 5 Wall. 347, gave to collectors of all ports $2,000 a year, when derived from storage on goods in bond, which was additional to the allowance on the ninth and tenth sections of the act of 1822. That the act of 1841 had no other effect than to give to collectors of enumerated and unenumerated ports the same compensation for storage. That the act of 1857, providing that surveyors of certain ports doing duty as collectors, should receive the same compensation for like services, made no discrimination between the different classes of collectors; so that the same construction applied to that act, as in the case of Walker under the act of 1841, namely: that the act of 1857 and that of 1841 related to two classes of collectors—one receiving $5,000 and the other $6,000, and accordingly as to whether he did duty as collector, represented one or the other of the two classes, so was he to be compensated.

That the act of 1822, perhaps, was intended by those who introduced it, to increase the compensation of surveyors and collectors, but its provisions were about the same as the act of 1857, and that the same construction has been given to both, and, in the opinion of the court, Mr. Donovan, as collector of St. Louis, was entitled to only $5,000 compensation, instead of $6,000. Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of the United States for $1,287.03.

The principle involved in this case applies to the cases of Howard, Breckinridge, Fox, and several other collectors who preceded them, and against whom, balances stand on the books of the treasury department for sums varying from $1,000 or $2,000 to $3,000 to $6,000. The same rule will apply to collectors of Cincinnati, Chicago, and all other ports, except the seven enumerated in the act of 1822.

The Bankrupt Law—A Suggestion as to its Modification.

[Charles C. Whittelsey, Esq., in the National Bankruptcy Register.]

The consolidated English bankrupt act, adopted in 1869, two years after the passage of our statute, with its improvements upon the old methods, was printed in Vol. IV. of the Register, but does not seem to have excited the attention of any one, not even that of the members of the bar, until in this present crisis in the commercial community, the necessity of doing something for commercial men, so as to enable them to come to some other terms than an actual breaking up of their whole business, is fully seen and realized.

We, members of the bar, often see what amendments are needed to our laws; but as we are not legislators ourselves, we fail to bring to public attention the reforms which our experience has suggested.

The English statute of 1869 has a provision by which a debtor, who finds himself unable to proceed with his business in its ordinary course, can call a meeting of his creditors, and, with the assent of a majority in number, excluding those under ten pounds, and the assent of a majority of three-fourths in value, effect a compromise upon such terms as he and the majority may agree to, and thus force the minority to accept the same terms, whether for payment in full on time, or for compounding at so much per cent. on the dollar, in cash or on time. The majority determine the terms for the compromise, and its resolution can be enforced by the court. The methods of procedure are pointed out by the act; the creditors are summoned by the debtor to attend a meeting in person or by proxy, to consider and vote upon the terms proposed by the debtor; the meeting appoints its own officers, keeps its own record, accepts or rejects the overtures for compromise, and reports its proceedings to the court, and if all is found in form, the entry of record is made, and the matters are all settled in the manner proposed by the creditors, and the anxiety, annoyance, and waste of a proceeding in bankruptcy is saved.

Had such a proceeding been recognized by our statute, how many of the embarrassed business men could have effected a compromise with their creditors, so as to carry on their business, a saving both to creditors and debtors. If many prominent banking houses could have effected an arrangement, much might have been saved which must now be lost, because one creditor persists in pushing his petition in bankruptcy, and thereby prevents any arrangement for composition, or an indulgence for time of payment.

A provision for compromise, similar to that of the English bankrupt act, should be immediately passed by congress, so as to give present relief from the danger threatening every suspended house.

The Dred Scott Decision—Nelson, Story, Taney, Stowell.

[From the New York Express.]

Here and there, lingers a strong prejudice against Judge Taney for his decision in the Dred Scott case, and especially in New England, some of whose citizens object to the proposed portrait of the chief justice alongside that of Chase in the supreme court room; but Judge Nelson, upon whose memory so many honors are being bestowed, would have decided the same way. This same Judge Nelson, in the United States Supreme Court, on the Dred Scott case, quoted a very remarkable letter written by Judge Story in 1828, relating to a case analogous to that of Dred Scott. Judge Story was accustomed to write at least once a year to Lord Stowell, sending him a copy of his judicial decisions, which the latter reciprocated. At length a case arose in the English court, (of which Lord Stowell was chief justice), where an Antigua slave was carried by his master to England, for temporary residence, and was subsequently taken back to Antigua. He brought suit for his freedom, and the inferior court decided against his right to freedom. In the appellate court, Lord Stowell, in behalf of a majority of the court, affirmed the judgment below. Lord Stowell sent the decision to Judge Story, who delayed replying so long, that Lord S. again wrote to him, expressing regret at not receiving a reply, and the hope that their pleasant correspondence, of so many years' standing, would not cease. To these letters, Judge Story replied as follows:

"SALEM, NEAR BOSTON, September 2, 1828.

"To Rt. Hon. Wm. Lord Stowell:

"MY LORD—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of January and May last, the former of which reached me in the latter part of spring, and the latter quite recently. * * * I have read, with great attention, your judgment in the slave case from the vice-admiralty court of Antigua. Upon the fullest consideration which I have been able to give the subject, I entirely concur in your views. If I had been called to pronounce judgment in a like case, I should certainly have arrived at the same result, though I might not have been able to present the reasons which led to it in such a striking and convincing manner. It appears to me that the decision is impregnable.

"In my native state (Massachusetts), the state of slavery is not recognized as legal, and yet, if a slave should come hither and afterward return to his own home, we should certainly think that the local law would reattach upon him, and that his servile character would be reintegrated. I have had occasion to know that your judgment has been extensively read in America (where questions of this nature are not of unfrequent discussion), and I never have heard any other opinion but that of approbation of it, expressed among the profession of the law. I cannot but think that upon questions of this sort, as well as general maritime law, it were well if the common lawyers had studied a little more extensively the principles of public and civil law, and had looked beyond their own municipal jurisprudence.

"I remain, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

JOSEPH STORY."

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, In Advance.

Removal of Suits from State to Federal Court.

The judiciary act, and the subsequent acts of congress, of July 27, 1866, and March 2, 1867, authorize the removal, from the state courts to the federal courts by the non-resident party, of "suits" commenced in the state courts, where the amount exceeds $500, when applied for by the party entitled, and in the mode prescribed. And the acts named also provide that upon the removal, the cause "shall proceed" in the federal court "in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process."

It is obvious that it is important to know what judicial proceedings are embraced in the word suit; for it is "suits" alone which these enactments authorize to be transferred. This question has been several times before the supreme court, and its latest decision is the case of the First National Bank v. Turnbull, 16 Wall. 190. The court here decides that a proceeding in a state court, under state enactments, to try in a summary and informal manner, the right of an execution plaintiff and a third person, to personal property levied upon by the sheriff, where no process is issued and no pleadings are filed, cannot be removed from the state to the federal courts, under the act of March 2, 1867. In giving the judgment of the court, Mr. Justice SWAYNE said: "it may well be doubted, whether so informal a proceeding is a 'suit,' within the meaning of the act of congress." The court did not decide the point, but placed its judgment upon the ground that the special proceeding to try the right of property provided by the statute, was "merely auxiliary to the original action, a graft upon it, and not an independent and separate litigation." Mr. Justice STRONG dissented; but his opinion, if any was written, is not published. We should have been glad to have seen his views; for the point decided, viz., that the proceeding was not an independent litigation, although settled by the judgment of the court, does not seem to us as entirely "too clear to require discussion."

What is a "suit" under the 25th section of the judiciary act, was decided in Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449, in which it was held that a writ of prohibition to restrain the levy of an illegal tax was a suit within the meaning of that section. Chief Justice MARSHALL, defining the word "suit," says: "The term is certainly a comprehensive one, and is understood to apply, to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy, in a court of justice which the law affords him. The modes of proceeding may be various, but if the right is litigated between parties in a court of justice, the proceeding by which the decision is sought, is a suit."

In West v. Aurora City, 6 Wall. 139, it was held, under the 12th section of the judiciary act, that a non-resident plaintiff in the state court, cannot, upon the discontinuance of his original suit, remove to the federal court a cross-action to which he has become liable under the state laws; for the reason that the only removal authorized by the above mentioned section, is by the defendant, who must avail himself of his right at the time of entering his appearance, to a suit regularly commenced against him in the state court by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought. In Beecher v. Gillett, 1 Dillon C. C. R. 308, it was decided that non-resident attaching creditors, substituted by order of the state court as sole defendants in replevin, in lieu of the sheriff who levied the attachment, may, under the act of March 2, 1867, remove the replevin suit from the state to the federal court.

What is an original suit or action, and what is an auxiliary or supplemental proceeding, has been frequently considered in cases which did not arise under the acts relating to the removal of causes from the state tribunals to the federal. Thus, Gwin v. Breedlove, 2 How. 29, decides that a proceeding in the federal court, by motion, under a state law for judgment against the marshal to compel him to pay over moneys collected under execution, is not a new or original suit, but an incident of the suit between the plaintiff and defendant; and hence, the circuit court has jurisdiction, without reference to the citizenship of the execution plaintiff and the marshal. The case just referred to, as well as Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. 1; Huff v. Hutchinson, 14 How. 586; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. 450, 460, and Williams v. Byrne, Hempst. 472, turn upon the question as to what are original, and what are supplementary or auxiliary suits; and "the principle is," says Judge NELSON, in the case last cited, "that a bill filed on the equity side of the [federal] court, to restrain or regulate judgments or suits at law in the same court, and thereby prevent injustice, or an inequitable advantage under mesne or final process, is not an original suit, but auxiliary and dependent, supplementary merely to the original suit, out of which it had arisen, and is maintained without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties." 24 How. 460. See, also, Railroad Companies v. Chamberlain, 6 Wall. 748; and Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. 69, where the previous cases are reviewed and commented on.

Power of Common Carriers to Limit their Liabilities.

An important decision has recently been rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, involving the question of the power of a railway company to limit its liability as a carrier of goods. The facts were that the plaintiff in this case was a drover, injured while travelling on a stock train of the defendants, proceeding from Buffalo to Albany, and the suit was brought to recover damages for the injury. He had cattle on the train, and had been required, at Buffalo, to sign an agreement to attend to the loading, transporting, and unloading of his cattle, and to take all risk of injury to them and of personal injury to himself, or whoever went with the cattle; and received what is called a drover's pass—certifying that he had shipped sufficient stock to pass free to Albany, but declaring that the acceptance of the pass was to be considered a waiver of all claims for damages or injuries received on the train. The agreement stated its consideration to be the carrying of the plaintiff's cattle at less than tariff rates. It was shown on the trial that these rates were about three times the ordinary rates charged, and that no drover had cattle carried on those terms; but all signed similar agreements to that which was signed by the plaintiff, and received similar passes. Evidence was given on the trial, tending to show that the injury complained of was sustained in consequence of negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants, but they insisted that they were exempted by the terms of the contract from responsibility for all accidents, including those occurring from negligence, at least the ordinary negligence of their servants; and requested the judge so to charge. This he refused, and charged that if the jury were satisfied that the injury occurred without any negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that the negligence of the defendants caused the injury, they must find for the plaintiff, which they did.

Digitized by Google

Upon the question of law thus presented, Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered an elaborate and exhaustive opinion (reported in full, 5 Legal Gazette, 413), in which the following points are ruled:

1. That a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility, when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law.

2. That it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law, for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants.

3. That these rules apply both to common carriers of goods and common carriers of passengers, and with especial force to the latter.

4. That they apply to the case of a drover travelling on a stock train to look after his cattle, and having a free pass for that purpose.

Law of Homicide — Character for Violence of the Person Slain.

The case of Fields v. The State, 47 Ala. 603, is a singular contribution to the law of criminal evidence. Doubtless there is in store for it a history much like the celebrated case of Grainger, (5 Yerg. 459). It will be constantly quoted and relied on by defendants in capital cases, and as constantly overruled or put aside by the courts. We have read and re-read it several times, and as nearly as we can comprehend it, it affirms distinctly that, in Alabama, it is not as much of a crime to kill a man whose general character for turbulence, violence and bloodshed, is bad, as to kill one whose general character in these particulars is good.

The facts were briefly these: The defendant had exasperated the deceased by sueing out an attachment against his sister. On the day of the killing, at about midday, they met at the house of a neighbor; where deceased, who was a powerful man, cursed and abused the defendant; slapped him in the face with his hat, collared him, pulled him off the steps where he was sitting, and by the use of the most opprobrious epithets and endeavored to provoke a difficulty with him. During a part of this time, a nephew of the deceased stood by with a pistol in his hand. The defendant made no resistance—said he did not want to fight. After this interview the defendant went home, got his gun, discharged the old loads, and reloaded both barrels with buck-shot, remarking that he would kill the d—d rascal before morning. About sun-set, the deceased, riding past the defendant's house on his way home, was intercepted in the road by the defendant, who deliberately shot him. There was no combat, no threatening actions on the part of the deceased, and no evidence that he was armed. Six hours had elapsed since the provocation the defendant had received from the deceased. This in contemplation of law, was ample time for the blood to cool and for reason to resume her sway. It thus appears to have been a case of deliberate and premeditated killing, characterized by express malice, done with a weapon prepared for the occasion, and possessing all the proper ingredients of murder in the first degree.

The point we are considering is raised by the refusal of the circuit judge to permit the defendant to prove "the general character of the deceased for turbulence, violence, bloodshed, and recklessness of human life." This the supreme court held to be error; and the ground upon which they arrived at this conclusion is, that, under the Alabama statute, Revised Code, § 3654, the jury have a discretion within certain limits, in cases of murder in either of its degrees, in fixing the quantum of punishment; whereas, at common law, they had no such discretion. They hence conclude that the evidence excluded should have gone to the jury as an ingredient to be considered in determining the quantum of punishment to be inflicted—determining, in other words, that it may not be so heinous a crime, nor deserving of so severe a punishment to kill a bad man as to kill a good one.

In pronouncing the judgment of the court, Chief Justice PECK uses the following remarkable language—the italics being ours:

"Here, we see that the degree of the crime must be determined by the verdict of a jury, upon an examination of testimony, and the punishment to be inflicted upon the defendant rests in the discretion of the jury. If the crime be murder in the first degree, the jury must determine whether the punishment shall be death or imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. If in the second degree, the defendant must be imprisoned in the penitentiary or be sentenced to hard labor for the county, for not less than ten years, at the discretion of the jury. Testimony is as necessary and important, to enable the jury to exercise this discretion prudently and properly, as to enable them to determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The jury have two important duties to perform, and both are to be governed and controlled by the evidence, and neither can be wisely or rightly discharged without evidence. As these duties are different, the evidence must necessarily be different. After the guilt of the defendant is settled, the proper evidence to determine the degree of his crime, and what should be the extent and severity of his punishment, must, in a great measure, depend upon a careful examination of the circumstances, not those only immediately attending the killing, but those also, which may reasonably be supposed to have led to it; and these circumstances should be considered in connection with the good or bad character, both of the defendant and the deceased. Who is prepared to say that the punishment should be the same where a turbulent, revengeful, bloodthirsty, dangerous man, reckless of human life, has been slain, who had recently, only a few hours before, violated and outraged the person of his slayer, as though the party slain had been a man of good character, and peaceable disposition? For myself, I cannot conscientiously say so. Although the violence and outrage committed upon the person of the defendant, in this case, might not have been sufficient to reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter, yet, we hold it was clearly proper for the consideration of the jury in determining the turpitude of the crime, and what should be the measure of the punishment to be inflicted. If the evidence of the general bad character of the deceased was proper only in the latter case, it should have been received, and not excluded by the court?"

Digitized by Google

It has been hitherto supposed, in countries governed by the common law, that it is as much a crime to kill a bad man as a good one. It has been supposed that the law throws its protecting arm around every person being in the peace of the king or of the state, "man, woman, child, subject born or alien; persons outlawed or otherwise attainted of treason, felony or premunire; Christian, Jew, heathen, Turk, or other infidel;" 3 Inst. 50; and whether he be a citizen or an alien enemy; State v. Gut. 13 Minn. 341, 357; or a member of a hostile tribe of Indians, Ibid.; Robertson's case, Addison, 246; or a free negro; for the law makes no distinction in its principles in respect of color; Campbell v. the People, 16 Ill., 20. Our Declaration of Independence declares that all men are created equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; which must clearly be understood to mean that all men are created with the equal right to live, to enjoy liberty and to pursue happiness. And it is probable that no book on the criminal law has ever been written since the time of Lord Coke, either in England or in the United States, which does not distinctly lay down the principle, that all men, not actually engaged in hostilities against the state, stand on an equal footing in the eyes of the law, in respect to the right to live; and that, except in the actual exercise of war, it is as much murder deliberately to kill one man as another. This principle is brought out in nearly every one of the reported cases, where the propriety of admitting evidence of the character of the deceased is considered.

Nor do we perceive any force in the conclusion of the learned judge, that evidence which would be irrelevant and impertinent at common law, is proper under the Alabama code, because this statute lodges with the jury the discretionary power to determine the quantum of punishment, which is lodged with the judge at common law. Because, whether this discretion be lodged with the jury or the judge, it is equally necessary that proper evidence should be heard to guide and direct its wise and conscientious exercise; and evidence that would be proper to be heard by the jury in the one case, would be equally proper to be heard by the judge in the other.

No one, it is conceived, can read the following cases and doubt that cases frequently arise, in trials for homicide, where evidence of the violent and turbulent character of the defendant ought to be heard: Robertson's case, Addison, 246; Quesenberry's case, 3 Stew. & Port. 308; Rippy's case, 2 Head, 217; Little's case, Sup. Court Tenn. 1873; Keener's case, 18 Ga. 194; Tackett's case, 1 Hawks, 210; Pritchett's case, 22 Ala. 39; Franklin's case, 29 Ala. 14; Lamb's case, 41 N. Y. 360; Hick's case, 27 Mo. 588; Keene's case, 50 Mo. 357; Murray's case, 10 Cal. 309; Payne's case, 1 Met. (Ky.) 370; Dumphey's case, 4 Minn. 438; Seibert's case, Wharton on Homicide, 227; Smith's case, 12 Richardson, (Law) 430, 440; Hurd's case, 25 Mich. 405.

The circumstances which are proper for the admission of this sort of evidence are pretty clearly defined:

1. Where the evidence is wholly circumstantial, and the character of the transaction in doubt; as in Tackett's case, supra.

2. Where there is evidence tending to show that the homicide may have been committed from a principle of self-preservation. In such a case the danger to be apprehended from an assault, and the degree of force necessary in repelling it, would depend greatly upon the known character of the assailant for recklessness and cruelty. This is the usual ground upon which the admission of such evidence is put by the cases.

3. Where it is proper to admit threats, either communicated or uncommunicated, made by the deceased or prosecutor against the defendant. In such a case the danger to be apprehended from the threats is to be determined, in a great measure, by the character of the person making them. In Texas, this principle has been declared by statute. Paschal's Dig. Statutes, Art. 2270; Pridgen's case, 31 Tex. 420.

But we do not recollect any instance where it has been contended that such evidence ought to be heard in every case, except in the dissenting opinion of BATTLE, J., in Barfield's case, 8 Ired. 355. But, according to the case under consideration, such evidence is admissible in all cases, without reference to the other facts in evidence; although (as in the particular case itself) the killing may have been upon an occasion produced by the slayer, or, although it may have been upon a lying in wait, or by poison; for the principle once admitted that it is less a crime to kill a bad man than a good one, there can be no logical exception made to it, growing out of the circumstances of the killing; nor does this decision undertake to make any. We conceive that such a doctrine can never obtain a foothold in a country where the principles of the common law exist. The ruling in this case becomes less intelligible when it is seen that the jury assessed the defendant's punishment at the lowest term allowed by law for murder in the second degree, and the proposed evidence, if admitted, could not possibly, in connection with the other facts proved, have reduced the homicide to manslaughter.

Law of Homicide—Can the Character of the defendant be put in evidence by the State?

The language of Chief Justice PECK in the case above considered, Fields v. The State, 47 Ala. 603, that the circumstances attending the killing should be viewed "in connection with the good or bad character both of the defendant and the deceased," must certainly, so far as it relates to the character of the defendant, have been inadvertently written. If there is any thing thoroughly imbedded in the criminal law, it is that the character of the person accused of crime, can never be called in question, unless he himself puts it in issue. There may be a few exceptions to this principle, as in case of a common barrator, etc., but certainly none in trials for homicide. Since Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317, the authorities to this point have become so numerous, and the principle itself is so elementary and familiar, that it is unnecessary to cite cases in support of it.

In the celebrated case of Laura Fair, 43 Cal. 137, a vigorous attempt was made on the part of the prosecution to put in evidence the character of the defendant for chastity, and with some show of reason; for in that case the defendant had been permitted to give evidence tending to show that she had been lured into a marriage with the deceased, supposing him to be a single man, and that the killing was hence done under the mental excitement and infirmity produced by a knowledge of the fact that he had deceived and deserted her. In order to rebut the conclusion raised by this evidence, the prosecution was permitted to show that the general character for chastity of the defendant was bad. This the supreme court very properly held to be error. WALLACE, J., said:

Digitized by Google

"Supposing that an investigation upon that point or upon any other given point of the character of the prisoner, had been pertinent in itself, it is, nevertheless, settled by an overwhelming current of judicial decisions, that it is not competent to the prosecution to initiate the enquiry, and that it is only after the prisoner has elected to put his character in issue, by calling witnesses and adducing evidence in its distinctive support, that the prosecution is permitted to follow and disprove the evidence so offered, if it can. Nor is the prisoner thus held to have led the way, and opened up her character to the attack of the prosecution, merely because the case made and attempted in the defence is more formidable when considered in connection with the good character—good in the sense of not being bad—which the law assumes the prisoner to possess in cases in which no evidence upon the subject of general character is offered. The presumption of a character of ordinary fairness, with which the law clothed her for the purposes of the case, was one to the benefit of which she was entitled, and which could not be put in peril, unless, discarding the presumption thus afforded her, she had elected to put it thus distinctly in issue, and so constitute it a fact to be determined by the jury, as other facts in issue were to be determined."

CROCKETT, J., delivered a concurring opinion, in which he expressed substantially the same views.

Railway Aid Bonds.

WILLIAM J. LEWIS v COMMISSIONERS OF BOURBON COUNTY.

Supreme Court of Kansas, Nov. 15, 1873.

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.]

We have thus far considered this question on the assumption that the statute designated the commissioners as the canvassing officers, and fixed the time and place of the canvass. The contrary is the fact. No canvassing officers are named. No time or place for the canvass indicated. The only general election law then in force, in its first section declares what elections are to be governed by its provisions, and they are "all elections hereafter to be held for state, district, and county officers." Comp. Laws, p. 490, § 1. Under that law the county commissioners are made the canvassers, and the Friday succeeding the election the day for the canvass. § 27, p. 497. Section 4 of "an act providing for the election of township officers," (Comp. Laws, p. 504, as amended in 1864, Laws 1864, p. 100, § 1), makes the commissioners canvassers for such elections, and names the first Monday of April for the canvass. There are also many special elections provided for in the statutes, and as a general rule the several acts in terms declare that such elections shall be conducted in the manner prescribed by the general election law. But the acts under which these bonds are claimed to have been voted, contain no such provision. Laws 1865, p. 41; Laws 1866, p. 792. They provide that "no such bonds shall be issued until the question shall be first submitted to a vote of the qualified electors of the county, at some general election, or at some special election to be called by the board of county commissioners, by first giving twenty days' notice in some newspaper published and having general circulation in the county, or in case there be no paper in the county, then by written or printed notices posted up in each election precinct twenty days previous to the day of such election; and in submitting said question, said board of commissioners shall direct in what manner the ballots shall be cast." The express authority given is to order a special election and to direct in what manner the ballots shall be cast. If they have any further power in the matter, it is either because of their general authority to represent the county, and manage its business and concerns where no other provision is made, (Comp. Laws, p. 412, § 15, clause 5), or because power to order an election carries with it the power to prescribe the manner of conducting it and determining its results. An examination of the orders of the commissioners show that they omitted to prescribe the manner of conducting the election, the time or place of the canvass, or the canvassing officers. Notwithstanding the silence of the statute and the omission of the order, an election would doubtless be valid where the people generally acquiesced in the manner and took part in the election. Here, the evidence shows that all but one township took part in the election, and fails to show the relative population of that township, or that the voters in the others did not generally participate in the election. But while the election may be valid—for it is a maxim that the will of the people shall not be defeated by the omissions and irregularities of their officers and agents—can it be that the commissioners can, without statutory authority, in the absence of notice to the voters, and before the returns are received from all the voting precincts, come together and by canvassing only a portion of the vote, create in themselves an authority which the majority of the voters have refused to grant to them? Can such unauthorized and partial canvass be even prima facie evidence of the authority? It seems to us doubtful. At any rate when it carries on its face information that returns of the election have not been received from some townships, it is sufficient notice to put any one on enquiry as to the actual facts of the election, and the returns filed with the county clerk.

It is claimed that the curative act of 1868, (Gen. Stat. p. 892), applies and makes valid this election. This cannot be; for that applies only to cases in which "a majority of the persons voting" have voted in favor of the subscription, and here, as we have seen, a majority voted against the subscription. It was an act to cure irregularities and sustain the will of the majority, and not an act to make form more than substance, and the canvass of the county commissioners more potent than the votes of the people.

No authority having been granted by the proceedings in 1867, was any conferred by those in 1869? The objections raised to the former do not apply to the latter. A corporation was named as the recipient of the aid, and a majority of the votes cast were in favor of the proposition. But an equally fatal objection exists to these. The question submitted in 1869 was that of extending aid to a road west from Fort Scott. It was upon that, the people voted, and to that gave their assent. The commissioners, it is true, by their order declared that if the people authorized aid to a road running west, they should consider themselves also authorized to subscribe to a road running east. Yet submitting only one question, they cannot by construction enlarge the authority actually given. That the question submitted was also a railroad proposition, does not make any difference. They might with equal propriety and legal warrant have submitted a question of issuing bonds for a court-house, and then by construction made an affirmative vote a delegation of authority to issue these bonds. Can an agent thus by construction create authority? But it may be said that while this is the form of these proceedings, it was practically and substantially a submission of both questions to be determined by a single vote. Conceding this to be the fact, and the difficulty, though lessened, is not avoided. The two questions were to be settled by a single vote. A vote for railroad bonds was a vote in favor of both propositions, and so of a vote against. There was no opportunity of voting for one and against the other. Such a submission was not warranted by the statute. It may be conceded that two or more questions may be submitted at a single election, provided each question may be voted on separately, so that each may stand or fall upon its own merits. But that is a very different matter from tacking two questions together, to stand or fall upon a single vote. It needs no argument to show the rank injustice of such a mode of submission. By it several interests may be combined, and the real will of the people overslaughed by this combination. An unpopular measure may be tacked on to one that is popular, and carried through on the strength of the latter. A necessary matter may be made to carry with it some private speculation for the benefit of a few. Things odious and wrong in themselves may receive the popular approval, because linked with propositions whose immediate consummation is deemed essential. It is against the very spirit of popular elections. That aims to secure freedom of choice not merely between parties, but also in respect to every office to be filled and every measure to be determined. A voter at a state election would be shocked to be told, that because he voted for a person named for governor on one ticket, he must vote for all the other persons named thereon, or that voting for one person, he was to be understood as voting for all. He would feel that his freedom of choice was infringed upon. None the less so, is it by such a submission as this. This question is not a new one to the courts. In Supervisors of Fulton county v. M. & W. R. R. Co., 21 Ill. 373, such a mode of submission was pronounced void in the following vigorous language: "The truth is," says BREESE, J., "the voters of Fulton have never had an opportunity to vote, and never have voted this subscription; for the question was, at no time distinctly before them. The question before them was, will you vote for a subscription to two roads? Neither road has received the approving vote of the people and until that is done —until the naked single question shall be fairly presented to those voters, they ought not to be bound or injuriously affected by any such jockeying management and log-rolling. This system, condemned as it has always been by the moral sense, as well as the sense of justice of the whole country, should at this day find no favor in the courts. We do not hesitate to say this proposition to vote on two roads at the same time, was not authorized by the law, and is a fraud on the people." The same ruling was made in The People ex rel. v. Tazewell county, 22 Ill. 147; Clarke v. Supervisors of Hancock county, 27 Ill. 310. The same question was before the Iowa courts and determined in the same way. McMillan v. Lee county, 3 Clark, Iowa, 31. In giving the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice STOCKTON says: "The law according to the view that we have taken of its provisions, evidently contemplates distinctness and unity in each question or proposition submitted for adoption or rejection by a vote of the people. Each proposition submitted to such vote, should be complete in itself, and should contain every requisite prescribed by the statute as necessary to give validity and effect to the borrowing or expenditure of money, the subscription of stock, or the issue of county bonds." A mode of submission which is so obviously unjust, so contrary to the spirit of elections, and has received such condemnation from the courts, will not be imputed to the intention of the legislature, unless necessarily demanded by the language used. The statute in force at the time of this election was that of 1869, (Laws 1869, p. 108). So far as this question is concerned, however, it is not dissimilar to the acts of previous years. It authorizes the county commissioners to subscribe for and take stock or loan credit "to any railway company," "upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, provided a majority of the voters shall first assent to such subscription." Upon making the subscription, the county becomes, like other subscribers to such stock, entitled to the privileges granted, and subject to the same liabilities imposed by this act, or by the charter of the company in which such stock is taken. The singular number is used all the way through. It contemplates a separate transaction with each corporation; provides for a subscription to be made upon "terms and conditions;" and in the nature of things these terms and conditions would vary with different roads. No one can read the sections without being impressed with the fact that each county was to make a separate subscription; each corporation to receive a separate subscription, and each subscription to be authorized by a separate vote. The curative statute of 1868 impliedly recognizes this fact. It provides that if a majority of the persons voting at any election prior to January 21, 1868, have voted in favor of subscribing stock and issuing bonds, the county commissioners may make the subscription, "whether such orders and elections or either of them have been in compliance with the statute in such case made and provided, or not, or whether the proposition submitted at the election had, was for the subscription of stock and the issuance of bonds to one or more railroad companies." Two things are thus aimed at: first, to cure all mere irregularities in the proceedings, and second to make valid elections wholly unauthorized by the statute. It seems, therefore, that the statute requires a separate vote on the question of extending aid to each corporation; and if these proceedings are to be continued as a submission of two questions to a single vote, they were, in the language of Judge BREESE, "not authorized by the law and a fraud on the people." It seems, therefore, clear that neither by the election of 1867, nor that of 1869, was any authority given to the commissioners to subscribe stock to the Tebo and Neosho railroad, or to issue these bonds.

Digitized by Google

A graver question is now presented. Can this want of authority be shown as a defence by the county to this action of the plaintiff, who claims to be a bona fide holder for value without notice. Without express provision of statute, the commissioners would have no authority to subscribe stock and issue bonds to a railroad corporation. Every one dealing with the commissioners or purchasing such securities must take notice of the law under which they act. The act under which the commissioners assumed to issue the bonds, required, as a condition precedent to the vesting in them of any authority to issue, an affirmative vote of a majority of the voters, given upon a single proposition, and naming the proposed recipient of the subscription and bonds. Of this, every one purchasing bonds like these must take notice. He knows that unless these conditions exist—these steps have been taken—the commissioners have no more power than the sheriff or the county attorney to bind the county. He knows that the commissioners cannot create the authority which the statute says the voters alone can give; that they are but agents, and agents not with general powers to act for their principal in matters of this kind, but requiring a specific and express authority for every single act of subscription. Charged with notice of all this, how can he assume that because they have acted, they must have been authorized? That these bonds are negotiable paper, does not alter the case. The law merchant does not make the act of an agent proof of his authority. Where power exists which may be exercised under circumstances peculiarly within the knowledge of the agent, the exercise of the power may bind the principal, as an affirmance by the agent of the existence of those circumstances. But this pre-supposes the existence of the power. Here no power ever passed to the commissioners. The silence of the principal, when the agent is acting, often works an estoppel as implying an acquiescence. But where the principal can do nothing else than be silent, where the individual tax-payers are powerless to restrain the act, (Craft v. Commissioners Jackson county, 5 Kan. 518,) the enforced silence can hardly be construed as an acquiescence. It may be conceded that the language of Mr. Justice NELSON is broad enough to cover a case of this kind, and to make the act of the board in declaring their authority and issuing the bonds, conclusive evidence of the grant of power by the people. Equally broad is the language of Mr. Justice SWAYNE in Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, where he says: "When a corporation has power under any circumstances to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume they were issued under the circumstances which gave the requisite authority, and they are no more liable to be impeached for any infirmity in the hands of such a holder, than any other commercial paper." That such a construction was not intended to be given to the language of these citations, is evident from subsequent decisions of that court. In Marsh v. Fulton county, 10 Wall. 676, the bonds of the county were issued and in the hands of a bona fide holder, and the county commissioners were by statute authorized to issue bonds, upon a previous affirmative vote of the electors of the county. Yet as such vote had not been had, the court unanimously held the bonds void, even in the hands of the bona fide holder. The bona fide holder had no right to presume they were issued under the circumstances which gave the requisite authority. He was bound to take notice of the county records, and they showing no authority, none existed. We cannot do better than quote the language of Mr. Justice FIELD: "It is a case, too, where the holder was bound to look to the action of the officers of the county and ascertain whether the law had been so far followed by them as to justify the issue of the bonds. The authority to contract must exist before any protection as an innocent purchaser can be claimed by the holder. This is the law, even as respects commercial paper alleged to have been issued under a delegated authority, and is stated in the case of the Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall. 676. In speaking of notes and bills issued or accepted by an agent acting under a general or special power, the court says: 'In each, the person dealing with the agent, knowing that he acts only by virtue of a delegated power, must, at his peril, see that the paper on which he relies, comes within the power under which the agent acts. And this applies to every person who takes the paper afterwards; for it is to be kept in mind that the protection which commercial usage throws around negotiable paper cannot be used to establish the authority by which it was originally issued." And in another place replying to the claim that because some interest had been subsequently paid, the original proceedings were made valid and good, he says: "The supervisors possessed no authority to make the subscription or issue the bonds in the first instance, without the previous sanction of the qualified voters of the county. The supervisors in that particular were the mere agents of the county. They could not therefore ratify a subscription without a vote of the county; because they could not make a subscription in the first instance without such authorization."

Digitized by Google

It may be remarked—that the bonds in that case contained no recitals of proceedings by the county board, or a vote of the people, but were simply naked promises to pay. The same is true of the bonds in this suit. The effect of this on the question may be considered hereafter. Pendleton county v. Amy, 13 Wall. 297, is a still later case in that court. In that case, Mr. Justice STRONG for the court, after alleging that it was the duty of the county officers to determine whether a vote had been had according to law, and what the result was, uses this language. "To issue bonds without the fulfilment of the precedent conditions, would be a misdemeanor; and it is to be presumed that public officers act rightly. We do not say this is a conclusive presumption in all cases; but it has more than once been decided that a county may be estopped against asserting that the conditions attached to a grant of power were not fulfilled. 21 How. 539; 24 How. 287; 2 Black, 722; 1 Wall. 384, 291; 5 Wall. 772. The estoppel in these cases was either by recitals in the bonds that the conditions precedent had been complied with, or by the fact that the county had subsequently levied taxes to pay interest on the bonds."

In one of the early cases, Bissell et al. v. City of Jeffersonville, 24 How. 287, Mr. Justice CLIFFORD says: "whether we look to the bonds or the recorded proceedings, there is nothing to indicate any irregularity, or even to create a suspicion that the bonds had not been issued pursuant to a lawful authority; and we hold that the company and their assignees under the circumstances of this case, had a right to assume that they imparted verity." It appeared that copies of the proceedings of the county board were shown to the plaintiffs in that case, at the time they received the bonds, etc. It seems a fair inference from these citations, that all the Supreme Court of the United States have decided is, that when either the board or the records of the county contain a recital of an election, and all other conditions precedent, as prescribed by the statute, the county is concluded by that recital, and may not show that as a matter of fact no election took place, or that some other condition precedent never existed. With such a construction of the law, we have in this case no occasion to differ. The bonds sued on contain no recital, and the records show a non-compliance with the statute. An examination of the opinions of other state courts show a disposition to place the construction we have given, upon this general language of the United States Supreme Court, or else to disagree with the views expressed by that tribunal. We have had occasion to notice the decision of the supreme court of Ohio, (11 Ohio State 183), cited supra. See also Hopple v. Brown township, 13 Ohio State, 311; State ex rel. Beckel v. Union township, 15 Ohio State, 437. The supreme court of Iowa, in Clark v. The City of Des Moines, 19 Iowa, 199, had occasion to notice these rulings, and after citing the language heretofore quoted from Judge SWAYNE, says: "Suppose a city charter expressly authorized the common council to issue negotiable securities for corporate debts, and that the mayor and recorder without an order of the council, fabricate—manufacture—such securities, and that they find their way into the hands of innocent purchasers. It cannot be that Judge SWAYNE means that the 'bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which gave the requisite authority'; and yet he says so. The true rule is, that the want of corporate power, or the want of authority in the municipal officers cannot be supplied by their unauthorized acts or representations." And in accordance with that rule, the case was decided, all the justices concurring. To the same effect is the case of Veeder v. The Town of Luna, 19 Wis. 280, in which the court, Mr. Justice COLE dissenting, held that the recitals in the bond were not conclusive, and dissented squarely from the United States Supreme Court as to the effect of those recitals. The cases of Starin v. The Town of Genoa, and Gould v. The Town of Sterling, 23 N. Y. 439 and 456, are strongly in point. The legislature of that state authorized, by separate acts, these towns to issue their bonds in aid of railroads, provided the written assent of two-thirds of the resident tax payers was first obtained and filed in the clerk's office. The court of appeals held, reversing the judgment of the lower courts, that the bondholder, sueing on bonds issued by these towns by virtue of these acts, must prove affirmatively that the written assent of the requisite number of tax-payers was in point of fact obtained and filed, and that the town was not bound by the representations of its officers upon the face of the bonds, that such assent had been obtained and filed. In the latter case, Judge SELDEN, replying to the claim that the recitals in the bond created an estoppel, says: "The agents here were designated not by the town, but by the legislature; and no power whatever, was conferred by the town, unless the assent of the tax-payers was obtained. Any representation, therefore, by the supervisors and commissioners in respect to such assent, would be a representation as to the very existence of their power. Such representations, as we have seen, are never binding upon the principal."

Digitized by Google

The same doctrine was sustained by the subsequent cases of The People v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 114; The People v. Mead, 36 N. Y. 224.

In his work on Constitutional Limitations, Judge COOLEY, commenting upon the doctrine of Gould v. Sterling, says: "This doctrine appears to be sound, that wherever a want of power exists, a purchaser of securities is chargeable with notice of it, if the defect is disclosed by the corporate records, or, as in that case, by other records where the power is required to be shown." Page 217. For a further discussion of this question, and other authorities, see the note at the foot of page 216, of that work. The difference between the federal and state courts is this: the former hold the county concluded by the recitals of the bond; the latter, that the bondholder is chargeable with notice of whatever appears upon the county records. Both agree that where there are no recitals on the face of the bond, and the want of authority appears on the county records, the bonds are void even in the hands of a bona fide holder.

These bonds contain no recitals of an election or other proceedings of the county board, but are naked promises to pay. At the close of the obligatory words, they read: "By order of the board of commissioners of the county of Bourbon, Kansas, dated March 8, 1867." The purchaser, therefore, is notified on the face of the instrument, of the particular order under which the bonds were issued. Claiming under one instrument which recites the existence of another, and refers to it as the authority for its own existence, is he not charged with notice of the contents of the latter? Story, Eq. Jur., § 400. We have given this case and the questions involved in it, full and careful and patient consideration, both on account of the amount in controversy here, and because of the many which may be affected by the decision of these questions. The conclusions we have reached are, that the proceedings of March 8, 1867, were void, because no railroad corporation was named as the recipient of the proposed subscription and bonds; that the election of May 7, 1867, conferred no authority, because a majority of the votes cast were against the granting of authority; that, for a like reason, the curative act of 1868 did not apply to that election; that the proceedings in 1869 conferred no authority, because no question of issuing these bonds was submitted to the voters of Bourbon county; and because an attempt to submit two questions to a single vote is unauthorized by the statute and a fraud upon the people; that there being no recitals on the face of the bond, the county is not concluded by the mere fact that the commissioners issued them, even in favor of a bona fide holder; that the want of authority to issue appears on the records of the county, and that the purchaser is referred to those records by the bond itself, and is chargeable with notice of their contents. It follows therefore that judgment must be entered in favor of the defendants.

All the Justices concurring.

Bankruptcy—Counter Claim Against Petitioner.

IN RE OSAGE VALLEY AND SOUTHERN KANSAS RAILROAD COMPANY.

District Court of the United States, Western District of Missouri, 1873.

Hon. ARNOLD KREKEL, District Judge.

1. Bankruptcy—Counter-Claim against petitioner—Unliquidated damages.—A debtor against whom a petition in bankruptcy is filed, may set up in his answer, an order to show cause, any set-offs or counter claims which he may have for the purpose of showing that he is not indebted to the petitioner, and such counter claims may be for unliquidated damages.

2. Counter claim reducing petitioner's debt below $250 defeats proceeding.—If a debtor can show that he has just set-offs or counter claims to overcome petitioner's debt, or to reduce the same below two hundred and fifty dollars, he thereby defeats the proceeding; for, unless petitioner has a debt of that amount, after allowing all just set-offs and counter claims, he is not entitled to raise any question in regard to the solvency of, or acts of bankruptcy committed by, the debtor.

The facts of the case and the nature of the pleadings on which the opinion was pronounced are sufficiently stated therein.

I. N. Litton and Ewing & Smith, for petitioner.

Johnson & Botsford and McMillan Bros., for debtor:

1. In suits and proceedings instituted in, or transferred to, the federal courts, the same defences, set-offs and counter claims may be interposed as could be if they were brought and tried in the state tribunals. West v. Aurora City, 6 Wall. 139; Partridge v. The Insurance Co. 15 Wall. 573.

2. Petitioner must have a debt, provable under the bankrupt law, of two hundred and fifty dollars after allowing all just credits, set-offs and counter claims. In re Ouimotte, 1 Sawyer 47; in re Cornwall, 9 Blatchf. C. C., 114; Bump on Bank, (6 edition) 47–48.

3. Unliquidated damages are a proper subject of counter claim under the laws of the state of Missouri, where the suit is on contract, and the damages also arise from the breach of contract. Hay v. Short, 49 Mo. 139; Gordon v. Bruner, 49 Mo. 570; Davidson v. Remington, 7 How. Pr. 310; Gage v. Angell, 8 How. Pr. 335; Lemon v. Trull, 13 How. Pr. 248; Jones v. Moore, 42 Mo. 413.

KREKEL, J.

The Pacific railroad files its petition to have the Osage Valley and Southern Kansas railroad declared bankrupt, and after setting out formal requirements, alleges that its demand originates in the violations of the conditions of a lease made by the Osage Valley and Southern Kansas railroad on the 10th day of September, 1868, for thirty years, of its Boonville and Tipton road, to the petitioner; that by a provision of said lease, it was to have the use and possession of its Boonville depot and grounds, of which it has been deprived by judgment in favor of an adverse claimant, and had damages and costs to pay; that by another provision of said lease, the Osage Valley and Southern Kansas railroad was to fence the one-half of said railroad in two, and the whole thereof within five years from the date of the lease, which it failed to do, and for which failure damages are also claimed.

The acts of bankruptcy are charged to be the suffering and procuring of its property to be taken on legal process with intent to give a preference, and with intent to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt law.

To this petition, the Osage Valley and Southern Kansas railroad files an answer denying the acts of bankruptcy; and further, that the Pacific railroad is a creditor, or has a demand against it. As a defence to the claim of petitioner, the Osage Valley and Southern Kansas railroad sets up and claims damages growing out of a violation of obligations assumed and undertaken on the part of the Pacific company in the lease aforesaid, and asks that such damages may be allowed as a set-off and counter claim, averring that on a settlement of their demands, the Pacific railroad will be indebted to the Osage Valley and Southern Kansas railroad.

The attorneys for the Pacific railroad file their motion to strike out so much of defendant's answer as refers to unliquidated damages. This motion raises the question: is the claim for unliquidated damages available as a set-off or counter claim? This question must be solved by the provisions of the bankrupt act; for whatever force may be given to the act of congress of June 1, 1872, providing for the assimilating of the practice and pleadings of federal courts to that of the state courts, neither that act nor the bankrupt law has done away with the distinction between law and equity, although the bankrupt act, as we shall presently see, seems in some of its enactments to disregard it. Authority for this may be found in the constitutional grant of power to congress "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

This grant, so far as limitations are concerned, leaves it for the national legislature to enact whatever provisions of law it may deem best to accomplish the constitutional object. The first section of the bankrupt act constitutes the districts courts of the United States, courts of bankruptcy, and confers on them original jurisdiction in their respective districts in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, and they are thereby authorized "to hear and adjudicate upon the same according to the provisions of this act, providing that the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall extend to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy."

Digitized by Google

These jurisdictional grants, however ample, need not come in conflict with the maintaining of the distinction between law and equity; yet when we come to the provisions of the second section of the act, giving the circuit courts of the United States a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under it, and providing that they "may, upon bill, petition or other proper process of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the cases as a court of equity," it would appear that congress, by these provisions, sought to meet a peculiar class of cases, having their origin in the bankrupt act, in which law and equity were blended.

But the jurisdiction to hear and determine the matters in controversy does not exclusively depend on the construction given to the provision in the sections cited. The last clause of the 19th section of the act under consideration, provides that "if any bankrupt shall be liable for unliquidated damages arising out of any contract or promise, * * * * the court may cause such damages to be assessed in such a mode as it may deem best; and the sum so assessed may be proven against the estate." Thus it is seen that, by direct provision, unliquidated damages, growing out of any contract or promise, when assessed, are provable debts, and, being provable debts, under the view of the court, may be set up by way of defence to show that no debt or demand is due to petitioner entitling it to have defendant declared a bankrupt.

It is said that the damages must be assessed before they become a provable debt, and before they can be made available as a counter claim. While this is true, the mode of assessing is left to the court, "as it may deem best." In the settlement of a bankrupt's estate, the court would undoubtedly direct the assessment of unliquidated damages before allowing it to be proven; but this practically amounts to nothing more or less than an enquiry as to the amount.

As this court may, by allowing the answer to stand, make this its mode for assessing defendant's damages consistent with the provisions of law, it will not order the defendant out of court with its claims, which, if sustained, may dispose of the case. While this view of the law would allow petitions in bankruptcy to be brought on claims for unliquidated damages growing out of contracts or promises, it must be left for the courts to determine whether they will, in the first instance, deem an assessment by way of enquiry, on creditor's petition, a mode deemed best to assess unliquidated damages.

Of this the court entertains serious doubts, and declares itself free to act when a case shall be presented. The question on the motion under consideration is, shall a claim for unliquidated damages be made available as a defence, to show that defendants are not indebted to petitioners, and hence that the latter have no standing in court? Petitioner must have a claim, after all just credits exceeding the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars, to entitle it to raise the enquiry as to the facts of bankruptcy and solvency of the defendant. That the prima facie case made by the petition, proofs and exhibits upon which the order to show cause issued, may be rebutted, is well settled by the almost daily practice of this court, as well as adjudicated cases.

That part of the motion to strike out defendant's answer covered by this opinion, is overruled.

Validity of a Trust Sale of a Portion of a Debtor's Estate, Pending Proceedings in Bankruptcy.

McGREADY v. HARRIS.

Supreme Court of Missouri, October Term, 1873.

WASH ADAMS,
DAVID WAGNER,
WM. B. NAPTON, } Judges.
H. M. VORIES,
T. A. SHERWOOD,

Bankruptcy—Sale by Trustee, Pending Proceedings, of Property Conveyed in Trust by Bankrupt to secure Creditors.—A trustee under a power in a deed of trust, sold and conveyed to the defendant the property in question, subsequent to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor, who was the grantor in the deed of trust. There was no order from the United States district court restraining or otherwise interfering with the sale, nor had the proceedings therein terminated in any adjudication at that time; but the trustee, when about making the sale, was informed by the debtor of the pending proceeding in bankruptcy. In an action of ejectment by the purchaser, it was held, that the pendency of such proceedings in bankruptcy did not render the sale invalid.

The case is stated in the opinion.

John L. Thomas & Bro., for plaintiff in error; Reynolds & Relfe, and M. Kinealy, for defendant in error.

NAPTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action of ejectment. The plaintiff was the purchaser of the lands sued for, at a sale made in August, 1872, by the trustee under a deed of trust made in 1868. In April, 1872, (Apr. 8th), proceedings in bankruptcy had been instituted in the district court of the United States, against the debtor and grantor in the deed of trust, but the trustee, although apprised of such proceedings by the grantor on the day of sale, proceeded with the sale, and the plaintiff became the purchaser, and the only question is, whether the institution of the proceedings in the United States district court rendered the sale void. There was no order from the district court restraining or otherwise interfering with the sale, nor had the proceedings therein terminated in any adjudication whatever. It was an attempt on the part of defendant's creditors to have him declared a bankrupt.

The circuit court before which this case was tried, declared the sale null, and that the plaintiff had no title. We do not so understand the decisions of the federal courts interpreting the bankrupt act. That law was not designed to invalidate or destroy bona fide liens on the estate of the bankrupt, nor does it reserve exclusively to the district court, the power to have them enforced in all cases, and under all circumstances.

They may be enforced in [the] mode provided for by the contract of the parties, or by the action of state courts or state officers. Doubtless the district court might have interfered in this case; but it did not, and therefore, we cannot see that the mere fact of a proceeding being instituted would destroy the legal title of plaintiff, as he received it from the trustee. So far as the rights of an assignee in bankruptcy are concerned, it may well be that the whole transaction could be, on presentation to the court, examined and declared fraudulent or void, if the facts warranted. But no assignee has been appointed in this case, nor, so far as the record shows, has there been any adjudication whatever in the proceedings in the district court. Should such an adjudication occur and an assignee be appointed, we are unable to perceive why the assignee cannot deal with the purchaser as well as the mortgagor, if he seeks to question the validity of the deed or of the sale thereunder. With these questions, however, we have no concern. In this action of ejectment, the simple question is, Who has the legal title, the purchaser at the sale, or the defendant? The deed gave the trustee a power to sell and convey the legal title.

Whether this sale was made under such circumstances as to authorize a court of equity to set it aside in a direct proceeding for that purpose, is another question, which is not presented by this case. The court below simply declared the sale a nullity. It may be that the land was sacrificed, and that the trustee should have deferred the sale under the circumstances; but the court below did not pass on that point, and it is not, therefore, before this court.

Digitized by Google

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

The other judges concur.

REVERSED.

NOTE.—Undoubtedly there are decisions in a number of the district courts sitting in bankruptcy, which are opposed to the view taken in the above case, and which go upon the ground that it was the intention of the bankruptcy act that all debts, including those secured by mortgage, should, after a petition in bankruptcy is filed, be presented to, or be enforced, under the superintendence of the bankruptcy tribunals. Without now entering into a discussion of this question, it may be remarked, that the principal case, as to the rights and remedies of creditors, seems to accord with views of the United States Supreme Court in its most recent judgments. Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wall. 551; Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul, decided December 22, 1873. These cases did not, however, involve the direct question as to the right of a mortgage creditor to proceed after a petition in bankruptcy is filed, to foreclose his mortgage by sale under a power or by bill in the state court, without the assent of the bankruptcy court.

Mode of Declaring Upon Coupons.

JAMES KENNARD v. CASS COUNTY.

United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Missouri
November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON and KREKEL, JJ.

1. Suits upon Coupons—Profert of Bonds Unnecessary.—The holder of coupons, payable to bearer, may sue thereon, without producing or being interested in the bonds to which they were originally attached. [Acc. Smith & Hall v. Clark county, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 6.]

2. Declaring upon Coupons—Averment of authority to execute.—Where there is no general authority in a public corporation to make negotiable paper, the special authority should be stated in the declaration, or by alleging the recital of the bonds in that respect.

3. ————. Recital of numbers, dates, etc.—In declaring on coupons, the instruments in suit should be identified on the face of the declaration by the number of the bond, date, sum and time of payment.

On demurrer to the petition. The petition seeks to recover on a large number of coupons. Each count is as follows:

Plaintiff states that the defendant herein, on the 11th day of July, 1870, made its certain instrument in writing commonly called a coupon, herewith filed, whereby defendant promised to pay to the bearer, on the 11th day of January, 1873, at, etc., the sum of $25, the same being the interest due on the date last aforesaid on a certain bond issued by the defendant, which said bond is therein mentioned. Plaintiff states that he is the owner, holder and bearer of said coupon; that defendant has failed to pay said coupon when due, although the same was duly presented for payment on the said 11th day of January, 1873, etc., and payment thereof refused; that said coupon remains due and unpaid, wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against defendant, etc.

The defendant demurs for that—

1. No cause of action is stated.

2. It is not stated that the bonds and coupons were made and issued by the county court of Cass county.

3. It is not stated that they were made in pursuance of any law of the state authorizing their issue; and

4. No facts are stated showing that the county or its officers were authorized to issue said bonds and coupons.

John D. Stevenson and Ewing & Smith, for the plaintiff; W. P. Hall, Gage & Ladd and Robert Adams, Jr., for the county.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.

The holder of coupons like those in suit may sue thereon, although he be not the owner of the bonds from which they were detached; and under a declaration, properly framed, may recover without producing or being interested in the bonds. Thomson v. Lee county, 3 Wall. 327; The City v. Lamson, 9 Wall. 477; McCoy v. Washington county, 7 Am. Law Reg. (O. S.) 193, per Mr. Justice GRIER, S. C., 3 Wallace, Jr. 381.

But where the maker is a county or other corporate body which has no inherent or general power to make such instruments, but can make them only by virtue of special authority, the principles of pleading require that such authority should appear, either by distinct averment of the special act conferring it, or by stating the recital of the bond in that respect.

The coupons, though detached, are related to the bonds to which they originally belonged, and by way of inducement or recital, this relation ought to appear on the face of the declaration or petition. The City v. Lamson, supra.

These views are not inconsistent with the case of The Railroad Company v. Otoe county, 1 Dillon C. C. 338, which was, in some respects peculiar, and where it was insisted that the pleader should state the facts showing that the county officers had the authority to issue the bonds, that is, should allege the election or other facts showing compliance with the preliminary steps on which the issue of the bonds was authorized; but this was held not to be necessary.

Experience in this class of litigation in other states has shown that it is also well that the coupons should be identified by the number of the bonds as well as by the date, amount, time of payment, etc., of the coupons themselves, as thereby the danger of the same instrument being more than once put in suit is much diminished.

For the reason that the authority of the county of Cass to issue the coupons ought to appear in the manner above stated, the demurrer is sustained, but the plaintiff may amend.

KREKEL, J., concurs. JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—Mode of declaring on coupons. Ring v. Johnson county, 6 Iowa 265; Wiley v. Board etc., 11 Minn. 371; Thomson v. Lee county 3 Wall. 327; The City v. Lamson, 9 Wall. 477; McCoy v. Washington county, 7 Am. Law Reg. (O. S.) 193.

Limitation of actions on coupons: The City v. Lamson, 9 Wall. 478; Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 282. S. C., 3 Wallace Jr. 381.

Coupons draw interest from the time they become due and payable. Aurora v. West, 7 Wall. 105; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206; Burroughs v. Richmond county, 65 North Car. 234.

Effect of the Rebellion on Powers of Sale in Deeds of Trust.

The Supreme Court of the United States, on the 7th inst., pronounced a very important opinion in the case of Washington University v. Finch et al., on appeal from the circuit court for the district of Missouri. Before the war, a debt had been contracted by a citizen of Virginia, to Washington University, secured by a deed of trust on property in Missouri, with the usual power to the trustee to sell on default of payment. During the rebellion the debtor, who was the grantor in the deed of trust, resided in the insurrectionary portion of Virginia, and the debt not being paid, and the creditor residing in Missouri, the trustee advertised and sold the property in pursuance of the terms of the deed of trust, the war being at the time of the sale, flagrant, and the non-intercourse act between the inhabitants of the two sections in full force. The question was as to the validity of such sale. The supreme court, Mr. Justice MILLER delivering the opinion, holds, reversing the decree below, that the property of citizens residing in an insurrectionary district, found in a loyal state is liable to seizure and sale for debts contracted before the war, even though such property be seized and sold while the war is pending. And in the case before it, the court decided that the sale by the trustee, pursuant to the power in the trust deed, conferred a good title. This case settles a point of great moment, which the previous decisions of the supreme court as to the effect of the war upon contracts had left in much uncertainty.

Digitized by Google

Supreme Court of the United States—Abstract of Decisions.

[From the New York Herald.]

Shipping; Collision.—Sapphire v. Napoleon III., Jan. 5, 1874. In the United States Supreme Court to-day, in the case of the ship Sapphire v. Napoleon III., Emperor of the French, from the California circuit court, recently argued on a question of construction of the decree formerly made in the case, the court held that where in the case of collision, the decree finds both vessels in fault and divides the damages between them, if one vessel has shown no damages, it is nevertheless liable for half the damages and costs of the other, although that vessel was also at fault. Under this decision the Sapphire, the libelled ship, which, as claimant could show, received no damage below, is held for half the damages of the Euryale, the French ship, and any damages actually suffered by her are regarded as not having been contemplated by the court and as foreign to the case. The collision occurred in the harbor of San Francisco, in December 1870, while the Euryale was moored and the Sapphire at anchor, the latter dragging her anchor and colliding with the former during a gale. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Negligence; Fellow Servants in Common Employment.—Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Fort, Jan. 5, 1874. In the case of the Union Pacific railroad company against Fort, from the circuit court for Nebraska, the plaintiff engaged his son to work for the company, as helper at a moulding machine or as a common workman; but subsequently, without his consent, an agent or superintendent sent the lad aloft upon the ladder to adjust machinery. In obeying the order the boy lost an arm, which was torn off by a belt. On these facts the court hold that the plaintiff could recover for the damage sustained by his child, as the employment at which he was put, when hurt, was not within his contract of service; also, that if such a company is not the insurer of the lives and limbs of its employes, it does impliedly engage not to expose them to such hazard when it is not reasonable or necessary to do so. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissented, holding that both the superintendent and the lad were fellow-servants in a common employment, and that it is well settled there could be no recovery in such a case against the employer.

Ejectment; United States Patent.—Henshaw v. Bissel, Jan. 5, 1874. In the case of Henshaw et al. v. Bissel, from the circuit court for California, on an action of ejectment brought by Bissel for the possession of certain lands in Butte county, of that state, in which both parties claimed under patents from the United States, the court affirm the judgment below, finding the title to be in Bissel. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Sale under Deed of Trust, Debtor residing in insurrectionary State.—Jan. 7, 1874. Washington University of Missouri v. Finch et al.—Appeal from the circuit court for Missouri.—In this case the court below held that parties living in insurrectionary districts during the war, and who prior thereto had given deeds of trust on certain lands in Missouri, with authority to the trustee to sell in default of payment of the debt which the deeds were given to secure, were entitled to a suspension of their contracts pending the war, and would after its close be entitled to perform their contracts and redeem their lands, notwithstanding a sale in their absence by virtue of the provisions of the deeds. This decision is here reversed, the court holding that a sale of real estate made in pursuance of such provisions in a deed of trust, is valid, notwithstanding the grantors in the deed were citizens and residents of states in insurrection at the time of the sale, made while the war was flagrant. The property of such citizens found in a loyal state is liable to seizure and sale for debts contracted before the war, as in the case of other non-residents. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

False Imprisonment; Military Arrests in Districts not under Martial Law; Indemnifying Act of 1867.—Bean v. Beckwith.—Jan. 7, 1874. Certificate of division from the circuit court for Vermont.—The questions for decision in this case were, first, whether the plea of a military officer, who had arrested and imprisoned a private citizen without warrant or other authority, except that given to the president by the act of 1865, that the act was done in obedience to executive and military orders, was a bar to an action for false imprisonment; and, second, whether the action ought to be dismissed by force of the provisions of an act to declare valid and conclusive, certain proclamations of the president and acts done in pursuance thereof or of his orders in the suppression of the late rebellion, approved March 2, 1867. The court answers both questions in the negative, holding, in substance, that such military authority did not exist in the absence of martial law in the district where the arrest was made, where there were no military operations and the party arrested was in no way connected with the military service, and the courts were in unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction, and that it was not enough to bring the act within the act of 1867, that the party doing it was generally employed in the executive department of the government, to come within the indemnity of the statute. The act must be done in pursuance of express orders or proclamation issued by the president or under his immediate authority. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Admiralty Jurisdiction; Attachment against property of Non-resident; Waiver by appearance.—Atkins et al. v. Fibre Disintegrating company—Jan. 7, 1874.—Appeal from the circuit court for the eastern district of New York.—This was a libel for freight due on a cargo brought from Kingston and Port Morant, Jam., for demurrage while getting a cargo and for damages to the ship by being stranded at Port Morant. The decree of the district court was for the libellants, except as to the damages for getting ashore, and they appealed to the circuit court from so much of the decree as disallowed the damages, and the respondents from entire decree. The circuit court reversed the decree on a question of practice raised, holding that the district court, as a court of admiralty, had no authority to attach the property of a non-resident of the district, under the prohibition contained in the eleventh section of the Judiciary act of 1789. The libellants here claimed that by a voluntary appearance made on the part of the company, it had waived the benefit of this objection, and on the merits of the question of the right of attachment in such cases, they contended that it exists, and that without it there is no remedy, whatever the right of action. The court sustained this theory and reversed and remanded the cause. The case has been several times reported. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

———; ———.New England Mutual Insurance Company v. Detroit and Cleveland Navigation Company—Jan. 7, 1874. Appeal from the circuit court for Ohio.—This cause involved the same question decided in the last case of the right of attachment in admiralty suits in personam brought against non-residents of the district where the action is brought, and the decision made in that case disposes of the question. Reversed and remanded. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Claims against United States; Indian Depredations.—Guttman & Stuart v. United States—Jan. 7, 1874. Appeal from the court of claims.—This action was brought under the act of 1849 to recover for cattle lost by Indian depredations while they were in government service in the transportation of supplies. The court below held that it was not sufficiently shown that the Indians were a public enemy, to enable the claimant to recover, and that the service was not military, and the petition was dismissed. This court affirms the judgment, saying that it does not appear whether the Indians were hostile to the government or only desired the cattle of the claimant, and that such a service, remote from the operations of war, were not contemplated by the act providing for reimbursing losses in the service. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

———; Violation of public Contract by purchasing of another.—Shrewsbury v. United States—Jan. 7, 1874. Appeal from the court of claims.—This was a suit to recover on a contract made with the government for transportation, the claimant alleging that subsequently the contract was violated, and his interests destroyed by a contract made with and performed by other parties. These parties sold to the government and delivered grain over the same route covered by the contract of claimant. The court held that the contract with the other parties was not for transportation, but purely one of purchase, with an agreement for delivery, which it was competent for the government to make, and that, therefore, the petition was properly dismissed. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Infringement; Invention not patentable.— Hicks v. Kelsey—Jan. 7, 1874. Appea lfrom the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois.—This is an affirmance of a decree dismissing a bill brought against Kelsey for an alleged infringement of the plaintiff's patent for an improved truck and wagon reach, the court holding that the invention claimed is not patentable. Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion.

Digitized by Google

Mandamus against Secretary of Treasury.—United States ex rel. Lewis et al. v. Boutwell, secretary of the treasury—Jan. 7, 1874.—Error to the supreme court of the District of Columbia. This was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the secretary of the treasury to pay a claim of the Choctaw nation to its agents, but having abated, it was now dismissed. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion.

Marine Insurance; Policy to take effect before its Date; Loss happening before Date of Policy.—Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company v. Folsom, Jan. 7, 1874—Error to the circuit court for the eastern district of New York. This was the affirmance of a decree, sustaining the validity of a policy of marine insurance which was dated on the first of March, 1869, but which, by its terms, was to commence on the first of January of that year, and run for twelve months. The ship insured having been lost at sea within the time covered by the policy and before its date, and the fact appearing on the company's disaster book, the court holding that under such circumstances the insurers' neglect to state the report of her loss, which had been publicly printed and circulated, did not affect or avoid the policy. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion.

Consideration of Note; Release of Dower.—Sykes v. Chadwick—Jan. 7, 1874—Error to the supreme court of the District of Columbia. This was an affirmance of a judgment for Mrs. Chadwick on a note executed to her by her husband and Sykes jointly, the consideration of which was her consent to release her right of dower in property owned by them and which they wished to sell. The court held that the contract of the note was valid, and that under the laws of the district, the suit could be maintained in the name of Mrs. Chadwick. Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice MILLER dissented.

Notices of Books and Exchanges.

Reports of cases argued and determined in the supreme court of Tennessee for the middle and western divisions, for the year 1871. Joseph B. Heiskell, Reporter. Volume 4. Nashville: Wheeler, Marshall & Bruce, 20 North Cherry street.

The latest date to which these reports bring us, is May 17, 1871. This volume is thus nearly three years behind time. We feel sure, however, that no blame is to be imputed to the reporter on this account. In Tennessee, the offices of attorney-general and reporter are united in the same person; and the present incumbent, in addition to the duty of reporting the decisions of a court composed of six judges actively at work, is obliged to argue every case in the supreme court in which the state is interested or a party, including the criminal cases appealed from the different circuits, and also to represent the state in civil suits in other courts. We presume there is no official in Tennessee that does a greater amount of work, and does it well, than Mr. Heiskell.

The present volume is not different from its predecessors. We find the same brief and pointed but clear head-notes, such as we have grown familiar with in using Mr. Heiskell's Digest of Decisions. In his power of condensing into a brief compass, statements of legal doctrine without throwing away any of the substance, we have always regarded Mr. Heiskell as a model. The paragraphs of his digest read like the terse sentences of old Comyn. Nor do we miss in this volume the same patient collection of cases cited, placed in each case under the paragraph of the syllabus to which they relate. The index displays the same attention to details and careful workmanship.

This volume, like all the later Tennessee Reports, is double-leaded, and widely spaced. Printed like the Pennsylvania State Reports, which we think a fair model of the manner in which a volume of reports should be printed, this volume would be reduced to one-half its present size. The reporter, however, is not responsible for this, as the printing is a matter of public contract; and the secrets of how money is made at public printing, would, if written, no doubt make a large book. It is to be said, however in its favor, that in those points which go to make up a well manufactured book—good paper, good press-work and good binding—no American reports can be produced which surpass this.

In glancing hurriedly over the cases reported in this volume, we do not see any that strike us as possessing peculiar importance.

Merriman v. Lacefield, p. 209, holds that a sale by a father to a child will not be treated as an advancement, merely because the price paid was inadequate.

In Riggs v. White, p. 503, the court say that they will not, after the term of the court at which it was rendered, set aside their own judgment, to allow a plea of bankruptcy of the defendant before the judgment was rendered, but since the judgment in the inferior court, on the ground that the judgment in the supreme court was obtained by surprise, and before the cause was reached. Nor will they, according to Langley v. Swayne, note, p. 506, entertain a plea in abatement, setting up a discharge in bankruptcy, although the discharge may have been granted before the filing of the record for writ of error.

Moss v. Bettis, p. 661, holds that a person who undertakes, although it may be for the particular occasion only, to carry by river, for hire, without special contract, incurs the responsibility of a common carrier.

Elrod v. Alexander, p. 342, holds that what is contraband of war is a question of law for the court, and that it is error to leave it to the jury. We should think so.

Garder v. Barger, p. 668, holds that a contract for a horse, showing on its face that it was intended for service in the Confederate cavalry, if made within the Confederate lines, is not void for illegality.

Hill v. Bowers, p. 272, holds that a conveyance of a register in bankruptcy of the real estate of the bankrupt to the assignee, divests the title of the bankrupt, so that if he dies afterwards, and before the sale by the assignee, his widow will not be entitled to dower. To make this decision intelligible, it must be understood that in Tennessee, the widow is entitled to dower in those lands only of which her husband died seized.

State v. McAuley, p. 424, holds that the widow of a deceased trustee, is not a competent witness to prove that her husband in his life time received a certain sum of trust money, part of which he loaned, and the remainder she paid over after his death to the administrators of her husband. Quite correct; but is it not time that the legislatures should begin to consider the propriety of changing rules of evidence of this character?

Barker v. Wilson, p. 268, lays down the rule that a bargain and sale made by an infant husband jointly with his wife of full age, of real estate of the wife, is voidable at the election of the husband—illustrating another barbarism of the ancient law, which it should seem the legislature might well look to. In all common sense, and fairness to third persons, it would seem that when a young man has got far enough along in the world so that the law must regard him as the head of a family, it ought to cease to regard him as an infant.

Dodd v. Benthal, p. 601, reverses this picture, and informs us that, on a similar principle, an infant who is a married woman, has the option to dissent from her deed, within a reasonable time after her discoverture, though her coverture may continue for more than twenty years.

Greenwald v. Roberts, p. 494: A purchase made pending an injunction inhibiting a sale, is void as against the interest of the complainant in the bill, but valid as to the vendor.

Mills v. Allison, p. 385, and Bond v. Greenwald, p. 453: A contract payable in gold is to be discharged by the payment of as many dollars in legal tender notes as the gold was worth on the day the payment should have been made under the contract, and judgment is to be rendered in dollars for that sum.

We may, perhaps, find room to notice other interesting cases in this volume in our "Notes of Recent Decisions," next week.

We observe that Mr. Heiskell adheres to his previous plan of publishing the criminal cases separately; consequently we find no criminal cases in this volume.

The Daily Register, New York City, law journal of the city and county of New York, reports the proceedings and decisions of the local courts of New York City.

The Lower Canada Jurist. Montreal: Printed and published by John Lowell.

We have received, through the courtesy of the publisher, the numbers of this valuable publication from January to September, 1873. We hope to find time to give it a more extended notice hereafter.

—THE supreme court of Illinois met at Springfield on the 6th instant. All the judges present except Judge MCALLISTER.

Digitized by Google

The New Pennsylvania Constitution—A Summary of its Leading Features.

[From the Financier.]

The new constitution of Pennsylvania, recently ratified by popular vote of two to one, contains some noteworthy provisions of reform. The terms of state officers are extended by it. The governor is to serve four years; senators, four years; representatives, two years; secretary of state, four years; auditor general, three years; treasurer, two years; supreme court judges, (hereafter to be seven in number instead of five,) twenty-one years instead of fifteen, and not to be again eligible. The governor, treasurer, and auditor are prohibited from serving two consecutive terms. The legislature is prohibited from passing "any local or special law" for regulating the affairs of counties, cities, and the like; authorizing laying-out, opening, or maintaining roads, highways, or streets; altering or locating county-seats; incorporating cities, towns, or villages, or changing their charters; creating or extending corporations; and from doing a number of other things specified. No obligation or liability of any corporation to the state shall be in any way changed or lightened, or affected by the legislature. Unless changed by a law receiving a two-thirds vote, the state election shall be on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November. Each ballot, as cast, shall be numbered in the order of its receipt, and the number entered on the list of voters opposite the name of the voter; any voter may also write his own name on his ballot; all laws in respect to the manner of voting shall be uniform throughout the state, but no voter shall be deprived of his vote by not being registered.

Article nine, in respect to taxation and finance, provides that the power to tax corporations and their property shall not be surrendered or suspended by any contract to which the state shall be a party; that no state debt shall be created except to repel invasion, repress insurrection, defend the state in war, pay existing debt, or supply casual deficiencies of revenue, and the limit of debt for the last named purpose shall be $1,000,000; that all laws authorizing borrowing on behalf of the state shall specify the purpose for which it is wanted, and it shall be used for that purpose solely; that the state shall not assume all or any part of the debt of any municipality, "unless such debt shall have been contracted to enable the state to repel invasion, suppress domestic insurrection, defend itself in time of war, or to assist the state in the discharge of any portion of its present indebtedness;" that the state sinking fund shall be maintained, sufficient to pay interest on the state debt and at least $250,000 of principal annually; that all the money, over the necessary reserve, shall be used in paying the debt, and the sinking fund shall not be invested in or loaned upon anything but bonds of the state or of the United States; that monthly statements about the reserve shall be published; and that making any profit out of state funds, or using them in an unauthorized way, shall be punishable as a misdemeanor. The following important sections of this article we give entire:

"SEC. 6. The credit of the commonwealth shall not be pledged or loaned to any individual, company, corporation or association, nor shall the commonwealth become a joint owner or stockholder in any company, association or corporation.

"SEC. 7. The general assembly shall not authorize any county, city, borough, township or incorporated district to become a stockholder in any company, association or corporation, or to obtain or appropriate money for or to loan its credit to any corporation, association, institution or individual.

"SEC. 8. The debt of any county, city, borough, township, school district, or other municipality or incorporated district, except as herein provided, shall never exceed seven per centum upon assessed value of the taxable property therein, nor shall any municipality or district incur any new debt or increase its indebtedness to an amount exceeding two per centum upon such assessed valuation of property without the assent of the electors thereof, at a public election, in such manner as shall be provided by law; but any city, the debt of which now exceeds seven per centum of such assessed valuation, may be authorized by law to increase the same three per centum (in the aggregate at any one time) upon such valuation.

"SEC. 10. Any county, township, school district, or other municipaltiy in incurring any indebtedness, shall at or before the time of so doing, provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest and also the principal thereof within thirty years."

No debt shall be contracted, and no liability incurred, by any municipal commission, except according to an appropriation previously made; and every city shall create a sinking fund for the payment of its debt. All corporate charters now existing and not already used or in organization are made void; all existing corporations can have their charters altered, or any law passed for their benefit, only on condition of becoming subject to the new constitution. No corporation shall do any business not expressly authorized in its charter, or take or hold any real estate except what is necessary for its legitimate business. "No corporation shall issue stocks or bonds except for money, labor done, or money for property actually received; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void; the stock and indebtedness of corporations shall not be increased except in pursuance of general law, nor without the consent of the persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock first obtained at a meeting to be held after sixty days' notice given in pursuance of law."

Article seventeen relates to railroads. It provides that all railroads and canals shall be public highways, and all companies common carriers; that any company organized for the purpose, may construct and operate a road between any two points in the state and connect at the state line with other roads; that every company may intersect with any other, and receive and transfer business without discrimination. Every company shall maintain a transfer office, with its books open to inspection by stockholders or creditors; the right to transportation is declared uniform and equal to all; transportation charges shall not exceed the charges for carrying the same class of persons or property in the same direction to a more distant station, but excursion and commutation tickets are allowed. No company owning, or leasing, or managing a railroad or canal, shall consolidate with, or lease or buy the property of, or in any way control, any competing or parallel line, nor shall any officer act as officer in such line; the question of the parallelism or competition shall be decided by jury. No officer or employe shall be interested in furnishing material or supplies to the road, or in the business of transportation over it; no discrimination in charges or motive power shall be made; no free passes shall be granted, nor shall passes be granted at a discount except to officers and employes.

The above is a sketch of the most noteworthy provisions of the new constitution, which took effect on Thursday of this week. All attempts to improve the organic law of both state and nation are of great interest, and these provisions should receive attention. One of them, which is of national importance, is that which simply makes the state election come on the same day of the year with the presidential election; this puts an end to the corrupt efforts regularly made, in each presidential year, to "carry Pennsylvania" in October. The change should be followed by other states, and if it proves the forerunner of the abolition of the electoral system altogether—about the most clumsy and mischievous provision in the federal constitution—Pennsylvania will have done almost as much to improve politics as she has done heretofore to corrupt it.

Legal News and Notes.

—A GOOD notion of the granges of Iowa is that which binds the members to settle their disputes by arbitration. It is said to reduce the lawyers almost to starvation in some quarters. Well, if arbitration is good in the big quarrels between nations, why not in the smaller ones that produce so much petty war and crime? But we suspect we shall have use for Blackstone and Cooley some time yet, and that even when the "swords are beaten into ploughshares and the spears into pruning-hooks," the lawyers will manage to live by the hooks.—[Missouri Democrat.

— Ex-Sheriff Brennan of New York city, and his deputy, Shields, were on the 9th instant, committed to Ludlow street jail for thirty days, and to pay a fine of $250 each, by Judge Daniels of the court of oyer and terminer, for contempt of court in permitting Henry W. Genet, placed in his custody under sentence of imprisonment, to escape. The penalty imposed is the extreme limit of the law applicable to such cases.

— It is reported that Judge Busteed of Alabama, and Judge Durell of Louisiana, becoming somewhat alarmed at the investigation which is to be made into their official conduct, and fearing impeachment, propose sending in their resignations to the president at once.

—The Supreme court of Iowa has decided that a sale of property for taxes to any one of a ring or combination of tax-buyers is void, and that the title does not pass thereby, nor can the penalty be enforced.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION:
$3 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

Bankrupt Act—Illegal Preferences.

We lay before our readers in this issue, the recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the effect of the bankrupt act on the right of creditors to resort to state process to acquire liens on the property of insolvent debtors, and as to the elements essential to constitute an illegal preference, or an intent on the debtor's part to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act. Practically viewed, the opinion is one of unequalled importance. It is not, perhaps, too much to say that it revolutionizes all current notions on the subject; but it is strongly reasoned and embodies the deliberate judgment of the entire bench.

Statute Revision in New York.

We learn from the Albany Law Journal that the revision of the statute of law of New York, is progressing as rapidly as is consistent with a thorough execution of the work, and in a satisfactory manner. Among the features of the new code, we note the following: The word "ejectment" is formally recognized, and the word "replevy" restored, in place of the awkward phrase, "claim the immediate delivery," which had supplanted it in the Code of Procedure. The statute against purchasing lands held adversely, is very sensibly expunged. Another sensible provision is that in an action for partition, if the title is in dispute, the parties shall not be remitted to a separate suit, but the question of title shall be tried and settled in the same action in which the partition is sought. Another provision allows reversioners and remainder-men to maintain an action for partition; but this allowance is wisely confined to cases where an actual partition can be had, and does not extend to permitting sales for partition. The reason assigned for this is that sales of land encumbered by an intermediate estate, generally result in a sacrifice of the property sold; and as the co-tenants in such cases are generally infant heirs, a proceeding ought not to be permitted which might, in many cases, work irreparable injury to them. One remedy by action has been provided for the recovery of dower; and to accomplish this, it is recommended that the surrogate, as such, be deprived of his present jurisdiction over this subject; and jurisdiction of proceedings for the recovery, as well as for the admeasurement of dower, is vested in the county courts.

Discretionary Power of Fixing Punishment in Criminal Cases.

The message of Governor Noyes to the Ohio Legislature contains the following suggestions of a reform in the laws with reference to the quantum of punishment in criminal cases:

"Another year's experience in the matter of hearing and deciding applications for pardon, has confirmed me in the opinion that the law should be so modified, as to leave less discretion with the courts in passing sentence for criminal offences. It often happens that two prisoners work side by side in the penitentiary, both sent there for precisely the same crime, one for one year and the other for ten. In such case, it is impossble to convince the convict incarcerated for the longer time that he has been fairly dealt with. And so long as he is stung with a sense of this injustice, he is not likely to reform. There is nothing approaching uniformity in the length of sentences pronounced by different judges for similar offences. I earnestly recommend that the criminal law be so changed as to secure more exact justice; so amended as to leave results affecting the lives and liberties of men less dependent upon the judgment, the temperament or the caprice of those who administer the law."

Undoubtedly, there must in most cases be a discretion reposed somewhere, and within certain prescribed limits, as to the quantum of punishment which a given offence shall carry with it. In some states, as at common law, this discretion resides in the judge; in others it is reposed in the jury. Evidently the policy of the law should be to limit this discretion as much as possible. It would seem worth while to consider, whether in larceny, embezzlement, false pretences, and other like offences affecting property, the punishment might not be gauged more nearly by the value of the property affected by the crime. This might to some extent do away with what is now a reproach to the administration of justice, that the small thieves are punished more severely than the great ones. But in cases of homicide, and assaults to kill, wound or beat, where the defendant frequently acts upon strong provocation or from a principle of self-preservation, and where no two cases stand on the same footing with reference to the quality of the act committed, a provision of law which leaves a large discretion in the court or jury with reference to the quantum of the punishment, would seem to be conceived in a spirit of justice and mercy. At all events, the question deserves of more extended investigation and patient thought, than the average legislator will find time to bestow upon it; and the wise course would seem to be to submit it to a commission, to report to another session.

Liability of Master to Servant—Fellow Servants in Common Service.

The Supreme Court of the United States on the 5th inst., decided an interesting case as to the liability of masters to servants, where the main defence was that the servant injured, and the servant by whose fault he was injured, were fellow-servants in a common employment. We refer to the case of Fort v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. A full report of the case below is given in 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 259. The following is a brief statement of it:

The action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for an injury to his minor son, resulting in the loss of an arm while in the employ of the defendant.

The defendant, in its works at Omaha had a car department, of which Mr. Gamble was the superintendent; under him, and having immediate control of the shop, was a foreman, Mr. Ballou; under the foreman there were various sets, or, as a witness called them, "gangs," of men, under the immediate direction and control of some employe or "boss." Among those having control of a set or gang of men working in the shop was a Mr. Collett, whose duty it was to run and superintend the running of a certain machine, or certain machinery, in the shop. From the time the plaintiff's son was employed, he had been working under Collett, obeying his orders and directions; and the chief employment of the son had been at a moulding machine, receiving and putting away mouldings as they came from the machine. After the son had been thus engaged for some months, on the day the accident in question happened, a belt or band connected with a shaft, some fourteen or sixteen feet high, was off the drum, or pulley, and needed lacing. It did not very clearly appear whether the belt thus out of order belonged to the moulding machine or some other machine near by; but it was within the scope of Collett's duty to see that it was repaired. At the time of the accident, Collett, wishing to lace the band at the end near the floor, ordered the plaintiff's son, about sixteen years of age, to ascend a ladder resting on the shaft at the upper end, which shaft was in motion at the rate of one hundred and seventy-five or two hundred revolutions per minute, and hold or keep the band or belt away from the shaft, while he (Collett) laced or sewed it together at or near the floor; and the right arm of plaintiff's son, while thus engaged, pursuant to the orders of Collett, was caught, or in some way became entangled, in the belt, or drawn between it and the shaft, and was instantly crushed to pieces and torn from his body.

Digitized by Google

The jury made the following special finding in regard to the nature of the employment of Collett and of the plaintiff's son, and the cause of the injury, to-wit:

"We find that the car department of the defendant was under the management of a general superintendent, who employed and dismissed the hands; that the shop, as to practical operations therein conducted, was under a foreman; that the employes were divided, according to their work, into sets, with an under or immediate foreman; that one of these underforemen was Mr. Collett, named in the petition, under whom plaintiff's son was to and did serve, as a workman or helper, and whose orders he was to and did obey; that Collett had charge of running and superintending certain machinery in the shop. We find that the plaintiff's son was injured in executing or carrying out an order of Collett, as described in the petition; that this order related to a matter within the scope of Collett's duty and employment. We find that the order to the plaintiff's son (in carrying out which he lost his arm) was one which was not within the scope of the son's duty and employment. We find that it was not a reasonable order, and that its execution was attended with hazard to life or limb, and that a prudent man would not have ordered the boy to execute it."

There was no statute of the state touching the case.

The judgment of the circuit court for the plaintiff was affirmed. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion. The ground of liability was that, although an employer may not be an insurer of the lives and limbs of his servants, he is impliedly bound not to expose them to such hazard when not reasonable or necessary to do so, and the extra-hazardous service at which the plaintiff's son was put when he was injured, was not within the scope of his employment or the contract of service. Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissented on the ground that the boy and the superior servant were fellow servants in the same common employment, and hence the employer was not liable.

—GOVERNOR BEVERIDGE, in his message to the Illinois legislature, urges the completion of the revision of the laws by the present general assembly, and the publication of the laws in a compact form, for the use of the various officers throughout the state. He says: "The state has no copies of the session laws for distribution. If it had, the laws in that form are inconvenient, especially to a large number of persons, not versed in law, who exercise official duties for the public good, to the sacrifice of their own private interests."

Bankrupt Act—Illegal Preference—Judgment in State Court.

WILSON, ASSIGNEE OF VANDERHOOF BROS. v. CITY BANK OF ST. PAUL.

Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873.

Bankrupt Act—Illegal preference—Judgment in State Court.—Section 39 of the bankrupt act as respects an insolvent debtor, suffering his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to a creditor, or to defeat or delay the operation of the act, construed, and the following propositions ruled:

1. That something more than passive non-resistance of an insolvent debtor to regular judicial proceedings, in which a judgment and levy on his property are obtained, when the debt is due and he is without just defence to the action, is necessary to show a preference of a creditor, or a purpose to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act.

2. That the fact that the debtor under such circumstances does not file a petition in bankruptcy, is not a sufficient evidence of such preference, or of intent to defeat the operation of the act.

3. That, though the judgment creditor in such case may know the insolvent condition of the debtor, his levy and seizure are not void under the circumstances, nor any violation of the bankrupt law.

4. That a lien thus obtained by him will not be displaced by subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor, though within four months of the filing of the petition.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice MILLER, as follows:

This case comes before us on a certificate of division in opinion between the circuit and district judge for the district of Minnesota.

The statement of facts and the questions certified are as follows:

The complainant is the assignee in bankruptcy of the firm of Vanderhoof Bros., lately merchants in the city of Saint Paul. The defendant is the City Bank of St. Paul. The bill is filed to determine which of the parties is entitled to the stock of goods, of the bankrupts, or the proceeds thereof. The assignee claims the goods, or the proceeds thereof, as assets of the bankrupts' estate. The bank claims the same by virtue of a judgment, execution, and levy thereunder. The facts are as follows:

On the 26th of February, 1870, judgment by default was rendered by one of the district courts of the State of Minnesota in favor of the bank against Vanderhoof Bros. for the sum of $2,130. On the same day execution was issued, and the sheriff immediately made a levy upon the whole stock of goods of the debtors, which was sold by him for $2,385, which is now in the hands of the bankrupt court to await the determination of this suit. The suit by the bank was brought on promissory notes, commercial paper made by the debtors, Vanderhoof Bros., to the City Bank of St. Paul, one of which notes was more than fourteen days past due when suit was brought thereon by the bank.

After the levy of the said execution, and before the sale by the sheriff, Vanderhoof Bros. were adjudicated bankrupts on the petition of creditors filed against them after judgment had been obtained, and levy made under the execution. The Vanderhoofs had no defence to the notes upon which the bank had sued them, and put in no defence. They had no property except their said stock in trade, which, at cost prices, was about equal to the amount of their liabilities.

The debtors, Vanderhoof Bros., were insolvent when said suit was brought against them by the bank, and the bank had then reasonable cause to believe it, and knew that they had committed an act of bankruptcy, and that they had no property but their said stock in trade. The Vanderhoofs gave no notice to any of their creditors of the suit commenced against them by the bank, and, having no defence, did not defend it nor go into voluntary bankruptcy, nor otherwise make any effort to prevent the judgment being obtained or the levy of the execution.

On the trial the following questions arose, in relation to which the judges were opposed in opinion:

I. Whether or not an intent on the part of said debtors, Vanderhoof Bros., to suffer their property to be taken on legal process, to-wit, the said execution, with intent to give a preference to said bank, or with intent thereby to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act, can be inferred from the foregoing facts.

Digitized by Google

II. Whether, under said facts, the said bank, in obtaining said judgment and making the said levy had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended.

III. Whether, under said facts, the bank obtained by the levy of the execution a valid lien on the said goods as against the assignee in bankruptcy.

The questions thus presented to this court require, for a satisfactory answer, a careful consideration and construction of sections thirty-five and thirty-nine of the bankrupt law, with reference to the general spirit and purpose of that law. In looking to these, the first and most important consideration which demands our attention is the discrimination made by the act between the cases of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. In both classes of cases, undoubtedly, the primary object is to secure a just distribution of the bankrupt's property among his creditors, and in both the secondary object is the release of the bankrupt from the obligation to pay the debts of those creditors.

But in case of voluntary bankruptcy, the aid of the law is invoked by the bankrupt himself, with the purpose of being discharged from his debts as his principal motive, and in the other, the movement is made by his creditors with the purpose of securing the appropriation of his property to their payment, the discharge being with them a matter of no weight and often contested.

There is a corresponding difference in the facts on which the action of the court can be invoked in these different classes of bankruptcy. When the party himself seeks the aid of the court, the averment he is required to make is a very simple one, namely, that "he is unable to pay all his debts in full, and is willing to surrender all his estate and effects for the benefit of his creditors, and desires to obtain the benefit of the act," that is, to be discharged from the claims of his creditors. On filing a petition containing this request, he is declared by the court a bankrupt. The allegation cannot be traversed, nor is any issue or enquiry as to its truth permitted. The administration of his effects proceeds thereafter under the direction of the court, and may end in paying all his debts with a surplus to be returned to the bankrupt, or the result may be nothing for the creditors, and the unconditional release of the bankrupt.

But while the debtor may, on this broad basis, call on the court to administer his estate, the creditor who desires to do the same thing is limited to a few facts or circumstances, the existance of which are essential to his right to appeal to the court. And when any one of these facts is set forth in a petition to the court by the creditor, the truth of the allegation may be denied by the debtor, and on the issue thus found, he may demand the verdict of a jury.

The reason for this wide difference in the proceedings in the two cases is obvious enough. When a man is himself willing to refer his embarrassed condition to the proper court with a full surrender of all his property, no harm can come to any one but himself, and there can be no solid objection to the course he pursues. But when a person claims to take from another all control of his property, to arrest him in the exercise of his occupation, and to impair his standing as a business man; in short, to place him in a position which may ruin him in the midst of a prosperous career, the precise circumstances or facts on which he is authorized to do this, should not only be well defined in the law, but clearly established in the court.

It is the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act which lays down, in nine or ten sub-divisions, the facts and circumstances which give a man's creditors the right to have him declared a bankrupt, and his property administered in a bankruptcy court. One of them is the case of a person, who being a bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money or other property, estate, rights, or credits, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure or suffer his property to be taken on legal process with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or to any person or persons, who may be liable for him as endorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, or with intent by such disposition of his property to defeat or delay the operation of the act. And the same section declares that if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned, or transferred, contrary to the act; provided, the person receiving such payment or conveyance, had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended, or that the debtor was insolvent.

The case before us is one of involuntary bankruptcy, but there is no question here whether the party was rightfully declared a bankrupt. The statement of facts shows that the debtors were insolvent when the bank commenced its proceedings in the state court, and that the bank had then reasonable cause to believe they were insolvent, and knew that they had committed an act of bankruptcy, to-wit, had permitted one of their notes to go unpaid more than fourteen days after it was due.

It is maintained that under these circumstances the bankrupt "suffered his property to be taken on legal process with intent to give a preference to the bank, and to defeat or delay the operation of the act." Undoubtedly, the facts stated bring the bank within the proviso, as to knowledge of the debtor's insolvency; and if the debtor suffered his property to be taken, within the meaning of the statute, with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the act, then the assignee shall recover the property; so that this sufferance and this intent on the part of the bankrupt are the matters to be decided. The first and principal question on which the judges became divided is, whether such intent is to be inferred from the facts stated.

The thirty-fifth section of the act, which is designed to prevent fraudulent preferences of a person in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, declares that any attachment or seizure under execution of such person's property, procured by him with a view to give such a preference, shall be void if the act be done within four months preceding the filing of the petition in bankruptcy by or against him. Though the main purpose of the thirty-ninth section is to define acts of the trader which make him a bankrupt, and that of the thirty-fifth is to prevent preferences by an insolvent debtor in view of bankruptcy, both of them have the common purpose of making such preferences void, and enabling the assignee of the bankrupt to recover the property; and both of them make this to depend on the intent with which the act was done by the bankrupt, and the knowledge of the bankrupt's insolvent condition, by the other party to the transaction. Both of them describe, substantially, the same acts of payment, transfer, or seizure of property so declared void. It is, therefore, very strongly to be inferred that the act of suffering the debtor's property to be taken on legal process in section thirty-nine, is precisely the same as procuring it to be attached or seized on execution in section thirty-five. Indeed the words procure and suffer are both used in section thirty-nine.

What, then, is the true meaning of that phrase in the act? In both cases it must be accompanied with an intent. In section thirty-five it is to give a preference to a creditor; in section thirty-nine it must be to give a preference to a creditor, or to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act. In both there must be the positive purpose of doing an act forbidden by that statute, and the thing described must be done in the promotion of this unlawful purpose.

The facts of the case before us do not show any positive or affirmative act of the debtors, from which such intent may be inferred. Through the whole of the legal proceedings against them they remained perfectly passive. They owed a debt which they were unable to pay when it became due. The creditor sued them and recovered judgment, and levied execution on their property. They afforded him no facilities to do this, and they interposed no hindrance. It is not pretended that any positive evidence exists of a wish or design on their part to give this creditor a preference, or oppose or delay the operation of the bankrupt act.

Digitized by Google

There is nothing morally wrong in their course in this matter. They were sued for a just debt. They had no defence to it, and they made none. To have made an effort by dilatory or false pleas to delay a judgment in the state court would have been a moral wrong, and a fraud upon the due administration of the law. There was no obligation on them to do this, either in law or in ethics. Any other creditor whose debt was due could have sued as well as this one, and any of them could have instituted compulsory bankruptcy proceedings. The debtor neither hindered nor facilitated any one of them. How is it possible from this to infer, logically, an actual purpose to prefer one creditor to another, or to hinder or delay the operation of the bankrupt act?

It is said, however, that such an intent is a legal inference from such inaction by the debtor, necessary to the successful operation of the bankrupt law; that the grand feature of that law is to secure equality of distribution among creditors in all cases of insolvency; and that, to secure this, it is the legal duty of the insolvent, when sued by one creditor in an ordinary proceeding likely to end in judgment and seizure of property, to file himself a petition of voluntary bankruptcy, and that this duty is one to be inferred from the spirit of the law, and is essential to its successful operation.

The argument is not without force, and has received the assent of a large number of the district judges, to whom the administration of the bankrupt law is more immediately confided. We are, nevertheless, not satisfied of its soundness. We have already said that there is no moral obligation on the part of the insolvent to do this, unless the statute requires it, and then only, because it is duty imposed by the law. It is equally clear that there is no such duty imposed by that act, in express terms. It is, therefore, an argument solely of implication. This implication is said to arise from the supposed purpose of the statute to secure equality of distribution in all cases of insolvency, and to make the argument complete, it is further necessary to hold that this can only be done in bankruptcy proceedings under that statute. Does the statute justify so broad a proposition? Does it in effect forbid all proceedings to collect debts in cases of insolvency, in other courts, and in all other modes than by bankruptcy [proceedings?] We do not think that its purpose of securing equality of distribution is designed to be carried so far.

As before remarked, the voluntary clause is wholly voluntary. No intimation is given that the bankrupt must file a petition under any circumstances. While his right to do so is without any other limit than his own sworn averment that he is unable to pay all his debts, there is not a word from which we can infer any legal obligation on him to do so. Such an obligation would take from the right the character of a privilege, and confer on it that of a burdensome, and often, ruinous duty.

It is, in its essence, involuntary bankruptcy. But the initiation in this kind of bankruptcy is, by the statute, given to the creditor, and is not imposed on the debtor. And it is only given to the creditor in a limited class of cases. The argument we are combatting goes upon the hypothesis that there is another class given to the creditor by inference, namely, where the debtor ought himself to go into court as a bankrupt, and fails to do it. We do not see the soundness of this implication from anything in the statute.

We do not construe the act as intended to cover all cases of insolvency, to the exclusion of other judicial proceedings. It is very liberal in the classes of insolvents which it does include, and needs no extension in this direction by implication. But it still leaves, in a great majority of cases, parties who are really insolvent, to the chances that their energy, care, and prudence in business may enable them finally to recover without disastrous failure or positive bankruptcy. All experience shows both the wisdom and justice of this policy.

Many find themselves with ample means, good credit, large business, technically insolvent; that is, unable to meet their current obligations as fast as they mature. But by forbearance of creditors, by meeting only such debts as are pressed, and even by the submission of some of their property to be seized on execution, they are finally able to pay all, and to save their commercial character and much of their property. If creditors are not satisfied with this, and the parties have committed an act of bankruptcy, any creditor can institute proceedings in a bankruptcy court. But until this is done, their honest struggle to meet their debts and to avoid the breaking up of all their business, is not, of itself, to be construed into an act of bankruptcy, or a fraud upon the act.

It is also argued, that inasmuch as to lay by and permit one creditor to obtain judgment and levy on property, necessarily gives that creditor a preference, the debtor must be supposed to intend that which he knows will follow.

The general legal proposition is true, that where a person does a positive act, the consequences of which he knows beforehand, he must be held to intend those consequences. But it cannot be inferred that a man intends, in the sense of desiring, promoting, or procuring it, a result of other persons' acts, when he contributes nothing to their success or completion, and is under no legal or moral obligation to hinder or prevent them.

Argument confirmatory of these views may be seen in the fact that all the other acts or modes of preference of creditors found in both the sections we have mentioned, in direct context with the one under consideration, are of a positive and affirmative character, and are evidences of an active desire or wish to prefer one creditor to others. Why, then, should a passive indifference and inaction, where no action is required by positive law or good morals, be construed into such a preference as the law forbids?

The construction thus contended for is, in our opinion, not justified by the words of either of the sections referred to, and can only be sustained by imputing to the general scope of the bankrupt act, a harsh and illiberal purpose, at variance with its true spirit and with the policy which prompted its enactment.

Undoubtedly, very slight evidence of an affirmative character of the existence of a desire to prefer one creditor, or of acts done with a view to secure such preference, might be sufficient to invalidate the whole transaction. Such evidence might be sufficient to leave the matter to a jury, or to support a decree, because the known existence of a motive to prefer or to defraud the bankrupt act, would color acts or decisions otherwise of no significance. These cases must rest on their own circumstances. But the case before us is destitute of any evidence of the existence of such a motive, unless it is to be imputed as a conclusion of law from facts which we do not think raise such an implication.

These latter considerations serve to distinguish the present case from that of Buchanan v. Smith, (16 Wall. 277,) decided at last term, and which may seem to conflict, in some of the expressions used in that opinion, with those found in this. That was a bill in chancery involving several distinct issues of fact, on which much and conflicting testimony was given, and the contention was mainly as to what was established by the evidence. There was satisfactory proof that the creditor, before pursuing his remedy in the state court, had urgently sought to secure a preference by obtaining from the debtor a transfer of certain policies of insurance on which a loss was due. The case was also complicated by an assignment made by the debtor, under which the assignee took possession before the creditor procured his judgment in the state court. That case was well decided on the evidence before the court. But in the case now before us, the questions we have discussed are presented nakedly and without confusion, by facts found by the court and undisputed, and we have been compelled, on careful consideration of the bankrupt act, to the following conclusions:

Digitized by Google

1. That something more than passive non-resistance of an insolvent debtor to regular judicial proceedings, in which a judgment and levy on his property are obtained, when the debt is due and he is without just defence to the action, is necessary to show a preference of a creditor, or a purpose to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act.

2. That the fact that the debtor under such circumstances does not file a petition in bankruptcy, is not sufficient evidence of such preference, or of intent to defeat the operation of the act.

3. That, though the judgment creditor in such case may know the insolvent condition of the debtor, his levy and seizure are not void under the circumstances, nor any violation of the bankrupt law.

4. That a lien thus obtained by him will not be displaced by subsequent proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor, though within four months of the filing of the petition.

These propositions require the questions certified to us to be answered as follows: The first and second in the negative, and the third in the affirmative.

NOTE.—The case in the court below is reported in 1 Dillon C. C. R. 476, where the facts are more fully stated than they were in the record before the supreme court. The essential features of the case, however, appear in the foregoing opinion, which will attract attention, as perhaps, the most important adjudication under the bankrupt act, yet made by the supreme court.

The opinion is without any reported dissent, and it is plain that it was carefully prepared and the subject thoroughly considered. We do not now recall an opinion of any district or circuit court in which precisely the same view has been taken of the subject: certain, it is, that the almost uniform judgment of these tribunals has been otherwise, and in accord with the general tone of Buchanan v. Smith, 16 Wall. 277. But by referenoe to the case of Wright v. Filley, 1 Dillon C. C. R. 171 (1871), it will be seen that the same distinguished judge who delivered the opinion printed above, entertained at that time the views now sanctioned by the supreme court.

The principal case is said in the opinion to be distinguishable from Buchanan v. Smith; but as this latter case is reported, it would seem to be more correct to say that it is overruled. Much of its reasoning, certainly, is overthrown.

The bankrupt act prohibits an insolvent from suffering his property to be seized on legal process with intent to give a preference, or to defeat or delay the operation of the act. In the principal case, the local creditor, the bank, knowing that its debtor, a merchant, had committed an act of bankruptcy, and also, having reason to know his insolvency, commenced suit in the state court and obtaining a judgment by default, immediately levied upon his entire stock in trade, his only property, the debtor all the time remaining passive, neither informing his other creditors of the suit of the bank, nor himself going into bankruptcy, nor otherwise making any effort to prevent the judgment or the levy of the execution; and the supreme court hold that these circumstances do not authorize the conclusion that the debtor suffered this to be done with intent to defeat the bankrupt act. Speaking of this point, the court says: "There must be the positive purpose of doing the act forbidden by the statute, and the thing described must be done in the promotion of this unlawful purpose," and "the facts of the case before us do not show any positive or affirmative act of the debtor from which such intent can be inferred." One circumstance not particularly dwelt upon by the supreme court, but which had weight with the circuit court in deducing the inference that the debtors intended to delay or defeat the operation of the bankrupt act, was that, under the state practice, a judgment by default could be obtained in a few days, and that the debtors gave no notice or information to other creditors that the suit of the bank was pending.

The great practical significance of the principal case is, that it authoritatively establishes, under the act as it now stands, that a creditor, knowing his debtor to be insolvent, and therefore, not able to pay all his debts, may use the remedies and process given him by state laws, and hold liens acquired by levies thereunder, made before proceedings in bankruptcy commenced, provided there is no collusion with the debtor, and no actual, positive intent, manifested by some affirmative act on the part of the latter to give the former a preference, or to defeat the operation of the bankrupt enactment.

Agreement Between Corporation and Stockholder to Convert Indebtedness for Stock into a Loan —Set-off under the Bankrupt Law.

SAWYER v. HOAG, ASSIGNEE OF LUMBERMAN'S INSURANCE COMPANY.

Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873.

1. Corporations—Capital Stock Trust Fund for Creditors.—It is well settled that the capital stock of a corporation, especially its unpaid subscriptions, is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation.

2. Agreement to Convert Stock into Loan void as to creditors.—It results from this doctrine, that any agreement between a corporation and one of its stockholders who is in debt to the corporation for stock, by which his indebtedness or stock is converted into a loan from the corporation to him, is fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the corporation, although it may be good between the parties to the transaction.

3. Suit against Stockholders by Assignee in Bankruptcy of Corporation—Set-off.—It follows that a stockholder of an insolvent corporation, who is sued by the assignee in bankruptcy of the corporation, for money due for stock, will not be permitted to set off against such suit, a demand against the corporation purchased from a creditor; because the money due for unpaid stock, being a trust fund for all the creditors, cannot be applied exclusively to the payment of one claim; and it makes no difference whether the claim was acquired before or after the act of bankruptcy.

4. Statute Construed—Bankrupt Act, § 20—Set-off.—Section 20 of the bankrupt act does not enlarge the doctrine of set-off, nor enable a party to make a set-off in cases where the principles of legal or equitable set-off did not previously authorise it. The debts must be mutual, and in the same right.

5. Assignee in Bankruptcy, Representative of creditors.—An assignee in bankruptcy is the representative of the creditors, as well as of the bankrupt. Therefore, in a case like the present, the assignee in bankruptcy of an insolvent corporation may assert the rights of the creditors, against a stockholder of the corporation who is indebted to the corporation for stock.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois. The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The Lumberman's Insurance company, of Chicago, like most the other local insurance companies of that city, was found to be insolvent after the disastrous fire of October, 1871; and in June, 1872, a petition was filed, under which it was declared bankrupt, and the appellee appointed assignee. The appellant was a stockholder in the company to the extent of fifty shares of one hundred dollars each. Among the effects of the company which came to the hands of the assignee, was a note of appellant for $4,250, and when payment was demanded of him, he produced and offered to set off against this demand the certificate of an adjusted loss given by the company to one Hayes for $5,000, which had been assigned by Hayes to appellant. This certificate was given to Hayes and purchased by appellant at thirty-three per per cent. of its par value, on the same day, namely, January 25, 1872, after the insolvency of the company was well known, but before any proceedings in bankruptcy had been commenced. Upon the refusal of the assignee to consent to this set-off, the appellant filed the present bill in the district court to enforce the set-off, in which he alleged, among other things, that the note given by him to the insurance company was for money loaned.

The assignee, in his answer denies that the note was for money loaned, and avers that it was, in fact, for a balance due by appellant for his stock subscription, which had never been paid, and insists that such balances constitute a trust fund for the benefit of all creditors of the insolvent corporation, which cannot be made the subject of a set-off against an ordinary debt due by the company to one of its creditors. After the general replication, the case was submitted to the district court on an agreed statement of facts. The district court decreed against the complainant, from which he appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the decree below, and from that decree it is brought by appeal to this court.

Digitized by Google

The first and most important question to be decided is whether the indebtedness of the appellant to the insurance company is to be treated, for the purposes of this suit, as really based on a loan of money by the company to him, or as representing his unpaid stock subscription.

The charter under which the company was organized, authorized it to commence business upon a capital stock of $100,000, with ten thousand paid in, and the remainder secured by notes with mortgages on real estate or otherwise. The transaction by which appellant professes to have paid up his stock subscription is, shortly, this: He gave to the company his check for the full amount of his subscription, namely, $5,000. He took the check of the company for $4,250, being the amount of his subscription, less the fifteen per cent. required of each stockholder to be paid in cash, and he gave his note for the amount of the latter check, with good collateral security for its payment, with interest at seven per cent. per annum. Appellant and the company, by its officers, agreed to call this latter transaction a loan, and the check of the appellant, payment in full of his stock, and on the books of the company, and in all other respects as between themselves, it was treated as payment of the subscription and a loan of money. It is agreed that at this time the current rate of interest in Chicago was greater than seven per cent., and it is not stated as a fact whether these checks were ever presented and paid at any bank, or that any money was actually paid or received by either party in the transaction. It must, therefore, be treated as an agreement between the corporation, by its officers, on the one part, and the appellant, as a subscriber to the stock of the company, on the other part, to convert the debt which the latter owed to the company for his stock, into a debt for the loan of money, thereby extinguishing the stock debt.

Undoubtedly this transaction, if nothing unfair was intended, was one which the parties could do effectually as far as they alone were concerned. Two private persons could thus change the nature of the indebtedness of one to the other, if it was found to be mutually convenient to do so. And in any controversy which might or could grow out of the matter between the insurance company and the appellant, we are not prepared to say that the company, as a corporate body, could deny that the stock was paid in full.

And on this consideration, one of the main arguments on which appellant seeks to reverse the decree stands. He assumes that the assignee in bankruptcy is the representative alone of the corporation, and can assert no right which it could not have asserted. The weakness of the argument is in this assumption. The assignee is the representative of the creditors as well as the bankrupt. He is appointed by the creditors. The statute is full of authority to him to sue for and recover property, rights, and credits, where the bankrupt could not have sustained the action, and to set aside as void transactions by which the bankrupt himself would be bound. All this, of course, is in the interest of the creditors of the bankrupt.

Had the creditors of this insolvent corporation any right to look into and assail the transaction, by which appellant claims to have paid his stock subscription?

Though it be a doctrine of modern date, we think it now well established that the capital stock of a corporation, especially its unpaid subscriptions, is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation. And when we consider the rapid development of corporations as instrumentalities of the commercial and business world in the last few years, with the corresponding necessity of adapting legal principles to the new and varying exigencies of this business, it is no solid objection to such a principle that it is modern; for the occasion for it could not sooner have arisen.

The principle is fully asserted in two recent cases in this court, namely: Burke v. Smith, 16 Wallace, 390, and in Burke v. New Albany, 11 Wallace, 96. Both these cases turned upon the doctrine we have stated, and upon the necessary inference from that doctrine, that the governing officers of a corporation cannot, by agreement or other transaction with the stockholder, release the latter from his obligation to pay, to the prejudice of its creditors, except by fair and honest dealing and for a valuable consideration.

In the latter case, a judgment creditor of an insolvent railroad company, having exhausted his remedy at law, sought to enforce this principle by a bill in chancery against the stockholders. The court, by affirming the right of the corporation to deal with the debt due it for stock as with any other debt, would have ended the case without further enquiry. But asserting, on the contrary, to its full extent, that such stock debts were trust funds in their hands for the benefit of the corporate creditors, and must in all cases be dealt with as trust funds are dealt with, it was found necessary to go into an elaborate enquiry to ascertain whether a violation of the trust had been committed. And though the court find that the transaction by which the stockholders had been released, was a fair and valid one, as founded on the conditions of the original subscription, the assertion of the general rule on the subject is none the less authoritative and emphatic.—(See, also, Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How. 504; Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 305; See v. Bloom, 19 Johnson, 456, and numerous other cases cited in the brief for the appellees in this case and in Meyer v. Vocke, assignee, decided with this.)

In the case before us the assignee of the bankrupt, in the interest of the creditors, has a right to enquire into this conventional payment of his stock by one of the shareholders of the company; and on that enquiry, we are of opinion that, as to these creditors, there was no valid payment of his stock by appellant. We do not base this upon the ground that no money actually passed between the parties. It would have been just the same if, agreeing beforehand to turn the stock debt into a loan, the appellant had brought the money with him, paid it, taken a receipt for it, and carried it away with him. This would be precisely the equivalent of the exchange of checks between the parties. It is the intent and purpose of the transaction which forbids it to be treated as valid payment. It is the change of the character of the debt from one of a stock subscription unpaid to that of a loan of money. The debt ceases by this operation, if effectual, to be the trust fund to which creditors can look, and becomes ordinary assets, with which the directors may deal as they choose.

And this was precisely what was designed by the parties. It divested the claim against the stockholder of its character of a trust fund, and enabled both him and the directors to deal with it freed from that charge. There are three or four of these cases now before us in which precisely the same thing was done by other insurance companies organized in Chicago, and we have no doubt it was done by this company in regard to all their stockholders.

It was, therefore, a regular system of operations to the injury of the creditor, beneficial alone to the stockholder and the corporation.

We do not believe we characterize it too strongly, when we say that it was a fraud upon the public who were expected to deal with them.

The result of it was that the capital stock of the company was neither paid up in actual money, nor did it exist in the form of deferred installments properly secured.

It is said by appellant's counsel that conceding this, it is still a debt due by him to the corporation at the time that he became the owner of the debt due by the corporation to Hayes, and, therefore, the proper subject of set-off under section 20 of the bankrupt act. That section is as follows: "In all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid, but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate: Provided, that no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt, of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition."

Digitized by Google

This section was not intended to enlarge the doctrine of set-off, or to enable a party to make a set-off in cases where the principles of legal or equitable set-off did not previously authorize it. The debts must be mutual, must be in the same right.

The case before us is not of that character. The debt which appellant owed for his stock was a trust fund devoted to the payment of all the creditors of the company. As soon as the company became insolvent, and this fact became known to appellant, the right of set-off for an ordinary debt to its full amount ceased. It became a fund belonging equally in equity to all the creditors, and could not be appropriated by the debtor to the exclusive payment of his own claims.

It is unnecessary to go into the enquiry whether this claim was acquired before the commission of an act of bankruptcy by the company, or the effect of the bankruptcy proceeding. The result would be the same if the corporation was in the process of liquidation in the hands of a trustee or under other legal proceedings. It would still remain true that the unpaid stock was a trust fund for all the creditors, which could not be applied exclusively to the payment of one claim, though held by the stockholder who owed that amount on his subscription.

Nor do we think the relation of the appellant in this case to the corporation is without weight in the solution of the question before us. It is very true, that by the power of the legislature there is created in all acts of incorporation a legal entity, which can contract with its shareholders in the ordinary transactions of business as with other persons. It can buy of them, sell to them, loan to them, and in insurance companies, make contracts of insurance with them, in all of which both parties are bound by the ordinary laws of contract. The stockholder is also relieved from personal liability for the debts of the company. But after all, this artificial body is but the representative of its stockholders, and exists mainly for their benefit, and is governed and controlled by them through the officers whom they elect. And the interest and power of legal control of each shareholder is in exact proportion to the amount of his stock. It is, therefore, but just, that when the interest of the public, or of strangers dealing with this corporation is to be affected by any transaction between the stockholders who own the corporation, and the corporation itself, such transaction should be subbject to a rigid scrutiny, and if found to be infected with anything unfair towards such third person, calculated to injure him, or designed intentionally and inequitably to screen the stockholder from loss at the expense of the general creditor, it should be disregarded or annulled so far as it may inequitably affect him. (Lawrence v. Nelson, 21 New York R. 158.)

These principles require the affirmation of the decree in the present case, and it is accordingly so ordered.

The cases of Meyer, appellant, v. Vocke, assignee, and of Jaeger, plaintiff in error, v. Vocke assignee, from the same court, though differing in some of the facts, the latter especially, being a suit at law brought by the assignee of the bankrupt corporation, in which a set-off was pleaded, the principles which govern the cases are the same.—The case at law was submitted to the court without a jury, and the facts found by the court bring it within the doctrines we have just declared to be applicable to such cases.

The decree in the case of Meyer v. Vocke, (580,) assignee, and the judgment in the case of Jaeger v. Vocke, assignee, (579,) are, therefore, affirmed.

Mr. Justice HUNT dissented, holding that the transaction was a loan by the company to the appellant.

Power of one Railroad Company to condemn the Lands of Another.

PEORIA, PEKIN AND JACKSONVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY v. PEORIA AND SPRINGFIELD RAILROAD COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Illinois, November 6, 1873.

[For this opinion we are indebted to the courtesy of Ingersoll and Puterbaugh, counselors at law, Peoria, Ills.]

1. Eminent Domain—When one Railroad may condemn lands of another. One railroad company may acquire, by condemnation, the right to use the lands of another company, which such company holds by lease, if it appear that such lands are not eligible or necessary for any purpose of the latter company, but are indispensable to the former; and especially if it appear that the latter company had acquired a lease of the lands to obstruct the former company in the enjoyment of its franchises.

2. Condemnation of land—Form of the Decree—Illinois statute.—Where land is condemned to the use of a railroad company, it is error, under the Illinois statute of 1872, after determining the amount of compensation to be paid, to award execution against the petitioner for the same. The proper decree is that, after payment of the sum fixed as compensation, the petitioner have possession of the land.

Opinion of the court by BREESE, chief justice.

This was a proceeding in the Peoria circuit court, by appellee, a railroad corporation created by an act of the general assembly of this state, against appellant, another like corporation, to condemn certain lands of the latter for the railroad purposes of the former. It appears appellees had condemned lands for the purposes of their railroad, but to obtain access to them it was necessary to pass over the lands claimed by appellants, and of which they had obtained a lease subsequent to the time appellees had acquired their lands. The court granted the prayer of the petition against the objection of appellants, who bring the record here.

The principal point raised and argued at great length by appellants is, that lands once appropriated by a railroad cannot be interfered with in any manner by a rival road. In other words, that a railroad corporation, to whom has been granted the usual powers conferred upon such companies, cannot exercise the right of eminent domain by the legislative grant, in case such exercise would interfere with the property of another railroad corporation, to whom like powers have been granted, and which they have exercised. The argument, when reduced to its proper measure, is, that whilst the lands of all other persons and corporations lying on the route of a railroad are subject to the power of eminent domain, that belonging to a railroad company is not thus subject; that such land must remain intact. We cannot assent to this proposition.

It appears from the record, that the land in question was not acquired by the appellants' company by condemnation for railroad purposes, but that after appellees had, by that proceeding obtained their land for their purposes, appellants obtained a lease of the land in controversy, with a view, it would seem, of obstructing appellees in the enjoyment of their franchises. The proof shows that this land is neither eligible nor necessary for any purpose to appellants' company, whilst it is indispensable to appellees—that whilst it is in the power of appellants to obtain land more suitable for their purposes, it is not in the power of appellees to obtain any land but the piece in question for their purposes. The acts of the general assembly creating these corporations nowhere exempt their lands, not in actual use for railroad purposes, from condemnation. This is a plain case, where one company, to thwart the views and embarrass, or wholly obstruct the operation of a rival company, procures a lease of land necessary to the enjoyment of one company, and not necessary for the other, and thus provided, insists upon an immunity which no other lessee can claim, and no property-owners can assert, against the claim of a railroad corporation, to subject it to condemnation. It does not appear by the testimony in the cause, that appellants will be deprived by this proceeding on the part of appellees of any of their franchises, or embarrassed in any degree in their exercise.

Digitized by Google

On what ground, then, can this claim of appellants rest? We fail to perceive any plausible, much less any substantial ground. The lands of railroad corporations, not actually in use by such company, or absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of their franchise, must be upon the same footing as the land of an individual, though that may be taken from the actual and profitable use of the owner. We perceive no reason why in this respect railroad companies should claim, and be allowed, immunities not accorded to individual proprietors. The legislature has made no exception in their favor, and none in reason can be made.

Appellees have assigned cross errors on this record, principally as to the form of the entry of the judgment, and awarding execution. The statute provides that the judge or court shall, upon the report of the jury, proceed to adjudge and make such order as to right and justice shall appertain, ordering that petitioner enter upon such property, and the use of the same, upon payment of full compensation as ascertained as aforesaid, and such order, with evidence of such payment, shall constitute complete justification of the taking of such property.—Laws of 1872, § 10, p. 404.

It would seem from this, that the jury must find a gross sum as compensation, which is entered on the judgment of the court, but no execution can issue therefor, for it is optional with the petitioner to take or refuse the land. The statute is explicit, the judgment of the court must be an order authorizing the petitioners to enter upon the land and use the same upon his paying the compensation found by the jury; until that is done, the petitioners have no rights in the land, and cannot enter upon it. This statute evidently contemplates cases where possession has not been taken by the railroad company of the land.

We are of opinion the circuit court properly held this strip of land was subject to condemnation under the proceedings instituted; but there was error in the entry of the judgment and awarding an execution thereon. The statute should be substantially pursued. The judgment is reversed on the cross errors assigned, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, with directions to enter judgment in accordance with section 10 of the act of 1872, above cited.

Foreign Judgment—Notice—Jurisdiction.

KUHN, NETTER & CO. v. J. W. McMILLAN.

Circuit Court of the United States, District of Kansas, Nov. Term, 1873.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Delivery Bonds in Attachment Cases—Summary Judgments without Notice to Sureties.—Where the laws of a state provide that bonds, given to release property from attachment, and conditioned for its redelivery to the officer, shall form part of the record, and that judgment thereon, in the event of the plaintiffs' recovery, shall be entered against the principal and surety of such bond without scire facias or notice, a judgment thus entered is not void as to the surety for want of notice, although such surety may at the time be a non-resident of the state.

2. Appearance—Judgment Entry.—Record of a judgment entry held to show an appearance by the party praying an appeal from such judgment, as to proceedings subsequent thereto.

In 1866 the present plaintiffs commenced in the courts of Tennessee an attachment suit against Fessenden & Co., and the sheriff levied the writ of attachment upon property worth twice the amount of their claim against Fessenden & Co. Under the statute of that state, Fessenden & Co., as principals, and the present defendant as surety, executed to the plaintiffs a delivery bond in the sum of $1800, reciting the plaintiffs' suit, the levy of the attachment, etc., and conditioned that "if the attached property should be brought forward and delivered to the sheriff when ordered by the court, or said debt and costs shall be paid and satisfied before that time to the said sheriff, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to be in full force." Fessenden & Co. contested the plaintiffs' claim, but in 1867 the plaintiffs recovered judgment against them, and the record of that recovery, after reciting the execution of the said delivery bond, also shows judgment against the present defendant, McMillan, as the surety, jointly with his principals, from which judgment "the defendants" prayed an appeal to the supreme court of the state. In 1869 the supreme court affirmed the judgment against Fessenden & Co., but reversed the judgment as to McMillan, on the ground that when judgment was entered against McMillan, "no breach of the bond had occurred;" but remanded the cause to the court of original jurisdiction, "with directions to order McMillan to deliver the property attached to the sheriff in 60 days from the date of such order, or pay the debt, and upon his failure to do so, the court may enter up a judgment against him and Fessenden & Co. upon said bond, for the amount of the plaintiff's judgment against Fessenden & Co., with interest and costs." The court below, July 19, 1869, made the order as directed, and afterwards, on March 29, 1872, the court, after reciting the amount of the judgment against Fessenden & Co., adjudged "that unless the said McMillan pay said judgment, within 60 days from the date hereof, execution shall issue against the said McMillan and Fessenden & Co."

The present action is brought in this court by the plaintiffs against McMillan on the said judgment of March 29, 1872.

The defence is, that the defendant never appeared in person or attorney, to the suit in Tennessee, nor was he served with summons or process in said action; and in support of this defence it is stipulated "that in March, 1866, McMillan was, and ever since has been a non-resident of Tennessee, and has not been in that state since June, 1866." This is the only proof in the case for the defendant. It is agreed that the statute of Tennessee in force when the proceedings in that state took place, contains a provision by which delivery bonds, such as the one signed by the defendant, are required "to be returned into court and constitute part of the record." Code, sec. 3513. Also the provision that the "court may enter up judgment on the bond against the defendant and his sureties, in the event of a recovery by the plaintiff." (Ib. sec. 3514.) Also the provision that "All bonds * * taken in the progress of a cause, form part of the record, and judgment may be rendered thereon, to the extent of the respective liabilities of the parties, upon motion, without scire facias or notice." (Ib. § 3109.)

Barker & Summerfield, for the plaintiffs; Hutchings & Brotherton, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.

There must be a judgment for the plaintiffs. The stipulation as to the non-residence of the defendant, which is his only proof, does not overcome the record entry to the effect that after a joint judgment had been entered against Fessenden & Co. and McMillan, that "the defendants" prayed an appeal, on which appeal the judgment against McMillan was reversed.

The appellate court regarded the present defendant as being before it on that appeal, and reversed the judgment against him.

But without resting my judgment upon this view, I am of opinion that under the laws of Tennessee, the judgment against the defendant as surety on the delivery bond was authorized, and is not, as the defendant's counsel contends, void for want of notice.

Property had been attached and was in the custody of the court. The defendant signed a bond to release the property, and conditioned that he would be liable for any debt the plaintiffs might recover, unless the property released should be re-delivered to the sheriff when ordered by the court. The bond takes the place of the property for which it is substituted, and the statute requires it to be returned and filed in court. By the statute in force at the time the defendant signed the bond, it was provided that the bond should constitute part of the record, and that judgment might be entered thereon against the principal, and surety, in the event of a recovery against the principal, without scire facias or notice.

Digitized by Google

The defendant, therefore, by the execution of the bond in the course of a pending cause, connected his fortunes with the fortunes of his principal, so far at least, as to authorize the court to enter judgment against them thereon.

By the execution of the bond under the statute, the defendant places himself in court, and agrees that judgment may be entered against him, without further process, if judgment is entered against the principal obligors. It is obvious that such is the view taken of the statute by the supreme court of the State, since that court directed the entry of the very judgment which is the basis of the present action. Under the constitution and legislation of congress, that judgment is entitled to the same faith and credit that are due to it in the state from which it came.

Our conclusion is well sustained by authority. Pratt v. Donovan, 10 Wis., 378; McRae v. Mattoon, 13 Pick., 53; Bigelow on Estoppel, 226, and cases cited.

And, under the statutory provisions of the State of Tennessee the conclusion reached can perhaps be reconciled with cases, which as respects the right of special bail to notice, differ from those above referred to. Robinson v. Ward, 8 Johns. 86; Holt v. Alloway, 2 Blabkf. 108.

JUDGMENT FOR THE PLAINTIFFS.

Supreme Court of the United States—Abstract of Decisions of last week.

[Compiled from the New York Herald.]

Writ of Error from Supreme Court to inferior state court.—In the case of Millar v. Moses et al., from the supreme court of appeals of Virginia, the Supreme Court of the United States, on the 12th instant, held that a writ of error from this court to review the judgment of a state court must be issued to the highest court of the state, in which a decision of the case could be had, even if that court be an inferior court of the state. Accordingly, where a circuit court of Virginia had jurisdiction to decide a case finally, the court of appeals of that state, not having jurisdiction to review the decision, by reason of the amount in controversy being under $500, a writ of error from this court issued to the court of appeals was dismissed. If allowable at all, the writ should have been issued to the circuit court. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Shipping; Collision.—No. 140. Steamship Favorita v. The Union Ferry Company—Jan. 12, 1874.—Appeal from the circuit court for the eastern district of New York.—This was a libel filed by the ferry company, to recover damages suffered by the ferryboat Manhasset by reason of a collision with the Favorita, a boat of the Pacific Mail Steam Navigation Company's line, occasioned, as alleged, by the fault of the colliding ship. The defence was that the Manhasset was guilty of keeping no proper lookout, and of deviating from her course when the peril was imminent.

The court below found the steamer at fault, and the decree was for the ferry company. That decree is here sustained, the court saying that if there was error at all on the part of the Manhasset, it was such a mistake of judgment as would likely be committed by any one in similar peril. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion.

Mechanic's Lien—Waiver of.—No. 170. Grant v. Strong—Jan. 12, 1874.—Appeal from the supreme court of the District of Columbia.—The court in this case hold that where a builder proceeds with the erection of buildings upon a contract to receive at a certain point in the work a negotiable note, payable at three months, for such work, and thereafter accepts such note, his mechanic's lien does not attach; that the reliance in such a case is upon the note and not upon the lien; and this, although the note is not paid at maturity.

Decree reversed. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice SWAYNE dissented.

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent Conveyance.—No. 113. Glenn et al. v. Johnson et al.—Jan. 13, 1874.—Appeal from the district court for the northern district of Georgia,—This was a proceeding to set aside a conveyance of real estate made by Johnson, a bankrupt, to his wife shortly before his bankruptcy, on the ground that it was a fraud upon his creditors. The court affirm the decision below, sustaining the conveyance as having been made when Johnson was solvent. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Bankruptcy—New promise to pay.—No. 177. Allen et al. v. Ferguson—Jan. 13, 1874.—Error to the circuit court for the eastern district of Arkansas.—This was a suit on a promissory note made by Ferguson. The defence was his discharge in bankruptcy. The replication was that, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, the holders received a new promise, in writing, to pay the note from Ferguson, and that relying upon that, they took no steps to collect the amount. This new promise was contained in letters from Ferguson, in which he said, at different times, "The debt shall be adjusted." "The debt will be settled," "The matter shall be arranged," &c., &c. The court sustained a demurrer to the replication, and the decision is here affirmed; this court holding that the words in the letters did not amount to evidence of a new promise to pay. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Land Law—Act of Congress reinstating Entry.—No. 542. McCarty v. Mann et al.—Jan. 13, 1874—Appeal from the circuit court for the district of Michigan.—This was a contest to determine the title to certain lands in Ramsey county, Minnesota. The appellants relied upon a decision of the department denying the validity of the entry of the appellee's grantor, and the appellees, upon an act of congress, reinstating it. This court affirm the decree below, sustaining the decision that the act of congress reinstating the entry, vested the title in the pre-emptor, remarking that the law and equity are with the appellees. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Shipping—Collision.—No. 123. Fraser v. The Propeller Winona—Jan. 13, 1874.—Appeal from the circuit court for the northern district of New York.—This was a case of collision between the schooner Fremont and the propeller on Lake Erie, in December, 1869. The district court found the propeller, to have occasioned the collision, and the decree was accordingly. The circuit court reversed the decree, holding that the schooner was at fault in having bad signal lights, and by changing her course contrary to the rules of navigation. This court reverse the decree of the circuit, and sustain the decree of the district court, holding the propeller at fault. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion.

Notes and Queries.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL: In the light of the recent bond decisions all over the country, you will greatly oblige me by giving me your opinion (or refer to authority) on the following: The general statute provides: "They [county commissioners] shall, at the first meeting after their election, and after every general electi n, choose one of their number chairman, who shall preside at such meeting and all other meetings during the year, if present; but in case of his absence from any meeting, the members present shall choose one of their number as temporary chairman."

Subsequently an act is passed to enable municipal townships to subscribe stock in any railroad, etc., which, among other things, contains this provision: "They [county commissioners] shall cause such bonds as may be required by the terms of said vote and subscription, to be issued in the name of such township, to be signed by the chairman of the board, and attested by the clerk, etc., under seal of the county."

Now, will it relieve the township from paying the bonds now in the hands of an innocent holder for value, by a showing to the court that as a matter of fact the chairman was not only present, but entered his protest of record, against the signing of them; that, because the chairman refused to sign them, the other two members organized themselves into a board, electing one of themselves chairman, and proceeded regularly to order their issuance; and that the temporary chairman signed them as chairman? During the signing of the bonds, and before they were removed from the county, ample time and opportunity was given to the authorities to enjoin their issuance or removal.

Does the doctrine of estoppel operate in favor of the holder?

Or, is the plea of non est factum good against him?

ANSWER.—We are aware of no decisions touching the exact points here mentioned. The answer must be derived from a consideration of the statute and its purposes and the principles of law established by the courts in reference to this class of securities. The course of decision in the federal Supreme Court is well known. As bearing on questions asked, see Lynde v. Winnebago county, 16 Wall. 6; Kennicott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. 452, 465, and cases cited; McKee v. Vernon county U. S. Cir. Ct. for West. Dist. Mo., which will hereafter appear in the JOURNAL. But in Kansas, see Lewis v. Bourbon Co. 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 16.

Digitized by Google

To S. H. P.—Your question seems to relate to a local controversy, or to a question not of much general interest. We would incline to an affirmative answer on the facts as you state them.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL: Under a statute authorizing our late county court to subscribe for stock in a railway and issue bonds, the stock was subscribed before the abolition of the county court by our new constitution; but the bonds were not issued until after the abolition of the county courts, and were then issued by the persons who were chairman and clerk respectively of the county court while it was in existence.

Are such instruments valid in the hands of bona fide purchasers?

J. M. M.

ANSWER.—We recall no decision in point, and will be obliged to any of our readers if they will refer to such.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL: During a contest between A. and B., the former as vendee, and latter as judgment creditor of C., for title to a house and lot, the house is burnt, and A., tenant in possession, having insurance upon it, collects the amount of the policy. The court decides against A.'s title as fraudulent, and decrees that the lot be sold to satisfy B.'s judgment. Can B. recover from A., under decree to account for rents and profits, the amount receivd by him under his insurance policy for the burnt house? I am unable to find any ruling upon this point, though I suppose it has been passed upon. ——— ———.

ANSWER.—We do not recall any decision on the exact point. In Lerow v. Williams, 9 Allen, (Mass.) 382, it was decided that a person holding property by a conveyance fraudulent against creditors has, nevertheless, an insurable interest; and it is familiar doctrine that insurance contracts are personal, reaching only to the interest of the assured in the subject-matter of the insurance, and not running with the subject-matter insured, except by force of express contract. See May on Insurance, sec. 6, and cases cited.

 Several important queries stand over to be answered in our next.

Notices of Books and Exchanges.

THE LAW OF INSURANCE, AS APPLIED TO FIRE, LIFE, ACCIDENT, GUARANTEE AND OTHER NON-MARITIME RISKS. By John Wilder May. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1873, pp. 777.

This treatise, just published by Little, Brown & Co., is intended to cover the entire field of the Law of Insurance, with the exception of maritime risks. The author is a well-known member of the Suffolk bar, and has brought to the preparation of this work not only unwearied diligence, but a mind disciplined by many years of study and active practice. We do not purpose to review the work at length, but a somewhat familiar acquaintance with the modern decisions upon the important subject of which it treats, enables us, after examination, to say to the profession that the results of those decisions are here clearly stated, and that the work is, in our judgment, one of decided and unusual merit. Whatever other works a practising attorney may have on Insurance, he will still need this, for the decisions down to the very latest period are here carefully collected and methodically arranged. Many important judgments upon Insurance, and particularly upon those branches of it not yet fully settled, have been pronounced within the past two years, and with a notably few exceptions, we find these cases all referred to, and in many instances, given with all needed fulness.

After this favorable estimate of the general merits and value of the work, we may be allowed to state that it seems in some minor respects open to criticism. At places the author makes up his text too freely by extracts unnecessary long, from opinions within the reach of every lawyer who would have occasion to use the book; but we are glad to note that this seems principally confined to instances where important topics are illustrated by very recent decisions. There is also less of critical discussion of doctrines arising out of conflicting decisions, than we would have been glad to have seen from so competent a person as the author. He gives, in some instances, in the same or succeeding sections, barely the points decided in the cases cited, without noticing that the cases themselves are not harmonious in principle. The important chapter on the subject of "Insurance Agents, their Powers and Duties," though valuable, and giving the recent cases, including the Union Mutual Ins. Co. v. Wilkenson, 13 Wall. 222; S. C., 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 570, (which will, perhaps, settle the law on the main point it decides, in all courts in which the question is an open one), would, in our judgment, have been improved if the author had more fully called attention to the conflict in the cases and classified and arranged them, thereby to some extent, doing the thinking which his mode of treatment puts upon the reader.

These are our views; but others think differently, and insist that an author best discharges his duty when he presents in logical order the adjudications just-as they are, leaving to counsel and the courts the task of reconciling differences and of selecting between conflicting cases and doctrines.

We consider Mr. May's book a very useful and excellent work, and commend it to the profession.

THE WASHINGTON LAW REPORTER: weekly; $5 per year: Washington, D. C.; Powell & Ginck, 633 F. Street: Hugh T. Taggart, Editor.

We have received the first number of this publication, and take pleasure in placing it upon our exchange list. We are informed by the editor that since the publication of Cranch's Circuit Court Reports, the last volume of which brings us down to the year 1840, the decisions of what is known to Washington lawyers as the "Old Circuit Court," now represented by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, have not been reported; and that the members of the legal profession who practice at the capital, have hence been deprived of the benefit of a ready reference to local precedents which their brethren elsewhere have enjoyed. To supply this want is one of the leading objects for which the Reporter is founded. It is supposed that the fact that the supreme court of the District has jurisdiction to hear appeals from the commissioner of patents, as well as to issue writs of mandamus to the executive officers of the federal government, will give the journal a general, as well as a local importance. We note elsewhere an important decision in the first number, sustaining the validity of contracts between attorneys who prosecute claims against the departments of the government, and their clients, for "contingent fees." We regret that we are not informed whether this case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and trust that the editor, in publishing decisions of the supreme court of the District, which are of general importance, will find it practicable to note, in future instances, whether the decision is final.

We see no reason why a good law weekly, published at the federal capital, should not meet with a general support at the hands of the profession throughout the country. We trust the editor of the Reporter will find it to the advantage of his paper to give it a more general interest, by noting from time to time the proceedings of the Supreme Court of the United States. We wish the Reporter abundant success.

THE SOUTHERN LAW REVIEW; Nashville: Frank T. Reid & Co.: Frank T. Reid, editor: $5 per annum.

We have received the January number of this publication. It contains much valuable reading matter. We note an interesting reminiscence of the bench of England in 1807, being extracts from the diary of Chief Justice Taylor of North Carolina, written during a visit to England in that year; also a gossipy and entertaining article by Walter B. Hill of Macon, Georgia, showing what a poor opinion literary men have entertained of lawyers in all ages and countries; a brief but clear essay by Edmond S. Mallory, on the rule in Shelley's case, examining its reason and policy and enquiring whether it ought not to be restored in those states that have abolished it; a scholarly article by Chancellor Cooper, (the first of a series) on Modern Theories of Government; and again, an essay by Mr. Mallory, on the Rebellion, arguing the question from the standpoint of the states-rights school, and combating the views of a previous contributor. The remaining pages are filled with a digest of recent decisions, and the usual matter found in such a publication. The Southern Law Review has achieved a deserved popularity since its establishment two years ago. We take pleasure in numbering it among our exchanges.

THE IRISH LAW TIMES AND SOLICITOR'S JOURNAL; Dublin, 53 Upper Sackville street: weekly: subscription price, 30 shillings per annum.

Through the courtesy of the editor, Mr. John Falconer, LL.D., barrister, we have been favored with the advantage of exchanging with this ably conducted journal. This is the only legal publication in Ireland. In size and appearance it somewhat resembles the Albany Law Journal. In addition to the usual matter found in such a publication, it furnishes its readers with full reports of the decisions of the Irish courts. These reports, known as the Irish Law Times Reports, are recognized as authority by the Irish judges, and the same respect is accorded to them as to the authorized series. We gladly place this publication on our exchange list, and shall avail ourselves of the privilege of extracting from its columns, anything which may seem of interest to our readers.

Digitized by Google

THE GENERAL RAILROAD LAWS of the State of Ohio, in force January 1, 1874, with the Constitutional provisions applicable to Railroad Corporations, and notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of Ohio, relating thereto. By James A. Wilcox. Robert Clarke & Co., Cin., 1874: pp. 380. Price $5.

The scope of this work is indicated by its title. The book presents, in a connected and convenient form, the general legislation of Ohio, and constitutional provisions now in force applicable to railroad corporations; also the acts of congress respecting bridges over the Ohio river, and the transportation of mails and animals. The editorial work seems to have been well performed, and all of the decisions of the supreme court construing the statutory and constitutional provisions collected and their substance carefully stated. The index is full, and a lawyer can ascertain, from this work, in a few moments, the exact state of the law of Ohio on the subject of railways, so far as it depends upon the constitution or statutes of the state.

THE CHICAGO LEGAL NEWS. Published every Saturday by the Chicago Legal News Company, 161 and 163, La Salle street, Chicago: Myra Bradwell, editor: $2 per annum.

We like to say something of each one of our exchanges on the occasion of their first visit; but we hardly know what to say of the News. We presume that nearly every lawyer of any considerable standing in the west takes it and is acquainted with its merits. The News may, perhaps, without exaggeration, say to each member of the western bar, "Not to know me, argues yourself unknown."

Its great excellence consists in the fact that it furnishes its readers with an unusual amount of reading matter in the shape of the latest decisions of important courts, judiciously selected, and with carefully prepared head-notes. In her able conduct of this paper, we think that Mrs. Bradwell has, perhaps, done more for the cause of woman than any of her sex.

Legal News and Notes.

—JUDGE DURELL, of Louisiana, has placed his resignation at the disposal of the president. No disposition has yet been made of it, nor any successor designated.

—GOVERNOR BEVERIDGE, in his message, recommends severe penalties for placing obstructions upon, or tearing up railroad tracks, and for injury to persons through the carelessness or negligence of railway officials.

—GOV. DIX, in his message to the New York legislature, takes strong ground against legislation authorizing the condemnation of lands by towns for public cemeteries, urging that there is no reason why the government should interpose, or why the matter should not be left to private acquirement between the parties.

—THE HON. ANDREW G. MILLER, Judge of the United States court for the eastern district of Wisconsin, has resigned, after thirty-five years of judicial service on the federal bench. He was the oldest federal judge in commission, and is the sole survivor of the judges who administered the bankrupt act of 1841.

—THE supreme court of Texas, after several days' discussion on a test case, has just decided that the law under which the recent general election was held, is unconstitutional. The constitution of Texas provides that the polls shall be kept open four days, and the election act, under which the recent election was held, provides that the polls be kept open for one day only.

—THERE seems to be a conviction abroad that Dr. Kenealy will be disbarred after the conclusion of the Tichborne case, the defence of which he has conducted with a pertinacity and impudence never equalled in a British court of justice. His frequent violent controversies with the bench, and the angry demeanor of the lord chief justice are not very creditable to any of the professional gentlemen concerned.

—THE judges of the supreme court of New York, for New York city, in general term, have made a rule that "press copies," that is, copies of papers made on manifold paper, will not be received by the court, nor be deemed good service between the parties or their attorneys if [not?] returned within twenty-four hours. A writer in the Daily Register criticises this rule severely; urges that manifold copies are more accurate than manual ones and easier to handle and preserve; and questions the authority of the judges to make the rule.

—MR. WELLS, of Missouri, introduced in the national house of representatives, a bill changing the time of holding the sessions of the Supreme Court of the United States, providing for one session annually, on the second Monday in June, at Washington, D. C., and one annually in the city of St. Louis on the first Monday in October; the session at Washington to hear and determine all cases arising in the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th circuits, and that at St. Louis all in the 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th circuits. The bill provides for a special clerk for the "central department," with seal, marshal's office, etc., to be located at St. Louis.

—THE suits for the condemnation of property in Cincinnati by the general government for the proposed new post office building, have been concluded. They were commenced in the circuit court of the United States, Judge SWING presiding, and the question of jurisdiction was raised by the counsel for the owners of the property. The arguments upon this question were commenced on the 7th day of October, and occupied about two weeks, being of a most exhaustive character. The Cincinnati Enquirer says: "The questions involved were new in the practice of the court, and the counsel engaged exhausted the learning on the subject, the argument of Mr. Bateman being especially able and thorough. Judge SWING, in a very careful and elaborate opinion, overruled the demurrers and motion to dismiss, in which he held that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case.

—GOV. DIX has made the following appointments to the bench: Alexander S. Johnson, of Utica, to be judge of the court of appeals in place of Rufus W. Peckham, deceased; Theodore W. Dwight, of New York, to be commissioner of appeals in the place of Judge Johnson transferred to the court of appeals; and Edwin Countryman, of Cooperstown, to be justice of the supreme court of the sixth judicial district in place of John M. Parker, deceased. These appointments are, without exception, good. Judge Johnson was a member of the court of appeals from 1851 to 1859, and won a deservedly high reputation as a judge. A year ago he was appointed to the commission of appeals in place of Judge Ward Hunt, resigned. Judge Dwight is widely known as a legist. He has long been professor in the Columbia law school and a constant advocate of legal and political reform. From his long devotion to the law as a science, we should suppose him to be somewhat deficient in the technics or practice, but this will very likely prove no drawback in the court to which he has been nominated. Mr. Countryman is very highly spoken of by those who know him, not only as regards personal character, but also as to his attainments and ability as a lawyer. We understand that he was strongly recommended by the judges of the court of appeals—an endorsement of the very highest character.—Albany Law Journal.

—IT is announced that the publication of Barbour's Reports will end with Volume 65. We doubt whether this announcement will cause much regret. It is doubtful whether the jurisprudence of the country has been much benefitted, as a whole, by the publication of this series. The fact that the court whose decisions they embrace is not one of last resort, diminishes their value to some extent; but this objection would not be a very serious one, if pains had been taken to indicate what decisions were final, and what had been taken to the higher tribunal. Some of the judges whose opinions are reported in Barbour were men of ability; some others were not; and the good and bad work of these courts has been given us without any apparent attempt at discrimination. Consequently, these books embrace perhaps the most discordant series of decisions that have been published in this country. It would, of course, be an exaggeration to repeat what has been sometimes said of them, that it is possible to find in them every sort of law, on every side of every question; but it is doubtless true that they have had a bad influence in fostering case law and case lawyers wherever they have been used.

Digitized by Google

This series is to be supplanted by a new series to be issued by John D. Parsons, Jr., of Albany, in monthly parts, at $15 a year. The name of the new reporter is not given; although the first part is ready for distribution.

—THE withdrawal of the nomination of Attorney General Williams, and the nomination of Caleb Cushing for chief justice, and the subsequent withdrawal of the name of that gentleman, have ceased to be news to our readers. On the 19th instant the President sent to the Senate the name of Morrison R. Waite of Ohio, as chief justice, and it is thought there will be no considerable opposition to his confirmation. Mr. Waite has long been known to the bar of Ohio as a lawyer of ability and great purity of character. It is said that he has twice declined the nomination of judge of the supreme court of his state. His name first became prominent throughout the country in connection with the Geneva tribunal, before which he appeared as counsel for our government, associated with Mr. Cushing and Mr. Evarts—acquitting himself with great credit. Mr. Waite is said to be 58 years of age. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, at Cadiz, Ohio. It is mentioned as a curious circumstance, that his name first appeared on the roll of the Supreme Court of the United States, over which he is now to preside as chief justice, about a year ago, at which time he was introduced by Mr. Cushing. Mr. Waite is a member of the law firm of M. R. & R. Waite, of Toledo, Ohio, and is a member and the presiding officer of the constitutional convention of that state, now in session.

The first announcement of his nomination came to him while in his seat, conducting the deliberations of the convention. A member arose to a question of privilege and read a telegram, conveying the news. It is said that for the time the members forgot their dignity, and the applause was deafening. A member then moved that a committee be appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the convention with reference to the nomination; but the chairman ruled the motion out of order, and business proceeded as usual.

Validity of "future" Cotton Contracts.

The case of Lehman Bros. v. Strasburger, which was tried before Judge BUSTEED last spring, was heard on a writ of error by Judge WOODS of the United States circuit court, at Mobile, on the second and third of the present month. Lehman Bros. filed a petition to put Strasburger into involuntary bankruptcy on a note given for losses on what are commonly known as "future" cotton contracts, which were made, and the losses on which were paid, as they alleged, by Lehman Bros. as the factors and agents of Strasburger. A trial by jury was had, and Judge BUSTEED, in his instructions to the jury, held such contracts to be illegal. Lehman Bros. sued out a writ of error from the circuit court of the United States at Mobile. Judge WOODS has just delivered his opinion at Mobile, in which he decides that the contracts, as proven, are valid and binding. They were proved to have been made according to the rules of the New York cotton exchange. Judge WOODS reverses the finding of the court below, and remands the case for trial by another jury.

Udderzook's Trial—A Remarkable Case of Circumstantial Evidence.

The Legal Gazette for January 2, devotes most of its space to the charge of BUTLER, J., of the court of oyer and terminer of Chester county, Pennsylvania, in the case of Udderzook, indicted for the murder of W. S. Goss. Although no point of law is ruled in these instructions, yet as they contain a clear and able summing up of a chain of evidence wholly circumstantial, and as the facts are very peculiar, they afford most interesting reading.

Udderzook and Goss were brothers-in-law. According to the version of the commonwealth, they entered into a conspiracy to defraud certain insurance companies; and Goss having obtained a large amount of insurance on his life in different companies, they rented a small frame tenement in the suburbs of Baltimore, where they ostensibly engaged in perfecting an invention of a substitute for India rubber. The corpse of a man about the size of Goss is procured and brought to the house in a box, the contents being represented as machinery to be used in their experiments. While Udderzook is temporarily absent at the house of a neighbor, having with him a third person (who seems to have been picked up as a convenient person, to be used as a witness when needed), the frame tenement occupied by the inventors is discovered to be on fire, and after it is burned to the ground, Udderzook makes the discovery that Goss was in the house. Search is at once made for Goss' body, and, of course, the charred remains of the disinterred corpse are found, and every body thinks it is the body of Goss. These remains are sent to Goss' family, who pretend to recognize them as his; and shortly afterwards, suit is brought against the insurance companies on the policies held on Goss' life. The companies contest on the ground that Goss is not dead. Verdict is of course for the plaintiff, but the corporations appeal.

Meantime Goss, carrying out his part of the conspiracy, becomes a wanderer, first in Canada, then in Tennessee and elsewhere, under the assumed name of A. C. Wilson. Finally the sinews of war become exhausted, and, half disheartened and broken by excessive drink, he returns to Chester county, Pennsylvania, where he hides away under his assumed name.

And now mark how readily one crime enforces the commission of another. Udderzook fearing that Goss will become a witness against him, and that he will not only lose the prospective booty, but suffer the penalties of perjury and conspiracy, resolves to put him out of the way. After endeavoring, unsuccessfully, to persuade another brother-in-law named Rhoades, to become an accomplice, (without disclosing to him in a definite manner the name of the person proposed to be put out of the way) he resolved to do the deed himself. A buggy is hired, and he and Goss, alias Wilson, start across the country from Jennerville about nightfall. Udderzook returns about midnight with the buggy, but Wilson is no more seen alive. That night, the wife of a farmer residing near a wood in the direction of which the buggy went, heard the voices of two men hallooing, and distinctly heard one of them cry, "Oh!" The next morning a smoke was seen rising from the wood. When the buggy was returned to the owner, the iron supporting the dasher on the left side was broken; two of the bows supporting the top on the same side were broken and swinging loose; the oil-cloth that had covered the floor was torn out and gone; the blanket and sheet that accompanied the buggy were missing. Udderzook gave a satisfactory explanation of these accidents and paid the damages.

It seems that nothing was suspected until about three weeks afterwards, when persons passing by the wood where the hallooing had been heard and the smoke seen, smelled carrion and saw buzzards congregating at a particular spot. An examination discovered the body of a man, less the arms and legs, stabbed and cut in numerous places, slightly covered with dirt and limbs. Further search discovered the arms and legs buried in another place.

The details of the evidence by which this mangled and decomposed corpse was identified as that of Wilson, and by which Wilson was shown to be none other than Goss, and by which the body burned in the shop in Baltimore was shown not to be the body of Goss,—are too long to recapitulate. It is sufficient to say that it was of such a character as to leave no room for doubt in the minds of the jury, and fully to warrant their verdict of murder in the first degree.

Notes of Recent Decisions.

Bankruptcy.—A creditor, knowing his debtor to be insolvent, may prosecute his debt to judgment, issue execution, and levy on the property of his debtor, and afterwards have the debtor adjudicated bankrupt for allowing his property to be taken on the execution. Coxe v. Hale, U. S. Circuit Court, N. District N. Y., WOODRUFF, J.; 5 Legal Gazette, 416.

———; Costs in suit by assignee.—Where a bill is filed by an assignee without sufficient cause, yet if the circumstances surrounding the transactions complained of are not sufficiently clear, to raise an imputation on the good faith of the assignee in prosecuting the suit, the cost will be charged against the estate of the bankrupt in his hands. Ibid.

———; ———.—A wife can establish her right to individual property against the husband's creditors only by clear and satisfactory evidence that it was obtained by or through her own exclusive means. The profits were the product of added capital, and as husband and wife lived together, he giving his assistance, the absence of proof that it was her own, raises the presumption that it was furnished by her husband. [Per Agnew, Ch. J., dissenting.] Ibid.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3 PER ANNUM, In Advance.

Cases in this Number.

We print elsewhere an abridgment of the opinion of Mr. Justice STRONG of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company v. Peniston, which relates to the power of the states to tax agencies of the federal government; also the important case of Chamberlain v. Saint Paul & Sioux City Railroad Company et al., relating to Minnesota railroad bonds, and Minnesota land grants to railroads; also an able opinion by Chief Justice BECK, of the supreme court of Iowa, upon the somewhat novel question of the right to set spring-guns for the protection of property. To this last case we have appended an editorial note, designed to show the force of the English and American cases bearing upon the question.

The New Chief Justice.

On the 19th inst., the president nominated, and subsequently the senate, without a dissenting vote, confirmed MORRISON R. WAITE, of Toledo, Ohio, to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He was born in Connecticut, and graduated from Yale College. He is the son of Judge WAITE, formerly one of the supreme judges of Connecticut, and soon after leaving college, settled in Ohio, where he has ever since resided. He is in the 58th year of his age, and his life has been exclusively given to the study and practice of his profession. He is a man of elevated and spotless character, and has the reputation of a learned, upright and able lawyer. He was the president of the constitutional convention of Ohio, at the time of his appointment. He had served with distinction, the year before, as one of the counsel for the United States at the Geneva arbitration. His studies, his whole life, and his public services, give full assurance of the wisdom of the president's choice, which it cannot be doubted, will be vindicated by the manner in which he will discharge the high duties to which he has been called.

Policy of Assurance on Life of Husband for Benefit of Wife not liable to Wife's Debts.

In Brossard v. Marsouin, in the superior court at Montreal, October 21, 1873, before BEAUDRY, J., a question was ruled which appears to be novel and worthy of note, although the court is not one of last resort. The defendant, a public trader, holding her goods apart from those of her husband, effected a policy of assurance upon his life in the sum of $1500, which sum was stipulated to be paid to her in the event of his death. The husband having died, and the defendant becoming embarrassed, one of her principal creditors forced her into bankruptcy. The defendant put the assignee in possession of all her goods, but refused to surrender to him the policy of assurance. The assignee filed his petition asking that she be compelled to deliver the policy as a part of the estate of the bankruptcy belonging to the creditors. The defendant responded that the provincial statute, 29 Vict., ch. 17, which authorizes similar assurances, provides that the amount shall be paid in the manner directed in the policy, and cannot be subjected by any creditor or creditors whatever. The assignee contended that the creditors mentioned in the act are those of the husband, and not those of the wife; but the court took the same view of the statute as did the defendant, and dismissed the petition with costs.

We do not recall any case similar to the above, and after a considerable search, have not been able to find any. In the case of Murrin, bankrupt, 2 Dillon C. C. 120; S. C. 2 Ins. Law Jour. 524, a wife possessed of a separate estate secured to her by an ante-nuptial settlement, obtained in 1869, a policy of insurance upon her own life, payable upon her death to her husband. She paid the premium for a year out of her own estate. Before the year expired her husband was adjudged a bankrupt. Out of her own estate she paid the premium for the two following years, 1870 and 1871, and before the next premium fell due, she died; and it was held, in a contest between her husband and his assignee in bankruptcy, that the former was entitled to the proceeds.

Can a Father, by Contract, surrender his Rights over his infant Child?

This question has recently been canvassed with seriousness, in the courts of Lower Canada, and has been finally answered in the negative, by the queen's bench, at Montreal. We allude to the case of Barlow v. Kennedy, 17 L. C. Jurist, 253. Kennedy was a day laborer, in indigent circumstances. His wife died, leaving him a female child, the issue of their marriage, about eighteen months old. Both Kennedy and his deceased wife were Catholics, and the child had been christened in that faith. Unable to care for the child, he gave her to Barlow, a Protestant, in good circumstances, agreeing, by parol, that the latter should have her to rear, educate, and dispose of, during her minority, to all intents and purposes, as though she were his own. This contract was reduced to writing before a notary, which writing, Kennedy agreed several times to sign, but failed or neglected to do so. Finally, Kennedy re-married; and, after Barlow had had the exclusive custody of the child for more than four years, in pursuance of the agreement, and without any compensation from Kennedy, the latter demanded that she be restored to him. This being refused, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus to recover possession of her. The judge of the superior court having heard the case upon issues which he had caused to be made up, rendered the following judgment:

"The court, having heard the parties by their respective counsel, examined the proceedings of record and deliberated, considering that it is satisfactorily proved that petitioner, some three or four years ago, placed Mary-Ann-Margaret Kennedy, his infant child, under the care and guardianship of the respondent, William Barlow, and delegated his, said petitioner's right, authority and control over her person, under the express understanding and agreement that said respondent should bring her up and educate her as his own child; considering that said respondent then accepted the guardianship of said Mary-Ann-Margaret Kennedy, and has ever since, with great care and kindness, and at great expense, brought her up, according to the said understanding and agreement, and desires to continue so to do; considering that it would be more conducive to the comfort, happiness and welfare of the said Mary-Ann-Margaret Kennedy, to suffer her to remain under the care of said respondent, who and his wife have become much attached to her, and to whom she has also become attached, than to consign her to the guardianship of the said petitioner, a poor day laborer, and a stepmother, to whom she is an entire stranger, doth dismiss the petition of said petitioner with costs, and remand said Mary-Ann-Margaret Kennedy to the guardianship and custody of the said respondent."

Digitized by Google

This judgment was removed to the Court of Review and there reversed; and the respondent having appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench, the judgment of the Court of Review was affirmed.

BADGLEY, J., of the Queen's Bench, said: "It is unnecessary to enter into detail of the right of a father to have the custody of his infant child: as a matter of justice and of law, the father requires no provision of law to secure to him that right, which no one can disturb nor force from him, nor deprive him of, except on account of his own bad conduct or by his own consent. Except in the case of insanity, or some deliberate course of immorality or criminal act of his own, no father can forfeit or lose his paternal right, and even a contract by him to part with his child is so unnatural, that the law does not recognize a man's right to violate his most sacred duty, least of all to bind himself by a contract to do that which is inherently immoral and ab initio illegal, and in the eyes of the law null and void. Even, therefore, if a father had signed such a contract, it would not be binding, and he could still demand and have the custody of his child."

MONK, J., of the same court, said that the judgment of the court of first instance was an extraordinary one; and that it was monstrous to think that a father could divest himself of his right to his child.

The cases upon the subject of the right of a father to the custody of his infant child, and which determine under what circumstances a court of equity, or a court of law in a proceeding by habeas corpus, will control that right for the benefit of the child, are very numerous. Their effect is very well shown by Mr. Schouler, in his work on The Domestic Relations, pp. 334, et seq. Contests of this character generally arise between husband and wife, in the event of separation or divorce; and there appear to be but few cases upon the precise point involved in the case above considered, namely, whether a father may, by contract, surrender to another his parental rights over his infant child,

In an English case in point, the father of an infant daughter, the mother having died recently, had agreed to let it live with an uncle, who was to maintain and educate it until it should be able to provide for itself, and the father promised not to take the child away from the uncle, and to pay a certain sum monthly for its support; the agreement was acted upon for some months; but it was held that, notwithstanding the agreement, the father was at liberty to revoke his consent to the child's living with its uncle; and in a proceeding by habeas corpus, the child was delivered to the father. Reg. v. Smith, 16 Eng. Law and Eq. 221. But in a case in Massachusetts, where a child had been given up at its birth, the mother having then died, to its grand-parents, who kept it for thirteen years at their own expense, without any demand made by the father for its restoration, the court (SHAW, Ch. J.,) refused to restore the child to the father. In Mayne v. Baldwin, 1 Halst. Ch. 454, an infant daughter was restored to her father on habeas corpus, although he had committed her to the respondent, and agreed that the respondent should be her father until she should attain the age of twenty-one years, The same view was taken by the supreme court of New Hampshire in State v. Libbey, 44 N. H., 321, where the precise question is considered, upon a state of facts which appear from the imperfect statement in the opinion, to be very similar to the case in Canada. The court say: "In this case the child, when about two years and five months old, was placed with respondent in February, 1859, and maintained by him until December, 1861, when this application was made; and it appeared that until December, 1861, a period of nearly three years, the father gave no notice of his wish to have the child restored to him. Upon the subject of the terms upon which the child was taken by the respondent, the evidence is conflicting; but upon a careful consideration of it, we think that the relation is not impeached, but that the father placed the child in the custody of the respondent, with an agreement that it should be his, and be brought up by him. And the question now is, whether, in the exercise of a sound discretion, the custody of the child ought to be withheld. The child had been suffered to remain with the respondent nearly four years before the application, and she is now about six and a half years old; and assuming that there is nothing in the character of the father or the stepmother, that renders them unsuitable to be entrusted with the nurture of the child, we can see nothing in the other circumstances that would make the change of custody sought for, hazardous to the permanent interests and welfare of the child; certainly not to such an extent as to justify a final severing of the ties which bind the parent and child together. * * * Our opinion, therefore, is that, upon refunding the sums of money expended by the respondent, under the agreement, the father may revoke his consent, and thereupon, the custody of the child may be awarded to him." But it has been held, that where a father, whose wife had died, gave his female child, three years old, to her aunt, with whom she remained six years, the father during that time visiting her but once a year, and contributing nothing to her support, his right to her custody was gone. Com. v. Dougherty, 1 Pa. Legal Gazette, 63.

The principle declared in the case in Canada has been carried even further. It has been held that a husband cannot, by agreement with his wife, delegate to her the care and custody of their infant children. People v. Mercein, 3 Hill, (N. Y.) 399, 408; Johnson v. Tervy, 30 Conn. 259, 263; Earl of Westmeath's case, Jacob, 251, note (c). Although such agreement be by deed. Jac. 251.

And, excepting of course, those cases where the father, by reason of immoral habits, extreme poverty, or otherwise, is unfit to have the custody of his infant child; and excepting also, contests between husband and wife for the custody of their minor children, as well as cases governed by the laws relating to the apprenticeship of minors, the rule undoubtedly is as stated by Mr. Justice COWEN, in People v. Mercein, supra, that a father holds his children under a personal trust which he cannot alienate. And the supreme court of Illinois has recently held that the right of a father to the care, custody and nurture of his child cannot be infringed by the state, except for gross unfitness for the charge, or for the commission of crime by the child, exposing him to imprisonment; and hence, that a statute authorizing children to be committed to a reform school, without any charge of, or trial for crime, but merely because they appear to officers of the law to be destitute of proper parental care, and growing up in idleness, vice, etc., is unconstitutional, as involving imprisonment without due process of law; and that a child thus committed may be discharged on habeas corpus, on the father's petition. People v. Turner, 55 Ill. 280.

Digitized by Google

Land Grant to Railroads—Minnesota State Railroad Bonds.

SELAH CHAMBERLAIN v. SAINT PAUL & SIOUX CITY RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

United States Circuit Court for the District of Minnesota, Dec. Term, 1873.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Railroads—Congressional Land Grant—Re-grant to new companies—Title.—The present railroad companies, to which the land-grant of congress was re-granted on the failure of the old companies (upon which the benefit of the grant was first conferred) to build the roads, do not hold any of the said lands, not even the first 120 sections, subject to any trust in favor of the creditors of the state, or of the former companies.

2. ——. ——. Power of the state over the disposition of the railroad aid land-grant considered.

3. ——. Minnesota state railroad aid bonds, issued under the amendment to the state constitution of April 15th, 1858, held valid.

4. Constitutional Amendment—Remedies.—Construction of said constitutional amendment and the nature of the remedies by foreclosure and forfeiture considered.

On the 3d day of March, 1857, congress granted to the territory of Minnesota, lands to aid in the construction of certain lines of railroads therein. (11 Stat. at Large, 195.) By the act it is provided, inter alia, that "the lands hereby granted for and on account of said road and branches severally, shall be exclusively applied in the construction of that road for and on account of which such lands are hereby granted, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses; and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatever."

Section 4 enacts: "That the land hereby granted * * * shall be disposed of by said state only in the manner following: that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections for each of said roads and branches, * * * may be sold; and when the governor shall certify * * * that any twenty continuous miles of any of said roads, etc., is completed, then another quantity of land not to exceed one hundred and twenty sections, * * * for each of said roads, * * * may be sold," and so on.

The territorial legislature of Minnesota passed an act, approved May 22, 1857, entitled "An act to execute the trust created by an act of congress, entitled 'An act,' etc.; and by chapter 3 of said act, the Root River Valley and Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., a corporation created and then existing under the laws of said territory (the name of which corporation was soon after changed to the 'Southern Minnesota R. R. Co.') was authorized to construct two of the lines of said road mentioned in the said act of congress, being the lines since severally constructed by the two companies, defendants in this action. That, by sections 3, 7 and 12, of said chapter 3, of said territorial act, it was provided that said railroad company, upon the construction of said lines of road, as in said act and the act of congress provided, should have the lands to aid in the construction thereof, in and by said act of congress designated.

On the 15th day of April, 1868, an amendment to the constitution of the state was adopted by the people, authorizing the issue of state bonds, not to exceed $5,000,000, to the land grant railroads, "for the purpose of expediting the construction thereof." By this amendment the provision was, that state bonds to the amount of $100,000, should be issued to each company for every ten miles of road made "ready for placing the superstructure thereon," and $100,000 for each ten miles completed with cars running thereon. "Said bonds thus issued shall be denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad bonds,' and the faith and credit of the state are hereby pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal thereof." By this amendment also, the state bonds were to be made payable to the order of the company to which they were issued, and transferable by the indorsement of the president thereof. Then follows this provision:

"Each company shall make provision for the punctual payment and redemption of all bonds issued and delivered to it, and for the punctual payment of the interest which shall accrue thereon, in such manner as to exonerate the treasury of this state from any advances of money for that purpose; and as security therefor, the governor shall demand and receive from each of said companies, before any of such bonds are issued, an instrument pledging the net profits of the road for the payment of said interest, and a conveyance to the state of the first 240 sections of land, free from prior incumbrances, which said company is or may be authorized to sell in trust for the better security of the treasury of the state from loss on said bonds," etc. And by the said constitutional amendment it was also provided that as a further security, each company should transfer to the state its own first mortgage bonds, corresponding in amount to the said state bonds so issued to such company; and in case of default of such company to pay the interest on the state bonds so issued to it, the governor was authorized, in such manner as should be provided by law, to sell the said first mortgage bonds of such company so transferred to the state, or require a foreclosure of the mortgage executed by said company to secure the same.

And it was further provided, that in consideration of the loan of the state credit to such companies, and as a condition thereof, each company should complete not less than fifty miles of its road on or before the 31st of December, 1861, and not less than 100 miles before the year 1864, and four-fifths of the entire line before the year 1866; and any failure so to complete within the said several times, should forfeit to the state all the right, title and interest of any kind whatsoever, in and to any lands together with the franchises connected with the same pertaining to the portion of the road so uncompleted.

Said proposed amendment was submitted to the people, for approval, at a special election, held April 15th, 1858, and was approved by a vote of about five to one. But said proposed amendment was not submitted to congress, or referred to in the act admitting Minnesota as a state.

The said Root River Valley and Southern Minnesota R. R. Co. accepted the provisions of said amendment.

In October, 1858, the Southern Minnesota R. R. Co.; (being the new name for the Root River Valley and Southern Minnesota R. R. Co.,) executed to the state an instrument, pledging the net profits of the road for the payment of the interest on the state bonds that should be issued to it, and also a conveyance of the first 240 sections of land which it was or might be authorized to sell, for the better security of the state against the payment of interest on the State bonds so to be issued to the said company. And, on October 1, 1868, the company made a trust deed to Pringle & Chatfield, trustees, on the road lands, franchises, and property of every description, to secure $2,000,000 of the bonds of the company.

In July, 1857, the route of the Southern Minnesota R. R. Co. was located.

Digitized by Google

In 1858, and early in 1859, the plaintiff constructed road-bed and received therefor from the companies, state bonds indorsed by the companies, to the amount of $575,000. In 1859, the railroad company became insolvent and never completed a mile of road, nor did anything beyond the grading, and made default in the payment of interest on its bonds and on the bonds of the state.

In 1860, the constitution was amended by "expunging" the amendment of April 15, 1858, under which the state bonds were issued, "saving to the state all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment;" and by providing that "no law levying a tax or making other provision for the payment of interest or principal of the bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad bonds,' shall take effect, or be in force, until such law shall have been submitted to a vote of the people of the state, and adopted by a majority of the electors of the state voting upon the same."

By an act of the legislature of the state, of August 12, 1858, and March 6, 1860, provision was made for the foreclosure of the mortgages, by order of the governor, of such companies as should be in default in payment of the interest on the state bonds that should be issued to it, and also in default in the payment of the interest of its own bonds, which should be held by the state as indemnity, as provided in said loan amendment, and upon such foreclosure to bid the property in, in the name and for the use of the state.

The original Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., having made default in the payment of interest both on its own bonds and the bonds of the state, the governor duly caused the deed of trust to the state to be foreclosed and all lands, etc., were sold to and purchased for and in the name of the state, and a conveyance made to the state therefor, and the state continued to hold all the lands, property and franchises, thus acquired, until the 4th day of March, 1864.

On March 4, 1864, the legislature of the state passed an act, whereby the present railroad companies, defendants in this action, were created, and all rights acquired by the state by virtue of said foreclosure proceedings, or by any forfeiture to the state, done or suffered by said old or original Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., were granted to the new companies thereby created, free and clear of all liens whatsoever, with further provisions that said new companies should have and receive severally, the lands pertaining to the line of the road which each was empowered to construct, upon the construction and completion of the same as provided in said act, and in said act of congress. The said railroad companies, defendants, severally went on under said act and completed their several lines of road, and received therefor, as the same were constructed, the lands from the state appertaining thereto under said congressional grant; said congressional grant having been amended so as to allow the lands to be disposed of by the state, as the lines were constructed in sections often instead of twenty miles, as originally provided. The said defendants, the railroad companies, to raise the means to construct said lines of road, issued their bonds severally, and mortgaged their roads, franchises and lands, to secure said bonds, as set forth in the answers of the trustees in this action.

That said defendants acquired no title, right or license, in regard to the right of way from, through or under, the old company, but procured the right of way from the individual land owners, over and upon which the old grading was done, so far as they used the same.

The present bill is by the plaintiff, as the holder of $500,000 state bonds, and is brought, not against the railroad companies to which they were issued, and which endorsed them, but against the new companies created in 1864, and to which the state re-granted the lands and property, and against the trustees in mortgages executed by the present companies to secure bonds issued to borrow money to build the roads, and as to the lands (particularly the first 240 sections granted to the said roads,) and franchises conferred upon the present companies by the legislature of 1864, seeks to charge them with a trust for the payment of the plaintiff's bonds.

The bill, in substance, prays for discovery and answer to special interrogatories; for a receiver; for an account of value of franchises and road beds at time of conveyance to defendants; for the value of all lands sold for cash; that defendants pay over all moneys by them received, and deliver all bonds, mortgages, contracts or evidences of indebtedness, for sale of lands to the receiver; convey to him all the lands remaining unsold; all to be by him converted into cash and applied to the liquidation of said state bonds and interest; and for general relief.

Gordon E. Cole and F. R. E. Cornell, for the complainant; Gilman, Clough & Wilder, E. C. Palmer, Gilfillan & Williams, and H. J. Horn, for defendants.

DILLON, circuit judge.—The plaintiff, who was a contractor on certain railroads, to which the state originally gave the benefit of the land grant of congress, holds bonds of the state of Minnesota, issued pursuant to the constitutional amendment of April 15, 1858, to the amount of half a million of dollars, upon which no interest has been paid since 1859, and which, by the expunging amendment to the constitution of 1860, if valid, the state legisture is disabled from paying or making provision to pay, until a law for that purpose shall be approved by a popular vote.

These bonds were endorsed by the original companies to which they were issued, and which, as between them and the state, are the principal and primary debtors. The present defendants, the St. Paul & Sioux City R. R. Co., and the Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., are not the companies with which the plaintiff contracted, and for which he did work, but are companies created by the state in 1864, and to which the state then re-granted the lands and property, which it had obtained by foreclosure or forfeiture, or both, from the old or original companies.

The bill proceeds upon the theory that the plaintiff's bonds are legal and subsisting obligations of the state: that the companies to which they were issued are the principal debtors, and the state their surety; that the lands, particularly the first 120 sections to each road, became by the act of the legislature of May 22, 1857, the property of the companies; that the only interest the state afterwards acquired in these lands, was the right to hold them to secure itself against loss by reason of its issue of state bonds; that the plaintiff, a creditor of the main debtor, has a right in equity to be subrogated to the rights of his surety (the state) in respect to all securities belonging to the principal debtor, and that the present companies not being bona fide purchasers of the lands for value and without notice, are open to the same trusts which might have been fastened upon them had they still remained in the hands of the state.

That the bonds held by the plaintiff are the legal obligations of the state, and binding upon it in law, honor and justice, I have no doubt. Indeed, counsel have not seriously contended that these bonds were not valid. They were issued pursuant to an amendment of the constitution of the state, adopted by a popular vote of about 35,000 for, to 8,000 against the project; and have been repeatedly recognized as valid by subsequent legislation of the state, and by the foreclosure proceedings. Under these circumstances, the fact that it does not appear that the acting governor signed the bill, providing for the submission to the people of the loan amendment to the constitution, is a matter of no consequence. In the amendment to the constitution "the faith and credit of the state are pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal" of the bonds; they are signed by the governor and bear upon their face the seal of the state; they were issued to the plaintiff and others for grading and work actually done upon the roads at the rate specified in the constitutional amendment, and the state obtained the benefit of the securities it took for its indemnification, and re-granted the property it acquired, free from all liens, to the present companies; under these circumstances, if the state were sueable in the courts, there can be no doubt that the bonds would be legally enforceable against it. Justice and honor, alike, require the state to recognize these bonds as binding upon it, and in the end the court cannot doubt that the people of the state will so ordain. A state with such a future before it as the state of Minnesota, cannot afford to bear the odium of repudiation, and if there are no other difficulties in the plaintiff's way, except the suggested one that his bonds are invalid, he will be entitled to the relief demanded.

Digitized by Google

The main purpose of the bill is to charge the first 120 sections of land granted by the state to the original companies, and by the act of 1864 re-granted to the present companies, with an equitable trust in favor of the plaintiff, for the payment of his state bonds indorsed by the old companies. It is admitted that the old companies, after doing a large amount of grading, became insolvent, and that they never completed any part of their line of road, and hence under the act of congress never became entitled to any lands, unless it may be the first 120 sections to each of the roads. These, the plaintiff contends, the state, under the act of congress of March 3, 1857, making the grant, had a right to sell in advance of construction; that the act of the territorial legislature of May 22, 1857, was a sale of the 120 sections to the companies, by force, whereof, they became absolutely their property by a title not subject to be divested by their subsequent failure to build the roads; that being the property of the companies, they had a right to pledge them to the state to indemnify it against liabilities it assumed for them, and that the plaintiff has the right to follow these lands into the hands of the state or its grantees, with notice, and subject them to payment of his bonds.

The lands granted to the state by congress were held by it in trust to be "exclusively applied to the construction of the road for and on account of which such lands were granted, and the same should be applied to no other purposes whatsoever." Said lands "shall be disposed of," says the act of congress, "by the state only, in the manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding 120 sections for each of said roads and branches * * may be sold; and when the governor shall certify that any twenty continuous miles of any of said roads, etc., is completed, then a quantity not exceeding 120 sections * * for each of said roads, may be sold," and so on. This comprised the extent of the power of the state over these lands. The state was a trustee whose powers were strictly limited by the congressional enactment. The state might, I am inclined to think, have sold the 120 sections in advance of construction, and conveyed a good title; but I doubt whether the act of the legislature of May 22, 1857, was a sale to the original companies so as to confer a title not subject to be defeated, if they failed to construct the roads as required by the act of congress; and I am clear, that under the act of congress it was not competent for the state, acting as trustee, to acquire any lien on or right in these lands, inconsistent with the unfettered execution of its trust duties under the act of congress. The state sustained to the old companies a double relation. one as trustee under the land-grant act of congress; the other as the sovereign which had created these companies, and was undertaking to aid them in their enterprise by a loan of its own credit. Now it is clear that if the state became a creditor of these companies, it could not lawfully stipulate for security out of lands which it held in trust, if this would be inconsistent with its duties under the act of congress.

In this view, I have serious doubts as to the validity of the security for its bonds which the state sought to obtain by the constitutional amendment upon the lands or any of them, which had been granted by congress, and which had never been earned by the completion of the required section of 20 (subsequently reduced to 10) miles of road. But I need not decide the point; for assuming that the 120 sections became the absolute property of the company, it was then competent for the state to take security upon it for its indemnity, and to provide for the forfeiture thereof to the state in case the roads were not completed as required by the constitutional amendment.

The companies made default in the payment of interest, and their rights were foreclosed and the property purchased by the state. The companies failed to build and complete the roads, as required by the constitutional amendment; and the legislation of 1864 shows that the state elected to take advantage of the forfeiture. Foreclosure and forfeiture were cumulative and concurrent remedies. The main object of the mortgage was pecuniary indemnity to the state. The principal purpose of the provisions for forfeiture was to secure the completion of the roads by the stipulated time.

By foreclosure or forfeiture or both, the rights of the old companies in those lands became vested in the state. It need not be denied in this case, that if these bonds were still in the hands of the state, or a voluntary grantee or a purchaser with notice, that the plaintiff, as the holder of unpaid state bonds (to indemnify the state against which the companies had conveyed to it the lands) might fasten an equitable trust upon them. Undoubtedly, he could do this, if these lands were in the hands of the state, discharged of any trusts under the act of congress. But upon the failure of the old companies, the state, in 1864, in order to secure the completion of the roads, created the present companies, and granted to them all the lands and franchises which had been granted to the old companies, "free of all claims or liens," and on the faith of this legislation, the new companies have built, completed the lines of road, the one at a cost of $5,000,000, and the other at a cost of $3,000,000. The money to accomplish this was raised upon deeds of trust and mortgages yet outstanding, made by the present companies to secure issues of bonds, preferred stock and land certificates. After all this is done, the present bill is filed, and it would, in my judgment, be inequitable as against the present companies and their creditors, to hold that the plaintiff could subject to the payment of his bonds the land or other property which the defendant companies acquired from the state by the legislation of 1864.

A decree will, therefore, be entered, dismissing the bill with costs.

NELSON, J., did not sit in the cause.

DECREE ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—Construction of acts of congress granting public lands to states to aid in building railroads: Schulenburg v. Harriman, 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 398. Rice v. Railroad Co. 1 Black, 358: State v. Southern Minn. Railroad Co., 18 Minn. 50.

To Union Pacific Railroad Co.: Union Pacific Railroad Co. v. Watts, 2 Dillon C. C. R. 310.

Taxation of such lands by the states. Railway Co. (Kansas Pacific) v. Prescott, 16 Wall. 603.

Lien of state to secure state bonds issued to the companies. Murdock v Woodson, 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 188; Wilson v. Boyce, Ib. 539.

Defence of Property by Spring-Guns.

GEORGE HOOKER, BY HIS NEXT FRIEND, ETC., v. JOHN MILLER.

Supreme Court of Iowa, October Term, 1873.

Hon. J. M. BECK, Chief Justice.
" WM. E. MILLER,
" C. C. COLE,
" JAMES G. DAY, } Judges.

1. Spring-Guns—Trespassers.—Where the owner of a vineyard sets a spring-gun, so arranged with cords or wires, that a trespasser coming into the vineyard will by coming in contact with such cords or wires, discharge the gun and receive injury therefrom, and gives no notice of having such spring-gun in his vineyard, and a trespasser entering the vineyard, comes in contact with such cords or wires, whereby the gun is discharged, and he receives injury, the proprietor is liable in damage to the trespasser.

Digitized by Google

2. ——. In Pari Delicto.—The rule in pari delicto does not apply in such cases.

3. ——. Notice.—Whether notice that such a contrivance had been laid for the protection of the property, would justify the resort to such means, the court do not determine.

Action to recover damages resulting from injuries sustained by plaintiff from a gun-shot wound received by him by means of a spring-gun placed by defendant on his own premises. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff: defendant appeals. The facts of the case appear in the opinion.

S. P. Vannatta, I. M. Preston & Son, for appellant; Thompson Davis, and Nichols, for appellee.

BECK, Ch. J.—The defendant was the owner of a vineyard, and had lost grapes by trespassers entering his enclosure and carrying them away. To protect his fruit from such persons, he planted a spring-gun, so arranged that it would be discharged, in the direction of one entering his premises, by means of wires or cords, which the trespasser would be likely to come in contact with and disturb. He gave no notice whatever that he had so arranged the gun, or of his intention so to do. The gun being thus placed, and charged with powder and shot, the plaintiff, in the night-time, went into the vineyard, without defendant's permission, and received a severe wound from discharging the gun, through the arrangements provided for that purpose. The plaintiff testifies, that his object in entering the premises was, to ask permission of the defendant to take some grapes. But it may be conceded for the purpose of this case, that he entered with the intention of wrongfully taking the fruit without the plaintiff's permission. The court instructed the jury, in effect, that if defendant had set the gun in such a way as to destroy life, or do great bodily harm, of which the plaintiff had no knowledge, and the plaintiff, in entering the premises for the purpose of taking grapes, without defendant's permission, was wounded by means of the gun, he is entitled to recover; that the act of plaintiff in that case, was but a misdemeanor, and would not justify its resistance by means that would take life, or do great bodily harm; that defendant had no right to use a spring-gun for his protection against a mere trespasser, without notice to him, and that defendant's liability, on account of the wound caused by the spring-gun, is the same as though he had discharged it with his own hands.

The giving of these instructions, and the refusal of others presenting a conflicting doctrine, constitutes the foundation of the errors assigned by defendant.

I. The act of the plaintiff entering defendant's vineyard in the night-time, conceding that it was for the purpose of taking grapes without permission, is a misdemeanor. Acts 12 Gen'l Ass. Ch. 74; § 2, Code § 3898. But the defendant had no right to prevent or resist the trespass of the plaintiff, by using means dangerous to life, or by inflicting great bodily injury. In doing so he violated the law, and became liable for injuries sustained by plaintiff, under the doctrine that all injuries inflicted by one, while acting in violation of the law, will support an action in favor of the injured party against the perpetrator. This court has held that a mere trespass against property other than a dwelling, is not a sufficient justification to authorize the use of a deadly weapon by the owner in its defence; and that, if death results in such a case, it will be murder, though the killing be actually necessary to prevent the trespass. The State v. Vance, 17 Iowa, 138. The rule is based upon the consideration that an act of violence done to prevent trespass which causes death, is beyond the provocation, and the perpetrator is guilty of murder. If the intention was not to take life, or the act was done in the heat of passion, the offence would be extenuated, and become no more than manslaughter.

Under the law, at the time of the killing, for which defendant was convicted, in the case just cited, a trespass, of the character of the one committed by the person killed, which was not different from the act of the plaintiff in this case pleaded by the defendant as a justification, was not punishable as a misdemeanor. But this fact cannot defeat the application of the rule of the case now. The rule is based, not on the light in which the law regards the act and the punishment provided for it. The criminality of the act, or the turpitude of the trespasser is not the foundation of the rule. But it is based upon the limitation which the law imposes upon the right of the owner of property in rendering it protection. He cannot prevent a trespass by using means dangerous to life. Now, if the act of the trespasser is punishable as a misdemeanor, that fact does not demand greater violence, or more dangerous means, to secure protection, than if the same act were regarded as a mere trespass, and not a crime. In other words, it requires no more violence to protect property from a trespasser when there is a statute punishing him criminally, than it would in the absence of such an enactment.

The act of defendant, we conclude upon the authority cited and upon principle, in preparing the means whereby the plaintiff's life was endangered, and from which he sustained great bodily injury, was unlawful. It follows in the application of familiar doctrines, which do not demand the support of authority to secure their recognition, that he is liable for the injury inflicted upon plaintiff.

It has been held in England that a trespasser, having notice that spring-guns are laid upon the premises, cannot recover in an action against the owner thereof, for injuries sustained thereby. Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barnewall & Alderson, 304. And that when a trepasser, without such notice, is injured in the same way, he may recover in such an action. Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bingham, 628. So, the owner of a vicious dog is liable for injuries sustained by a trespasser, from being bitten by such dog. Shirfy v. Bartly, 4 Sneed, 58. In New York, the same doctrine with modifications on the side of humanity, has been recognized. It has been there held that the nature and value of the property ought to be such as to justify the use of means for its protection which are dangerous to life, and that the trespasser must have full notice of the mischief, in order to exempt the owner from liability for injuries inflicted. Loomis v. Terry, 17 Wend. 496.

Whether notice to the trespasser of the dangerous contrivances laid for the protection of property, would relieve the owner of liability for injuries caused thereby, we do not determine, as the facts before us do not involve that question, no such defence having been made in this case. The authorities that have come to our notice seem to recognize such a rule.

It has been often held that it is no justification for killing animals, that they were trespassing upon another's premises, or doing injury to his property. Ford v. Taylor, 4 Texas, 492; Tyner v. Cory, 5 Ind. 216; Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Saund. 83.

This rule is doubtless supported upon the consideration that the protection of one's property will not justify the resort to means that are destructive to the property of another, when not demanded by necessity, or the nature of the rights and property concerned. Certainly, humanity requires that a like rule be extended to the person of a trespasser, and that he be not exposed to bodily injury or death, on the mere ground that he is, at the time, acting in violation of law.

II. The defendant insists that under the rule, in pari delicto, or of contributory negligence, the plaintiff cannot recover. If the case be regarded as one of simple negligence on the part of defendant, plaintiff could not be held to the exercise of care, and, in its absence, of contributing to the injury by his own negligence, without having notice of the dangers to which he would be exposed. He could not be regarded as wanting in care, by failing to use means for his protection from dangers unknown to him, or in exposing himself thereto. The rule in pari delicto, affords no protection, in a civil action, to a party who has control of dangerous implements and negligently uses them or places them in a situation unsafe to others, whereby another person, without knowledge thereof, is injured, although, at the time, in the commission of a trespass.

Digitized by Google

This qualification of the rule is demanded on the ground that proper regard for life and the person of others requires care, on the part of persons using deadly weapons and dangerous implements, that injury to others may not be inflicted, and that mere trespasses and other inconsiderable violations of the law, are not to be visited by barbarous punishments, or prevented by inhuman infliction of bodily injuries. The instruction of the court directing the jury that the doctrine of contributory negligence was not applicable to the case, is therefore correct.

It is our opinion that the jury were properly instructed, and the instructions asked by defendant were correctly refused.

AFFIRMED.

NOTE.—1. Defence of Property by Spring-guns—The English Rule.—The question whether the owner of property may lawfully resort to the use of spring-guns and engines of like character, for protecting it in his absence, against trespassing men or animals, is somewhat novel in this country. The question first arose in England in 1817, in the Common Pleas, in Deane v. Clayton, 7 Taunt. 489. The defendant, who was the owner of a wood, had fixed to the trees what were commonly known as dog-spears, being iron spears, fastened to the trees past which the hares were accustomed to run, placed at such a height that while the hares would pass under them, dogs and foxes pursuing the hares would run against them, and be killed. The defendant had posted notice that such spears were set in the wood. The plaintiff being engaged in hunting in the wood with a aluable dog, the dog made his escape from him, and, pursuing a hare, ran against one of the spears and was killed. The judges were equally divided as to whether the plaintiff ought to recover damages, and so no result was reached. Three years later, in the leading case of Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn & Ald 304, (cited in the principal case), the question came before the King's Bench upon the following state of facts: The defendant had placed spring-guns in a wood owned by him, and had posted notices that such guns were so set. Nevertheless, the plaintiff, entering the wood to gather nuts, trod upon a wire connecting with one of them, by which it was discharged, and he severely wounded. The question received an exhaustive discussion, and all the judges agreed that the plaintiff could not recover. In both of these cases the plaintiff had notice of the existence of the engines which caused the injury; and in both cases the judges were agreed that, had there been no notice, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, and that without notice, it would not be lawful to expose even a trespasser to mortal injury. And agreeably to this view, in a subsequent case—Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bing. 628, (cited in the principal case)—where the defendant for the protection of his property, some of which had been stolen, set a spring-gun, without notice, in a walled garden, at a distance from his house, by which the plaintiff, who had climbed over the wall in pursuit of a stray fowl, was shot, it was held that the defendant was liable in damages, on the ground that there had been no notice; but the correctness of this ruling is doubted in Jordin v. Crump, 8 Mees. & Wells. 789. So, in Jay v. Whitefield, an unreported case, cited in 3 Barn. & Ald. 308, and in 4 Bing. 644, the plaintiff, a boy, having entered the defendant's premises for the purpose of cutting a stick, was shot by a spring-gun, for which injury he recovered £120 damages; but it does not appear whether or not notice had been given in this case.

The reasoning upon which Ilott v. Wilkes proceeded was, that since the plaintiff had notice that there were spring-guns set in the wood, the act of discharging the one which caused the injury to him, was his own act, and not the act of the defendant. The fallacy of this reasoning is conclusively shown by SHERMAN, J., in Johnson v. Patterson, 14 Conn. 1, where the reasoning of Justice HOLROYD is said to involve the proposition that a man is not responsible for not guarding against the intended consequences of his own innocent act; and, if he does not, that shall be considered as his own act, which is the act of another. The reasoning of the judges appears to have been little better than mere sophistry, intended to clothe with some color of legal reason, a barbarous rule of law, which really had its foundation, like the English game laws, in feudal and aristocratic policy—a policy which has no existence in this country. And, it is to be said to the credit of the English legislature, that very soon after the determination of this case, the rule declared by it was abolished by statute, 7 and 8 Geo. 4, ch. 18; and this statute has been substantially re-enacted in the 24th and 25th Vict., ch. 100, § 31, by which it is declared, in substance, that whosoever shall set or place, or cause to be set or placed, any spring-gun, man-trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life or inflict grievous bodily harm, with the intent that the same, or whereby the same may destroy or inflict grievous bodily harm upon a trespasser or other person coming in contact therewith, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of five years, [27 and 28 Vict. ch. 47,] or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, without hard labor. And by the subsequent provisions, whosoever shall knowingly and wilfully permit such traps to be set, is deemed to have set them himself; provided this act shall not apply to traps set to destroy vermin, nor to engines set at night for the protection of dwelling-houses.

But, notwithstanding this statute, the English judges seemed disposed to favor the practice prohibited by it as much as possible. Thus, in Wootton v. Dawkins, 2 Com. Bench, N. S. 412, the plaintiff entered the defendant's garden at night, without his permission, to search for a stray fowl, and, whilst looking closely into some bushes, he came in contact with a wire, which caused something to explode with a loud noise, knocking him down and slightly injuring his face and eyes. It was held—1. That the defendant was not liable for this injury at common law. 2. That, in the absence of evidence that it was caused by a spring-gun or other engine calculated to inflict grievous bodily harm, he was not liable under the 7 and 8 Geo. 4, ch. 18, § 1

2. Dog Spears—The English Rule.—The question left unsettled in Deane v. Clayton, supra, as to the right to protect game in parks by means of dog-spears, was finally resolved in favor of the right, in Jordin v. Crump, 8 Mees and Wells. 782, where the rule was laid down that a person, passing with his dog through a wood, in which he knows dog-spears are set, has no right of action against the owner of the wood, for the death or injury of his dog, who, by reason of his own natural instinct, and against the will of his master, runs off the path against one of the dog-spears, and is killed or injured; because the setting of dog-spears was not in itself an illegal act, nor was it rendered so by the 7 and 8 Geo. 4, ch. 18.

In a case earlier than any of the above, it was held that if a man place dangerous traps, baited with flesh, in his own ground, so near to a highway, or to the premises of another, that dogs passing along the highway, or kept on his neighbor's premises, must probably be attracted by their instinct into the traps; and, if, in consequence of such act, his neighbor's dogs are so attracted, and thereby injured, he is liable in damages. Townsend v. Wathen, 9 East, 277. But in this case it was proved to have been his intention to kill dogs by this means, as well as other animals; several dogs having been killed in such traps, and he having allowed his game-keeper a reward of one shilling for every dog so killed.

3. Spring-guns—The American Doctrine.—The question as to the lawfulness of the use of spring-guns in the defence of property first arose in the United States in Gray v. Coombs, 7 J. J. Marshall, 478, in the court of appeals of Kentucky, in 1832; and it was there ruled that where a person has valuable property in a strong warehouse, well secured by locks and doors, he may, as an additional security at night, erect a spring-gun which can only be made to explode by entering the house; and if a slave in endeavoring to break into the warehouse is killed by such spring-gun, the owner of the warehouse will not be liable to the master of the slave for his value.

The question next received an exhaustive discussion in Johnson v. Patterson, 14 Conn. 1, decided in the supreme court of errors of Connecticut in 1840; although it was not directly involved in the case. The action was for damages for poisoning the plaintiff's fowls. The defendant, to prevent the plaintiff's fowls from trespassing on his lands, as they had before done, mixed Indian meal with arsenic, and spead it upon his land, having given the plaintiff previous notice that he should do so; and such fowls coming afterwards upon the defendant's land, ate the poisoned meal, in consequence of which some of them died; it was held, 1, that the previous notice, in contradistinction to notice after the fact, was sufficient; 2, that notwithstanding such notice, the defendant was not justified in the use of deadly means, and consequently was liable in damages. And, the right of an owner to defend his property in his absence, by means of engines or poisons placed so as to kill or injure trespassing men or animals, was discussed at length upon principle and in view of the English authorities, and it was held, that no such right exists in Connecticut. But the doctrine of this case was limited to cases of trespass merely. What may be done to prevent burglary or felony, was admitted to be governed by other rules.

The question appears next to have arisen in State v. Moore, 31 Conn. 479, determined in the supreme court of errors of Connecticut, in 1863. The defendant was indicted for a nuisance in placing spring-guns in his blacksmith shop, so as to endanger passers-by on the highway. The jury, by a special verdict, found that the defendant placed spring-guns in his shop for its protection against burglars; that the guns were loaded with large shot, and so placed as to discharge their contents obliquely towards the highway, the travelled path of which was about a rod and half from the shop; that the shop was lathed and plastered on the inside and double-boarded on the outside, but that it was possible that scattering shot might pass through the boards at places where, by reason of the cracks between them, there was not a double thickness of boards; and that the travelling public were annoyed and apprehensive of harm from the guns. It was held, that it did not appear that there was such real and substantial danger to the public as to warrant a conviction.

Digitized by Google

Concerning the right of resorting to spring-guns for the purpose of protecting property the court reason, that the mere act of setting spring-guns on one's own premises for their protection, is not unlawful in itself, but the person doing it may be responsible for injuries caused thereby to individuals, and may be indictable for the erection of a nuisance, if the public are subjected by it to any danger; that what a man may not do directly, he may not do indirectly; that a man may not, therefore, place instruments of destruction for the protection of his property, where he would not be authorized to take life with his own hand for its protection; that the right to take life in defence of property, as well as of person and habitation, is a natural right; but the law limits its exercise to the prevention of forcible, and atrocious crimes, of which burglary is one; that in the absence of any statutory provision making it burglary to break and enter a shop in the night-time, with intent to steal, and by the early strict rules of the common law, a man may not take life in the prevention of such a crime; but that the habits of the people and other circumstances, have so greatly changed since the ancient rule was established, that it is very questionable whether, in view of the large amount of property now kept in warehouses, banks, and other out-buildings, it should not be held lawful to place instruments of destruction for the protection of such property; that breaking and entering a shop in the night-season with intent to steal, is, by the law of Connecticut, burglary; and that the placing of spring-guns in such a shop for its defence, would be justified, if the burglar should be killed by them; that the guns would, however, constitute a nuisance if they cause actual danger to passers-by in the street; but that the danger to the public must be of a real and substantial nature.

4. Limit of the Right to defend one's Doods.—If we adopt the conclusion of the Connecticut case last above quoted, that what a man may not do directly, he may not do indirectly, the question involved in the principal case will be found to have been settled by a great weight of authority. That a person is not obliged to surrender the possession of his goods, his lands, or other property to a wrong-doer without resistance, does not admit of question People v. Hubbard, 24 Wend. 369; Curtis v. Hubbard, 1 Hill, 336; S. C., 4 Hill, 437; Commonwealth v. Kennard, 8 Pick. 133, 137; Commonwealth v. Power, 7 Metcalf, (Mass.) 596; People v. Honshell, 10 Cal. 87; Harrington v. People, 5 Barb. 611, 612; McAuley v. State, 3 G. Greene, 435; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 861, 5th ed. He may by the doctrine of these, and all the cases where the rule is stated, use, within a certain prescribed limit, as much force as is necessary to preserve his possession—taking care the degree of force used does not exceed what is necessary, or what reasonably appears to be necessary, for the purpose of defence and prevention. The limit here spoken of, is the limit at which it becomes necessary to take or endanger life, in order to protect one's possession. And here, the criminal law, which seeks certainty in its rules as far as possible, divides offences against property into two general classes, namely, felonies and trespasses, for the purpose of determining whether a killing in prevention of such offences, shall be deemed justifiable or culpable.

And the first rule which may be stated is, that a killing which is necessary, or which reasonably appears to be necessary, to prevent a forcible and atrocious felony against property, is justifiable homicide. Pond. v. People, 8 Mich. 150; People v. Payne, 8 Cal., 341; State v. Roane, 2 Devereaux, 58; Gray v. Coombs, 7 J. J. Marsh, 478; State v. Moore, 31 Conn. 479; Johnson v. Patterson, 14 Conn. 1. This rule, the common law writers limit to cases of secret felonies, or felonies not accompanied with force. 1 Hale P. C. 488; 1 East P. C. 273; Foster, 274. Though we do not find this distinction adjudged in any modern case which we have seen, yet it has been quoted with approbation in several. Pond's case, supra; Moore's case, supra. Mr. Bishop, however, is of opinion that upon principle there can be found no such distinction in the law itself; but why he is of this opinion, he does not saisfactorily tell us. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 853, 5th ed. It is pretty clear, that the right to kill in defence of property does not extend to cases of larceny, which is a crime of a secret character; although the cases which illustrate this exception, are generally cases of theft of articles of small value. Thus, in Reg. v. Murphy, 2 Craw. & Dix C. C., 20, the prisoner was indicted under the statute for maliciously shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm, etc. It appeared that on the day in question, the prisoner, who was a game-keeper and wood ranger of Lord Dunsany, and armed with a fowling piece, detected the prosecutor in the act of carrying away from his employer's lands a bundle of sticks, consisting of branches severed from the growing timber by a recent storm; that the prisoner hailed him, when he dropped the sticks and ran; upon which the prisoner called out, "If you don't stop, I'll fire;" but the prosecutor still going on, the prisoner fired, wounding him in the head, back and arms. DOHERTY, Ch. J., said: "There is no doubt that the prosecutor, in carrying away the branches previously dissevered from the trees, was committing a felony, and the prisoner was clearly entitled to arrest him; but in discharging his gun at the prosecutor, and perilling his life, the prisoner has very much exceeded his lawful powers, and I cannot allow it to go abroad, that it is lawful to fire upon a person committing trespass and larceny; for that would be punishing, perhaps with death, offences for which the law has provided milder penalties." And see to the same effect, McClelland v. Kay, 14 B. Monroe, 106; Gardiner v. Thibodeau, 14 La. An, 733; State v. Vance, 17 Iowa, 144; Priester v. Augley, 5 Rich. (Law), 44. It may be observed, however, that the right extends to statutory felonies, as well as to felonies at common law. Gray v. Coombs, supra; Pond's case, supra; Moore's case, supra. And it would seem that the fact that a common law felony has been reduced by statute to a misdemeanor, does not diminish the right of defence applicable to such cases. Gray v. Coombs, supra; Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169. These cases are in accord upon this point with what is said by the learned chief justice in the principal case, where he says that the rule which forbids the resorting to such dangerous means for the prevention of trespasses does not depend upon the light in which the law regards the act and the punishment provided for it, but upon the limitation which the law puts upon the right of the owner of property in rendering it protection. Language of similar import was used by NICHOLAS, J., in Gray v. Coombs, supra, where he said that "a name can neither add to, nor detract from, the moral qualities of a crime; and in the eye of reason and justice, the intrinsic nature of the offence, together with the time and manner of its attempted commission, must ever test the legality of the means to be resorted to for its prevention." 7 J. J. Marsh. 483.

But the ordinary rule is, that a killing to prevent a mere trespass upon property, or any asportation of or injury to it, which does not amount to a felony, is a felonious homicide; or, viewed in the light of a civil action, unlawful. Harrison's case, 24 Ala. 67; Drew's case, 4 Mass. 391; United States v. Williams, 2 Cranch, C. C. 439; Priester v. Augley, 5 Rich. (Law), 44; State v. Morgan, 3 Ired. 186; State v. McDonald, 4 Jones (Law), 22; State v. Brandon, 8 Jones (Law), 467; State v. Vance, 17 Iowa, 144; Gardiner v. Thibodeau, 14 La. An. 733; McClelland v. Kay, 14 B. Monroe, 106. As where a person kills an officer who comes unlawfully to distrain his goods. United States v. Williams, supra Or where a person kills a slave who is stealing sugar-cane. Priester v. Augley, supra. Or stealing chickens. McClelland v. Kay, supra; Gardiner v. Thibodeau, supra. Or where a person kills another who lets down a dividing fence, and hauls off manure as to which there is a disputed claim. State v. McDonald, supra. Or kills one who is taking corn from a bin, the right to which is in dispute. State v. Brandon, supra. Or where a person fires among a party of boys who are stealing his melons, and kills one of them. State v. Vance, supra. Or shoots and wounds a person who is carrying off branches severed from his master's trees. Reg. v. Murphy, 2 Crawf. and Dix, C. C. 20.

It is seen, therefore, that the rule that it is unlawful to set engines dangerous to life, for the defence of property against mere trespassers, is not only correct upon principle, as enforced by the reasoning of the principal case, but is sustained by a great array of authority; although it is possible that such means of defence are permissible to secure valuable property kept in warehouses and shops against nocturnal depredators.

Power of the States to tax Agencies of the General Government.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. PENISTON, TREASURER OF LINCOLN COUNTY; S. C., 1 DILLON, C. C. R. 314.

Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1873.

Nature and extent of taxing power of the states considered, and held that the Union Pacific Railroad company was not such an instrumentality of the federal government, as exempts its road bed and rolling stock from state taxation.

The facts will be found fully stated in the report of the case as determined in the court below, under the name of Union Pacific Railroad Company v. Lincoln County, 1 Dillon C. C. R. 314.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

That the taxing power of a state is one of its attributes of sovereignty; that it exists independently of the constitution of the United States, and underived from that instrument; and that it may be exercised to an unlimited extent upon all property, trades, business, and avocations existing or carried on within the territorial boundaries of the state, except so far as it has been surrendered to the federal government, either expressly or by necessary implication, are propositions that have often been asserted by this court. And in thus acknowledging the extent of the power to tax belonging to the States, we have declared that it is indispensable to their continued existence. No one ever doubted that before the adoption of the constitution of the United States, each of the states possessed unlimited power to tax, either directly or indirectly, all persons and property within their jurisdictions, alike by taxes on polls, or duties on internal production, manufacture, or use, except so far as such taxation was inconsistent with certain treaties which had been made. And the constitution contains no express restriction of this power other than a prohibition to lay any duty of tonnage, or any impost, or duty on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing the state's inspection laws. As was said in Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. 71, "in respect to property, business, and persons within their respective limits, the power of taxation of the states remained, and remains entire, notwithstanding the constitution." It is, indeed, a concurrent power, (concurrent with that of the general government,) and in the case of a tax upon the same subject by both governments, the claim of the United States as the supreme authority must be preferred; but with this qualification it is absolute. The extent to which it shall be exercised, the subjects upon which it shall be exercised, and the mode in which it shall be exercised, are all equally within the discretion of the legislatures to which the states commit the exercise of the power. That discretion is restrained only by the will of the people expressed in the state constitutions, or through elections, and by the condition that it must not be so used as to burden or embarrass the operations of the national government. There is nothing in the constitution which contemplates or authorizes any direct abridgment of this power by national legislation. To the extent just indicated, it is as complete in the states as the like power within the limits of the constitution is complete in congress." Such are the opinions we have expressed heretofore, and we adhere to them now.

Digitized by Google

There are, we admit, certain subjects of taxation which are withdrawn from the power of the states, not by any direct or express provision of the federal constitution, but by what may be regarded as its necessary implications. They grow out of our complex system of government, and out of the fact that the authority of the national government is legitimately exercised within the states. While it is true that government cannot exercise its power of taxation so as to destroy the state governments, or embarass their lawful action, it is equally true that the states may not levy taxes, the direct effect of which shall be to hinder the exercise of any powers which belong to tke national government. The constitution contemplates that none of those powers may be restrained by state legislation. But it is often a difficult question whether a tax imposed by a state does in fact invade the domain of the general government, or interfere with its operations to such an extent, or in such a manner, as to render it unwarranted. It cannot be that a state tax which remotely affects the efficient exercise of a federal power is, for that reason, alone, inhibited by the constitution. To hold that, would be to deny to the states all power to tax persons or property. Every tax levied by a state withdraws from the reach of federal taxation a portion of the property from which it is taken, and to that extent diminishes the subject upon which federal taxes may be laid. The states are, and they must ever be, co-existent with the national government. Neither may destroy the other. Hence, the federal constitution must receive a practical construction. Its limitations and its implied prohibitions must not be extended so far as to destroy the necessary powers of the states, or prevent their efficient exercise.

These observations are directly applicable to the case before us. It is insisted, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the tax of which they complain has been laid upon an agent of the general government, constituted and organized as an instrument to carry into effect the powers vested in that government by the constitution, and it is claimed that such an agency is not subject to state taxation. That the Union Pacific Railroad Company was created to subserve, in part, at least, the lawful purposes of the national government; that it was authorized to construct and maintain a railroad and telegraph line along the prescribed route, and that grants were made to it, and privileges conferred upon it, upon condition that it should at all times transmit despatches over its telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies and public stores upon the railroad for the government, whenever required to do so by any department thereof, and that the government should at all times have the preference in the use of the same, for all the purposes aforesaid, must be conceded. Such are the plain provisions of its charter. So it was provided that in case of the refusal or failure of the company to redeem the bonds advanced to it by the government, or any part of them, when lawfully required by the secretary of the treasury, the road, with all the rights, functions, immunities, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and also all lands granted to the company by the United States which at the time of the default should remain in the ownership of the company, might be taken possession of by the secretary of the treasury for the use and benefit of the United States. The charter also contains other provisions looking to a supervision and control of the road and telegraph line, with the avowed purpose of securing to the government the use and benefit thereof for postal and military purposes. It is unnecessary to mention these in detail. They all look to a purpose of congress to secure an agency competent and under obligation to perform certain offices for the general government. Notwithstanding this, the railroad and the telegraph line are neither in whole nor in part the property of the government. The ownership is in the complainants, a private corporation, though existing for the performance of public duties. The government owns none of its stock, and though it may appoint two of the directers, the right thus to appoint is plainly reserved for the sole purpose of enabling the enforcement of the engagements which the company assumed, the engagements to which we have already alluded.

Admitting, then, fully, as we do, that the company is an agent of the general government, designed to be employed, and actually employed, in the legitimate service of the government, both military and postal, does it necessarily follow that its property is exempt from state taxation?

[After reviewing Thompson v. Union Pacific R. R. Co. 9 Wall. 579; McCullough v. Maryland 4 Wheat. 316; Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, the court proceeds:]

It is, therefore, manifest that exemption of federal agencies from state taxation is dependent, not upon the nature of the agents, or upon the mode of their constitution, or upon the fact that they are agents, but upon the effect of the tax; that is, upon the question whether the tax does in truth deprive them of power to serve the government as they were intended to serve it, or does hinder the efficient exercise of their power. A tax upon their property has no such necessary effect. It leaves them free to discharge the duties they have undertaken to perform. A tax upon their operations is a direct obstruction to the exercise of federal powers.

In this case, the tax is laid upon the property of the railroad company precisely as was the tax complained of in Thompson v. Union Pacific. It is not imposed upon the franchise or the right of the company to exist and perform the functions for which it was brought into being. Nor is it laid upon any act which the company has been authorized to do. It is not the transmission of dispatches, nor the transportation of United States mails, or troops, or munitions of war, that is taxed, but it is exclusively the real and personal property of the agent, taxed in common with all other property in the state of a similar character. It is impossible to maintain that this is an interference with the exercise of any power belonging to the general government; and if it is not, it is prohibited by no constitutional implication.

It remains only to notice one other position taken by the complainants. It is, that if the act of the state, under which the tax was laid, be constitutional in its application to their property within Lincoln county, the property outside of Lincoln county is not lawfully taxable by the authorities of that county under the laws of the State. To this we are unable to give our assent. By the statutes of Nebraska, the unorganized territory west of Lincoln county, and the unorganized county of Cheyenne, are attached to the county of Lincoln for judicial and revenue purposes. The authorities of that county, therefore, were the proper authorities to levy the tax upon the property thus placed under their charge for revenue purposes.

Digitized by Google

The decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE concurring:

I concur in the affirmance of the judgment in this case. I see no reason to doubt that it was the intention of congress not to give the exemption claimed. The exercise of the power may be waived. But I hold that the road is a national instrumentality of such a character that congress may interpose and protect it from state taxation, whenever that body shall deem it proper to do so. For some of the leading authorities in support of the principle involved in this view of the subject, I refer to the Chicago and Northwestern Railway v. Fuller, decided by this court a short time ago.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissenting, wrote a long opinion, in which he held that if the road-bed may be taxed, it may be seized and sold for non-payment of taxes; seized and sold in parts and parcels; separated by county or state lines, and thus the whole purpose of congress, in creating the corporation, and establishing the line, may be subverted and destroyed. In his judgment, the tax laid in this case was an unconstitutional interference with the instrumentalities created by the national government in carrying out the objects and powers conferred upon it by the constitution.

Mr. Justice FIELD concurred with Mr. Justice BRADLEY. Mr. Justice HUNT dissented from the opinion of the court but wrote no opinion.

Power of Master of Vessel to Create a Lien on Vessel in Violation of his Instructions—When United States Courts will Refuse to Entertain Suits in Admiralty Between Foreigners.

On the 17th instant, Judge BLATCHFORD, sitting in the United States district court for the southern district of New York, rendered an interesting decision in the case of Fechtenberg et al. v. The British bark Woodland, her tackle, etc. The Woodland being in the port of St. Thomas, her master drew certain drafts on her owners, whereby he undertook to pledge the vessel, freight and cargo, for their payment, and which gave to whomsoever might be the legal holder of them, a lien upon the vessel, freight and cargo. These drafts were negotiated with J. Niles & Co., of St. Thomas, who assigned them to the libellants. It is unnecessary to set out the allegations of the libel and answer, as the facts on which the case turns are stated in the concluding portion of Judge BLATCHFORD'S opinion, as follows:

"In the present case the libellants have put in evidence a letter of December 24, 1870, from the claimants to the master. That letter was made known to J. Niles & Co., and to the libellants. It authorizes the raising of the funds by drafts on Heaney & Parker, or by drafts on the claimants, and states that the claimants have no doubt that the master will be able to obtain funds in that way. But it contemplates, as the alternative means, only a bottomry. It authorizes a bottomry if a resort to drafts fails. But it authorizes only drafts or a bottomry. It must be regarded as excluding the master from resorting to anything but drafts or a bottomry, and as excluding him from resorting to the creation of a lien on the vessel by any form or hypothecation other than a bottemry, or to the creation of such a lien as is asserted in this case, whether an implied lien to result from the transactions, or whatever lien the language of the drafts may be claimed to create. J. Niles & Co., and the libellants declined to take the master's drafts, as authorized by the letter, and insisted that the master should undertake to create a lien on the vessel by other means than a bottomry. They insisted that the master should exceed his authority, as defined and limited by the letter. It is of no consequence to show that a resort to bottomry would have been more expensive to the claimants. They had a right to limit the authority of the master, and they did so. It is of importance so to administer the maritime law, that vessels in distress in foreign ports shall not be deprived of the means of obtaining relief; but it is no less important that masters of vessels and persons dealing with them, with knowledge of the instructions under which they are acting, shall keep within the limits of such instructions. As this is not a case communis juris, and both parties are foreigners, and the contract was made with reference to the law of the vessel's country, it is a case where the question of the liability of the owners of the vessel can, with especial propriety, be determined by the tribunals of such country. The libel must be dismissed with costs."

National Banks—Rate of Interest.

The supreme court of Indiana, on the 7th inst., delivered an opinion, holding that national banks, organized and doing business in the state of Indiana, may lawfully charge an interest rate of ten per cent., to which may be added the current rate of exchange for sight drafts where there is a purchase discount, or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at other place than the place of purchase, discount or sale. The reserving or receiving of illegal interest by a national bank does not defeat a recovery upon the note for the principal of the debt. In an action upon an usurious contract for loan of money made with a national bank, or with any person on its behalf, or as its trustee, the bank can recover no interest, nor can defendant recover any interest paid. The usurious interest, with the penalty prescribed by the national banking law, is recoverable as therein stated.

Book Notice.

A TREATISE ON THE AMERICAN LAW OF EASEMENTS AND SERVITUDES. By Emory Washburn, LL.D., Bussey Professor of Law in Harvard University, author of a Treatise on the American Law of Real Property. Third edition. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1873. pp. 776. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, Law Booksellers, St. Louis.

The third edition of this treatise contains over 200 pages more than the first, and mentions and cites 600 new cases, decided since the second edition was published in 1867. A comparison with the previous editions shows that the present has not only been enlarged, but otherwise improved.

It is a complete and exhaustive treatise. It will be difficult to find in England, or in this country, a well considered case on the subject of which the book treats, which has escaped the unwearied diligence of the author. For an American lawyer, there is no substitute for this work, and in Great Britain it would seem to be equally useful, being more comprehensive than any treatise on the subject which has there appeared. The most striking feature of the book is the great labor and care which have been bestowed upon it. It fulfils excellently the leading office of an elementary work, in showing the exact state of the law on the subject with which it deals. It would, perhaps, be possible to classify the cases referred to in the text and condense the book two hundred pages, and the work, artistically viewed, would be more symmetrical; but, to the practising lawyer, for whose use it is chiefly designed, its practical value would, in our judgment, be thereby impaired.

Treating of a single subject, which embraces many topics not yet fully settled, it was practicable for the author to undertake to refer to all the principal cases, and to state in the text the exact substance of the more important of them; and this Prof. Washburn has done. A book prepared upon this plan, wherever it is practicable, is more useful to the mass of the profession than one in which the author gives us more of his own views and discussions. It is to be recollected that, in not one place in a hundred where the book will be used, is to be found a full library, and this consideration justifies the author in his full statement of the more important adjudications, and in taking the space necessary to display, though with some repetition, the course of decisions in the several states.

Digitized by Google

While we are of opinion that this work would not serve as an universal model for law treatises, yet for the subject in hand, the plan is excellent, and has been executed with that skill and pains-taking care for which the author is justly noted.

It may be acceptable to some of our readers to give an idea of its scope.

Chapter I. treats of the nature of Easements and the mode of acquiring them by Grant, User and Prescription, and Dedication.

Chapter II. treats of Easements and Servitudes of WAY, and herein of Ways of Necessity, by Grant, how used, and the relative rights of the land-owner and the way-owner.

Chapter III. treats of Easements and servitudes of WATER, and herein of Irrigation; Water for Mills; Artificial Water Courses; Rights in Rain and Surface Waters; Subterranean Waters, and Public Waters.

Chapter IV. relates to Miscellaneous Easements, such as the Lateral Support of Land, and the Support of Houses; Party Walls; Light and Air, etc.

Chapter V. treats of the Loss and Extinguishment of Easements, by uniting the dominant and servient estates; by abandonment, non-user, etc.

Chapter VI. relates to the Repair of Easements and Remedies at Law and in Equity for injuries thereto by action, by injunction and by abatement.

A few topics, and but a few, we noticed in passing, had not been treated by the author with his accustomed fullness. For example, the distinction which is overlooked or disregarded in so many of the cases between ordinary highways in the country, and streets in compact places or in incorporated towns, as to the uses to which they may properly be put, and the remedies of the public and the adjoining owner for improper uses, is not as fully defined and enforced as it seems to us it is desirable, at least on principle, that it should be.

The chapter on Dedication is a mine of wealth on the subject, and quite exhausts the authorities relating to it, except upon the point, whether the rights of the public in a complete and accepted dedication can be lost by non-user or adverse possession. On this subject there are cases not referred to by the author, and which are essential to a full understanding of the views which the courts have held concerning it, and the state of the law upon the subject.

The principal rights of riparian owners are well presented. We think the author does well to question the doctrine which has been sanctioned in New Jersey, (Stevens v. Paterson etc., Railroad, 5 C. E. Green 126, 34 N. J. (Law) 532); in New York, (Gould v. Hudson River R. R. 6 N. Y. 522); and recently in Iowa, (Tomlin v. Dubuque etc. R. R. Co. 32 Iowa 106), that a riparian proprietor upon a navigable river, is without remedy for being deprived of access to the water by the construction of a railroad along the river, outside of the water-line bounding the land of such owner; and to invite comparison with the rights of such owners to access to the stream, as laid down by Mr. Justice MILLER in Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497. Without here entering upon the discussion of the subject, we may observe that the doctrine that the riparian owner has no rights except those of alluvion and dereliction, and in particular, that he has no right of access to the navigable water, of which he cannot be deprived without compensation, is not to our mind so clear that it should be adopted by other courts without at least further consideration.

The author's treatment of rights in respect to public streams, and surface-water, party-walls, light and air, and the right of support of land and houses, leaves nothing to be desired. The work is a credit to the law literature of the country, and is published in the excellent style which has justly made the house of Little, Brown & Co. famous

Notes of Recent Tennessee Decisions.

SUPREME COURT, JACKSON, OCTOBER (SPECIAL) TERM, 1873.

[Courtesy of Hon. J. Pierce of Memphis.]

Bankruptcy.—See Replevin; Surety.

Bill of Lading—In the hands of a consignee (though the property be consigned to him on account of a debt) does not amount to actual or constructive possession of the property, but only gives authority to reduce it to possession. Saunders v. Bartlett.

Corporation; Insolvent.—In winding up, each stockholder is liable to the creditors for the full amount of his subscription, irrespective of insolvent stockholders; and the creditors are entitled to immediate payment, and cannot be postponed till after the collection of doubtful claims. Marr v. Bank West Tennessee.

Dray—Is a vehicle, and subject to municipal tax as such. Memphis v. Battaile.

Demurrer.—Under the Tennessee code, abolishing general demurrers—a demurrer to a plea or subsequent pleading, does not ransack the record or reach back to the declaration. Hobbs v. Memphis and Charleston R. R. Company.

Evidence—In cases in chancery, must be secundum allegata. Johnson v. Luckadoo.

———. Books of account, when testified to by witnesses, are competent evidence. Apperson v. Harris.

Endorser—Notice to, left at his residence, when it was known that he had abandoned it, is not sufficient to bind him. Selby v. Brinkley.

Frauds, Statute of.—A verbal promise to pay the debt of another is void under the statute, even where the promisor has the debtor's effects in his hands. Murphy v. Renkert.

Infant—Is not bound by a decree obtained in a suit where the administrator, being a party, has also acted as prochein ami. O'Connor v. Cobb.

———. Is not bound by the stipulations of the guardian's lease, to pay for improvements. Keep v. Cannavan.

Insurance.—Condition of policy that suit be brought within 12 months after loss, was avoided and nullified by the breaking out of the late war. (Acc. 13 Wall. 158.) Underwood v. Phœnix Insurance Co.

———. Parties to an insurance policy are bound by their contract, according to its fair and reasonable intendment. People's Insurance Co. v. Kuhn.

———. Condition in policy sustained, that "the use of general terms, or anything less than a special written endorsement, does not waive the printed conditions." Ibid.

Jury.—Depositions being taken to be read in each of three cases, the jury that tried one case is incompetent to try the others. Apperson v. Logwood.

Limitations, Statute of.—Part payment of a note within six years, without more, is not sufficient proof of a new promise as to the remainder. Locke v. Wilson.

Malicious Prosecution.—In an action for, under the Tennessee code, want of probable cause is a substantial fact in the case, and a failure to aver it specifically in the declaration, is bad after judgment by default, and is reversible error. Thompson v. Evans.

Municipal Corporation—Is an imperium in imperio, and special legislation for it is not unconstitutional. [Acc. Trigalley case, 6 Cold. 382.] Memphis v. Battaile.

Plea in abatement—Lies to an ancillary attachment, and the issues on it are to be tried separately by a jury, before the trial of the main suit. Price v. Bescher.

Partnership—Not liable for money advanced to one partner on his sole credit, though the firm get the benefit of it. Union & Planters' Bank v. Day.

———. On attachment against one member of, the sheriff may take possession of the firm property and sell the debtor's interest in it. (N. B.—The property not in actual possession of either partner.) Saunders v. Bartlett.

Replevin.—The suit as to detention being decided without reference to damages, a separate action may brought for the damages. Colby v. Yates.

Digitized by Google

———. Surety on bond for, may be discharged from it in bankruptcy. Choate's case.

Surety.—On appeal from magistrate. If the principal be discharged on plea in bankruptcy, this is a prosecution of the appeal with effect, and relieves the surety on his bond. Martin v. Kilburn.

Trover.—If a factor pledge the goods of his principal for his own debt, this is a conversion on the part of the pledgee. Merch. Nat. Bank v. Trenholm.

Verdict—Not disturbed for small errors where the merits are reached. Otis v. Consat. Gibson v. Apperson.

Voluntary Conveyance—Not fraudulent, where the grantor retains an abundance of property to pay his debts. Crisp v. Dunn. Bramwell v. Hart.

Witness.—Husband not a competent witness against wife. "The old rule that husband or wife is not competent, is still in force in Tennessee, so far as it rests on public policy and the harmony of interest." Smith v. Tuggle.

———. Under the statute making parties competent, a party need not subpœna himself as a witness, and the rules of the circuit court cannot require it. Douglas v. Blakemore.

United States Supreme Court — Decisions Last Week.

[Compiled from the New York Herald.]

Confiscation; Mortgaged Property; Life estate.—No. 180. Day v. Mican et al.— Error to the supreme court of Louisiana.—The defendants here were plaintiffs in the state court, where they commenced a hypothecary action as the children and heirs of one Mrs. Mican against Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin as mortgagors of a parcel of land in Hurstville, and against Day, the plaintiff here, then in possession, to enforce the mortgage by the sale of the property hypothecated. The claim was established by producing a mortgage dated July 23, 1858, in which J. P. Benjamin acknowledged a debt to Mrs. Mican for $10,000 borrowed money, to be paid four years after date, and a mortgage from J. P. & Joseph Benjamin on the same property, with a fact de non aliendo, that the mortgagors would not sell, alienate, or encumber the property, to the prejudice of the mortgagee. The proceeding resulted in a judgment against the Benjamins as mortgagors, and from that judgment they have not appealed. Day's title arises in a conveyance made in pursuance of proceedings in confiscation, in virtue of which the property was sold, as belonging to the Benjamins, in March, 1865. The decision below sustained the mortgagees' claim, holding that, upon a proper construction of the act of congress referred to in the record, there was nothing offered for sale, or which could be sold or purchased, except the title of Benjamin at the date of the act, and that the description of the property in the libel of information, and in the marshal's notice of seizure, was not sufficient to justify the conveyance to Day, or to notify the mortgagees of the proceedings, inasmuch as the property is described as being in the town of Huntsville, instead of Hurstville, the name used in the mortgage. The writ of error maintains that this decision was error, because based upon the ruling that only a life estate was confiscable under the act, and because holding that, after condemnation and sale, the property was subject to the mortgage in the hands of the purchaser at the judicial sale.

Two other cases were argued with this, involving the same question, in both of which the property condemned and sold belonged to John Slidell, and in which his children and heirs were successful.

The supreme court hold, that in the proceedings in confiscating the property of Judah P. Benjamin, there was not sufficient notice to Mr. Benjamin's mortgagees, and, therefore, affirm the judgment below sustaining the title of the mortgagees as against Day, the purchaser under the proceedings.

In the case of Bougree v. John Slidell et al., the decision affirms the judgment below, holding that the confiscation of the property of Slidell passed only a life estate, and did not affect the title of his children as heirs.

Appeal in Admiralty from Circuit to district Court; Judgment on such Appeal; Final Judgment.—No. 218. Steamer Lucille v. Resposo.—Appeal from the circuit court for Maryland.—In this case the court hold that an appeal in admiralty from the district to the circuit court, in effect vacates the decree of the district court, and a new trial in all respects and a new decree are to be had in the circuit court. The latter court must execute its own decree, and the district court has nothing more to do with the case. An order of the circuit merely affirming the decree of the district court, and nothing more, is not such a decree as the circuit court should render, and is not a final decree, from which an appeal lies to this court. Dismissed. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Violation of Contract by Government; Measure of Damages.—No. 169. Buckley v. The United States.—Appeal from the court of claims.—This was a suit upon a contract for the transportation of government stores, the claimant alleging a violation of the contract by the government and asking damages therefor. The measure of damages, according to the theory of the claimant, was properly the amount of profits lost by the non-fulfilment of the contract, and thus, considering it, he declined to prove the actual loss sustained, and thereupon the court dismissed his petition. That judgment is here affirmed, the court holding that there was nothing in the contract to support the theory of the claimant. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

Actions for Penalties; National Banks; Usury.—No. 178. Tiffany v. The National Bank of the State of Missouri—Error to the circuit court for Missouri.—This was an action by the trustee of a bankrupt to recover double the amount of interest paid by the bankrupt to the bank under the act of congress of June, 1864, which provided that the national banks might charge the same rates of interest (and no more) as allowed by the laws of the state where the bank was located, and, in case of a violation of the act, allowed a recovery of double the amount. The judgment below was for the bank, the court finding that by a proper construction of the laws of Missouri there had been no violation of the federal statute. The judgment is here affirmed, the court saying that in an action to recover a statutory penalty, the statute under which the penalty is to be enforced must receive a strict construction. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Reversal of void Judgment; Defective Service of Process.—No. 142. Kibbe v. Benson.—Appeal from the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois.—This was the affirmance of a decree below in favor of Benson, touching the title to certain lands in Adams county, Illinois, the court sustaining the position taken by the defendant in error that a judgment in ejectment, which had been recovered against him and which was reversed below, was obtained without proper service. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Bankruptcy; Preferment by Insolvent; Endorser.—No. 171. Bartholow v. Bean—Error to the circuit court for the district of Missouri.—In this case the court say that a judgment by an insolvent which would otherwise be void as a preference under sections 35 and 39 of the bankrupt law, is not excepted out of that provision because it was made to a holder of his note over due on which there was a solvent endorser, whose liability was already fixed by protest and notice. Judgment affirmed. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Contract of Acceptance; Cotton Tax.—No 93. Miltenberger & Co. v. Cook.—Error to the district court of Louisiana.—In this case the court sustain a judgment against the plaintiffs in error, upon their acceptance of drafts drawn upon them by a firm in the interior of Louisiana, for the payment of the tax on cotton, which, as collector of internal revenue, Cook had agreed to receive, the court holding that they were liable on their agreement to accept the paper drawn for the amount of revenue tax on cotton shipped to them. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Land Law.—No. 670. Crews v. Brewer.—Error to the circuit court for the southern district of Illinois.—This is an affirmance of the title to certain lands in Illinois, the court sustaining the title of those who held under conveyances from the settlers at the date of the cession to the United States, as against those who claim by pre-emption, and the action of the land department since. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

Cases in this and Next Number—Acknowledgements.

We print in this number a highly important decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, to which we have heretofore alluded, upon the subject of the validity of sales under deeds of trust, made during the war, the grantor residing within the insurrectionary territory. Also, an interesting opinion of Chief Justice NICHOLSON, of Tennessee, on the question under what circumstances a deed takes effect as an escrow. Also, an important opinion of Judge NAPTON, of the supreme court of Missouri, about a matter of much interest to sheriffs, namely: the manner of proceeding under the statutes of Missouri, to levy executions upon homestead property. Also, an opinion by DILLON, J., in a contest between a sheriff and an assignee in bankruptcy for the possession of the proceeds of property sold at sheriff's sale under levies made before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

We gratefully acknowledge the reception of valuable and able opinions, from Judge ROBERT A. HILL of Mississippi, Judge ERSKINE of Georgia, Judge LONGYEAR of Michigan, Judge SAWYER of California, and other judges, attorneys and clerks. These we shall take pleasure in laying before our readers, either in full or in substance, as fast as our space will permit.

An able opinion by Judge KRUM, in the general term of the circuit court of Saint Louis county, Missouri, on the subject of the effect of the war on contracts of life insurance, is in type, and will appear in our next.

We shall also publish, by request, in our next issue, a recent decision by Judge DILLON, on the subject of elevator receipts, and the nature of the contract for storage of grain in elevators.

Legislative Regulation of Railway Tariffs.

Cheap transportation is the inexorable demand of the people; and to aid in securing it, attention is turned to railway regulation by legislative enactment. The indications plainly are, that this subject, in all its aspects, is to undergo the most thorough examination by the press, by state legislatures, by congress, and eventually, by the judicial tribunals.

Any discussion of it in our JOURNAL must be limited to the legal principles involved. The Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat. 518), decided by the Supreme Court of the United States at the February term, 1819, asserted, for the first time, the principle that a charter granted by a legislature to a private (as distinguished from a public corporation) was a contract within the meaning of the clause of the national constitution which prohibits a state from impairing the obligations of contracts. Within the class of private corporations, according to this decision, fall all companies whose stock is owned by private persons, though their objects and operations are public in their nature, such as railway, bank and canal corporations. The doctrine of this case has been repeatedly re-affirmed in the court by which it was pronounced and by the supreme court of, perhaps, every state in the Union; and, therefore, if any thing can be settled by judicial decision, it is, that unless the right to repeal, amend or modify the charter of a railway company is reserved at the time it is created, subsequent state legislatures cannot pass laws which essentially change the rights of the corporators or stockholders.

The railway companies, by which the internal commerce of the country is now so largely carried on, have been created solely by the various states, and in most cases, the power of full legislative control over them has not been expressly reserved; and in many instances, the power to the corporations to fix their own tolls or fares and freights, has been expressly granted. Accordingly, it is a well known fact, that the companies seek shelter under their charters, and the Dartmouth College case, from the threatened legislative regulation of tariffs; and it is a question now before the United States Supreme Court, under the 25th section of the judiciary act, or on its way there from the judgment of the supreme court of Minnesota, sustaining the validity of the railway tariff law of that state, passed in 1871, whether the doctrine of the Dartmouth College case can be invoked as a shield to protect the companies from legislative control by the states over their charges for carrying freights and passengers. An opposite conclusion, denying the power of the states, was reached by the court of appeals in Delaware, in the case of the Phila. & Balt. R. R. Co. v. Bowers, decided at the January term, 1874, the decision being based by the court upon what it regarded as the doctrine of the Dartmouth College case.

Practically, the real question would seem to be, not so much whether the Dartmouth College case is sound law,—for the hope that it will be overruled is scarcely entertained,—as whether it really applies to a railroad which is publici juris, and which has been so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Olcott v. The Supervisors, 16 Wall. 678. In this case, Mr. Justice STRONG, after asserting the principle that railways are public, says, arguendo: "The railroad can, therefore, be controlled by the state. Its use can be defined; its tolls and rates for transportation may be limited." The case, however, was one in which the right of the state to amend or repeal the charter was expressly retained.

In the American Law Review for January, 1874, an extremely acute, and very able writer, has an article of fifty pages on the Dartmouth College case, in which he forcibly questions the soundness of every proposition on which it rests. The article embodies much research and reflection; and whoever reads it, will need to have his faith in the Dartmouth case re-assured by reading again the opinion of the great chief justice, which is marked with all his subtle and wonderful powers of reasoning. But the doctrine of that case, even if applicable to state laws, respecting railway tariffs, does not touch the power of the general government, so far as that power exists by virtue of the clause of the constitution which gives to congress "power to regulate commerce among the several states." And it is on this ground, namely, that the states can only prescribe tariffs for purely internal commerce, that is, from points to points wholly within the state, and have no power over rates on lines beyond their limits, and that the power over interstate commerce exists, and exists only, in congress—we say it is on this ground that Mr. McCRARY of Iowa, chairman of the committee on railways and canals, an able lawyer and faithful legislator, bases his bill for federal regulation of tolls, fares and freights, upon inter-state railways. The elaborate report with which he accompanies his bill, shows that he has profoundly studied the subject in all its legal aspects; and it will undoubtedly be gratifying to him to see that the views which he so forcibly presents, as to the plenary powers of congress over the subject of inter-state commerce, including the regulation of compensation to the common carrier, are, in all substantial respects, in harmony with the opinion of the eminent author of the American Law of Railways, as contained in his article on. the subject which has just appeared in the January number, 1874, of the American Law Register. In this article, Judge REDFIELD maintains both the necessity and lawfulness of congressional railway supervision and regulation; and that the power of congress over charges upon inter-state railway lines is exclusive of the several states. He says: "There is no hope of relief from any imaginable source but in the national prerogatives. * * * If we cannot reform this evil [unreasonable charges and unjust discriminations,] through independent legislation in the rightful quarter, and pure judicial administration, we shall attempt it in vain by other inventions. * * * The first enactment of congress should contain a declaration that the act shall extend only to such transportation as passes, or is intended to pass, the lines of two or more states. It should also give the national courts jurisdiction in all cases arising under the act. It should make the subject of commerce among the states, either a distinct department of the national government, or subject to the control of a board of commissioners, paid for their whole time, which shall be devoted to the enforcement of the law. The law should require uniform rates for the same service, and no discrimination."

Digitized by Google

Our only purpose in this article has been to advise our readers of the current legal discussions on this important topic, rather than to express, at this time, views of our own. We shall refer to the subject hereafter.

The Virginia Duel Murder.

The trial of W. Page McCarty, for the murder of John B. Mordecai in a duel, in the hustings court, at Richmond, Virginia, before Judge GUIGON, was, on the 24th instant, brought to a farcical termination by the jury returning a verdict of guilty of involuntary manslaughter, and fixing the punishment at a fine of $500. The telegraphic report states that a few minutes after the case had been given to the jury, they returned and asked for instructions as to whether they were required to find a verdict of murder in the first degree or acquit the accused. The judge instructed them that they were not so required. He then, at their request, further instructed them as to the various degrees of murder and manslaughter, after which the jury again retired.

If this statement is correct, it is difficult to conceive on what grounds the instructions given can be supported. The deliberate killing in a duel is murder, and nothing but murder; and in those states, where murder is divided into statutory degrees, it is murder in the first degree; because it is done with deliberation and premeditation, with a weapon prepared for the occasion, and by an act intentional of death. As was said by the eminent Judge GASTON of North Carolina, in one of his well-considered judgments, "Deliberate duelling, if death ensue, however fairly the combat may be conducted, is, in the eye of the law, murder. The punctilios of false honor the law regards as furnishing no excuse for homicide. He who deliberately seeketh the blood of another, in compliance with such punctilios, acts in open defiance of the laws of God and of the state, and with that wicked purpose which is termed malice aforethought. While, therefore, because of presumed heat of blood, the law extenuates into manslaughter a killing upon such sudden rencounter, although proceeding upon an insufficient provocation, it withholds this indulgence when, from the circumstances of the case, it can be collected that, not heated blood, but a settled purpose to vindicate offended honor, even unto slaying, in defiance of law, was the actual motive which urged on to the combat." State v. Hill, 3 Dev. & Batt. 497.

Therefore, if the proof show a deliberate killing in a duel, to instruct the jury on the law of manslaughter, is to instruct them on a subject utterly foreign to the case; and such an instruction can have no other effect than to confuse and mislead them and break down their consciences. See Harrison v. State, 24 Ala. 67; Shorter v. People, 2 Comst. 193; State v. Shippey, 10 Minn. 223. These instructions seem to have been well calculated to produce the verdict which the jury returned; and this verdict could not have been more complete nonsense, if the jury had found the prisoner guilty of larceny. For if the killing in a duel could, under any circumstances, be manslaughter, it never could be involuntary manslaughter; because such a killing is always intentional of death.

If this case has been correctly stated in the public prints, it should seem that the duty of the judge in charging the jury could have been discharged in a single paragraph, by telling them that if they believed from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prisoner deliberately shot and killed the deceased in a duel, he was guilty of murder in the first degree. The jury would then have been obliged to return the legal verdict; and if there had been anything in the circumstances of the case, or in the state of society existing in Virginia, making it unjust or impolitic to execute the sentence, it would have been a proper case for the executive clemency. As it is, we are unable to see how the court can proceed to sentence the defendant for a crime which he clearly did not commit; and are not surprised to learn that immediately after the return of this verdict, his counsel moved to set it aside.

It is but just to say, however, that the instructions of the court find support in the modern doctrine—or rather, in the modern interpretation of an old doctrine—that in criminal trials the jurors are judges of the law as well as of the facts; and that, therefore, in trials of indictments for homicide, the prisoner has a right to have the whole law of homicide expounded to the jury. We understand that it has been recently decided in two cases in Tennessee, that in every trial for homicide, the prisoner may require the judge to expound the law of manslaughter to the jury; and that if the judge refuses so to do, it is error, and ground of reversal. Little's case, decided at Jackson, Tennessee, April term, 1873, and a case there cited. The doctrine that in criminal trials the jury are, in a free and unrestrained sense, judges of the law as well as of the facts, and that the court is, in such a case, a mere assistant to the jury, has been pushed to an extreme limit in Tennessee and Georgia, and perhaps in Illinois. In one of these states we have had an opportunity to observe its workings, and believe that it has had a tendency to render the administration of the law in trials for homicide, as unequal and uncertain as the chances of the gaming table.

Digitized by Google

Title of Purchaser at Execution Sale—Homestead Exemptions.

VOGLER v. MONTGOMERY ET AL.

Supreme Court of Missouri, January 26, 1874.

Hon. WASH ADAMS,
" DAVID WAGNER,
" W. B NAPTON, } Judges.
" H. M. VORIES,
" A. T. SHERWOOD,

1. Sales of land under execution—Title of purchasing Creditor—Title of innocent purchaser.—Where an execution creditor purchases at execution sale, and his judgment is subsequently reversed and restitution awarded, the title reinvests in the execution debtor; but where, before the reversal, the execution creditor conveys to a stranger, who purchases in good faith, he will hold the title unaffected by the reversal.

2. Homestead Laws, how construed.—Homestead laws should be liberally construed with the view of promoting the benevolent purpose of securing to a family a home protected from the creditors of the person who is its head.

3. Levy upon Homestead—Possession of Homestead—Notice to Officer.—The homestead exemption is for the benefit of the family, and a sale of the homestead under execution is void. The exemption need not be claimed, and the possession and use of property, as a homestead, are notice to the officer making a levy that it is held as such.

4. ———. Appraisement.—When the homestead exceeds in amount or value the statutory limitation, it is the duty of the officer holding an execution, before making a levy, to proceed under the provisions of the statute to have the homestead appraised and set apart.

5 Abandonment of Homestead—Fraudulent Conveyance of Homestead.—The conveyance and repurchase of a homestead without a relinquishment of possession, even though made in fraud of creditors, does not constitute an abandonment of the homestead.

6. Injunction to restrain Sale of Homestead—Cloud upon title.—The sale of a homestead under execution will be restrained in equity on the ground that it will cast a cloud over the title of the owner.

Johnson & Botsford for Vogler; Philips & Vest for Montgomery, et al.

NAPTON, J. delivered the opinion of the court. This was an application for an injunction to restrain Montgomery, a trustee in a deed of trust from Nussberger for the benefit of Shields, from selling the lot conveyed in the deed on the general ground that such sale would cast a cloud on the title of plaintiff.

The facts appear to be as follows: Vogler acquired the lot and house in the year 1865. Nussberger obtained a judgment against Vogler, about the 4th of Feb., 1868. A few days previous to this, Vogler conveyed the premises to one Suess, and on Jan. 23, 1869, Suess conveyed back the same to Vogler. On Nussberger's judgment an execution issued; the lot was sold under it, and Nussberger became the purchaser, and a deed from the sheriff to him was executed, bearing date August 6, 1868, and recorded Nov. 6, 1868. There was a mistake in the description of the boundaries of the lot in the deed, as there was in the deed by which it was acquired by Vogler, and a second execution was obtained and levied on the lot, and a sale made under it to Nussberger, who received a second deed from the sheriff, dated 20th of August, 1869, with a correct description of the boundaries of the lot. At or previous to this second sale, the sheriff was notified that Vogler claimed the lot as his homestead. No claim had been asserted at the first sale under execution. Vogler was married and had four children, and he and his family lived on the premises. The judgment under which these sales were made was reversed on the 24th of December, 1869. The deed from Nussberger to Montgomery for the benefit of Shields was made on the 16th of Dec., 1869.

The petition in this case sets forth these facts and asks an injunction to prevent Montgomery from selling under his deed of trust. The principal grounds upon which an injunction is asked are: First, that the reversal of the judgment destroyed the title of Nussberger under the execution sales, and, secondly, that Vogler's claim of the property as a homestead, rendered the sale and purchase of Nussberger a nullity; and these are the only questions of importance, whether it be held that it was a case for injunction or not.

There is no question that a reversal of a judgment does not invalidate the sales under executions to strangers who purchase at the sale, but as to parties to the judgment the law seems to be settled otherwise; and if they become purchasers, they take a title subject to the ultimate disposition of the case. In this case, the plaintiff in the judgment buys and of course his title is affected by the infirmity, but he conveys to a third person before the judgment is reversed, and the question is, whether this infirmity attaches to the purchaser. In Gott v. Powell (41 Mo. 420) the court excepted the case where some third person has acquired a "collateral right before reversal." The purchaser in such cases must be regarded as a purchaser without notice, since he buys from a party who derives title from a judgment and execution valid at the time, and really occupies the same position as if he had himself bought at the sheriff's sale. Whilst therefore the title of the plaintiff in the execution would be annulled by the reversal of the judgment, the sale or conveyance by the plaintiff to a third person before the reversal of the judgment, would be valid, and the purchaser, supposing the purchase to be in good faith, would be protected from the risks which his vendor would be subject to. In this case, the deed to Montgomery was made four days before the reversal of the judgment under which Nussberger bought, and so far as this point is concerned, he must be regarded as having acquired a good title.

But, it is further objected that the sheriff's sale was void because of the property being claimed as a homestead, and therefore protected from execution by our statute on that subject.

The construction of our homestead laws, (1 Wagner's Statutes, p. 697,) has never, so far as I have observed, been before this court; so we are left to resort to the general practice of all courts in construing obscure and doubtful provisions of a statute, to carry out as nearly as possible what is believed to be its main scope and design, and in this we may be guided to some extent by adjudications in other states where similar laws have long existed. It seems too well settled in the various courts in the states where the homestead law has been discussed, that such laws, being prompted by benevolent intentions, are to be liberally construed, and in such a way as to promote the design of securing to a family, a home protected from the creditors of the person who is its head.

It is easy to foresee or imagine cases in which the ministerial officers, who are to be governed by it, must be greatly embarrassed in regard to their duty in executing some of its provisions, but we do not propose to anticipate difficulties which may not occur or which future legislation may remove.

The points which arise on the present record have been mostly passed on by courts of last resort having similar statutes to ours.

Our statute limits the homestead in Sedalia, where this case originated, to thirty square rods of ground in extent, and in value not to exceed fifteen hundred dollars. The second section of the act allows the house-keeper, or head of the family, in cases where the limitation is exceeded either as to quantity or value to designate or choose such part as will not exceed the limitation, and provides that where there is such designation or choice, or where there is none made, in either event, the sheriff shall appoint three appraisers to fix the boundaries and location of the homestead, and that the sheriff shall then proceed with the levy of the execution on the residue of the real estate.

Digitized by Google

We infer from this section that in a case where a homestead is claimed, the sheriff cannot proceed with the levy until he has thus appointed appraisers; nor does it seem to be material whether the house-keeper or the head of the family, asserts his claim or not.

It may be that he is absent. This law is for the benefit of the family, the wife and children as well as the head of the family. The occupancy of the house as a family residence, is a fact easily ascertained by the officer. He cannot proceed with his levy, until he has ascertained in the mode directed by the act, the extent and the value of the premises, and that it is beyond the limit protected against executions.

The question of the title, we suppose, was not to be investigated by the sheriff. If the householder had no title, the execution and levy was of course unavailing, and the law was designed to protect his possession. If, however, there was an incumbrance on the property merely, the third section of the act directs how that is to be considered.

In this case it appears that Vogler had, prior to the levy, conveyed his title to the premises to one Suess, and upon this ground it is claimed that he forfeited all the protection which the homestead law gives. If this conveyance was in good faith, and valid, then it is obvious that an execution and a sale under it would convey nothing; but if it was fraudulent, as it doubtless was deemed to be by the execution creditor, then the title was in Vogler, and the homestead law exempted it from execution. It appears to be the received opinion that neither a fraudulent conveyance nor an act of bankruptcy on the part of the head of the family, will produce a forfeiture of the benefits of the homestead exemption. (Cox v. Wilder, 2 Dillon, C. C. 46.) Judge DILLON thinks these laws are chiefly for the benefit of the family, and therefore will not allow the fraudulent acts of the head of the family to subvert the policy of the law, and this opinion was upon our Missouri statute.

As Nussberger then derived no title from either execution, levy or sale, he could convey none to Montgomery, and the proposed sale by Montgomery would convey no title. And this is urged as a reason why no injunction should be allowed.

But it is the true policy of courts to prevent litigation, and a sale by the trustee would undoubtedly cast a doubt over plaintiff's title, and embarrass a sale, if he desires to sell.

The judgment is affirmed with the concurrence of the other judges.

AFFIRMED.

Validity of Sales under Deeds of Trust not affected by the War.

THE WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY v. GEO. B. FINCH, JAMES J. DALY, BANKRUPT, AND EDWARD R. CHAMBERS.

Supreme Court of the United States, January 12, 1874.

Sales under Deeds of Trust—War.—A sale of real estate made under a power contained in a deed of trust executed before the late civil war, is valid, notwithstanding the fact that the grantors in the deed, which was made to secure the payment of the promissory notes, were citizens and residents of one of the states declared to be in insurrection at the time of the sale, and that the sale was made while the war was flagrant.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the districts of Missouri.

John M. Krum, for the plaintiff in error; John F. Jones, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

James J. Daly and Edward R. Chambers purchased of W. G. Elliot, in March, 1860, certain real estate in St. Louis, Mo. For the principal part of their purchase money they gave him their promissory notes, and to secure the payment of these notes, they made a deed of trust to Seth A. Ranlett, conveying the property thus purchased with authority to sell it in satisfaction of these notes, if they were not paid as they fell due.

The notes were assigned by Elliott to the appellant, the Washington University, and the money being unpaid and due, the real estate so conveyed was sold by Ranlett, in accordance with the terms of the trust deed, to the university, on the 9th day of December, 1872. The trustee made the university, which was a corporate body, a deed for the land, and the university afterwards sold it for value, to one Kimball.

Daly and Chambers were both citizens of the State of Virginia, residing in the county of Mechlenburg, when they bought the land of Elliott, and have resided there ever since. Chambers and Finch, assignees of Daly, who had been declared a bankrupt, filed the bill, on which the present decree is founded, on the chancery side of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Missouri, to have the sale decreed void, and to have the proceeds of the sale of the land of the university to Kimball declared a trust fund for their use; and the court decreed accordingly.

The sole ground of this relief is, that the sale by the trustees took place during the late civil war, and that Daly and Chambers were citizens of the state of Virginia, resident within that part of the state declared by the president to be in a state of insurrection.

The argument is, that, inasmuch as all commercial intercourse was forbidden between the people of the loyal states and those residing in the insurrectionary districts, both by virtue of the act of congress and by the principles applicable to nations in a state of war, all processes for the collection of debts were suspended, and that the complainants being forbidden by these principles to pay the debt, there could be no valid sale of the land for such payment.

The case before us was not one of a sale by judicial proceeding. No aid of a court was needed or called for. It was purely the case of the execution of power by a person in whom a trust had been reposed in regard to real estate, the land, the trustee and the cestui que trust all being, as they had always been, within a state whose citizens were loyally supporting the nation in its struggle with its enemies. The conveyance by complainants to Ranlett vested in him the legal title of the land, unless there was a statute of the state of Missouri providing otherwise, and, if there was such a statute, it still gave him full control over the title, for the purposes of the trust which he had assumed. No further act on the part of the complainant was necessary to transfer the title and full ownership of the property to a purchaser under a sale of the trustee.

The debt was due and unpaid. The obligation which the trustee had assumed on a condition, had become absolute by the presence of that condition. If the complainants had both been dead, the sale would not have been void for that reason, if made after the nine months during which a statute of Missouri suspends the right to sell in such cases. If they had been in Japan, it would have been no legal reason for delay. The power under which the sale was made was irrevocable. The creditor had both a legal and a moral right to have the power, made for his benefit, executed. The enforced absence of the complainants, if it be conceded that it was enforced, does not, in our judgment, afford a sufficient reason for arresting his agent and the agent of the creditor in performing a duty which both of them imposed upon him before the war began. His power over the subject was perfect; the right of the holder of the note to have him exercise that power was perfect. Its exercise required no intercourse, commercial or otherwise, with the complainants. No military transaction would be interfered with by the sale. The enemy, instead of being strengthened, would have been weakened by the process. The interest of complainants in the land might have been liable to confiscation by the government; yet we are told that this right of the creditor could not be enforced, nor the power of the trustee lawfully exercised. No authority in this country, or any other, is shown us for this proposition. It rests upon inference from the general doctrine of absolute non-intercourse between citizens of states, which are in a state of public war with each other, but no case has been cited of this kind, even in such a war.

Digitized by Google

It is said that the power to sell in the deed of trust, required a notice of the sale in a newspaper; that this notice was intended to apprise the complainants of the time and place of sale, and that, inasmuch as it was impossible for such notice to reach complainants, no sale could be made. If this reasoning were sound, the grantors in such a deed need only go to a place where the newspaper could never reach him, to delay the sale indefinitely, or defeat it altogether. But the notice is not for the benefit of the grantor in the sense of notice to him. It is only for his benefit by giving notoriety and publicity of the time, the terms and the place of sale, and the property to be sold, that bidders may be invited, competition encouraged, and a fair price obtained for the property. As to the grantor, he is presumed to know that he is in default, and his property liable to sale at any time, and no notice to him is required.

But the authority of certain cases decided in this court is relied on, in which the effect of the state of the late civil war is considered, in judicial proceedings, between parties residing on different sides of what has been called the line separating the belligerents.

The first of these is that of Hanger v. Abbott. That case laid down the proposition that when a citizen of a state, adhering during that war to the national cause, brought suit afterwards against a citizen residing, during the war, within the limits of an insurrectionary state, the period during which the plaintiff was prevented from suing by the state of hostilities, should be deducted from the time necessary to bar the action under the statute of limitations. It decided nothing more than this. It did not even decide that a similar rule was applicable in a suit brought by the latter against the former; and it decided nothing in the question now before us, even if the sale here had been under a judicial proceeding. [6 Wall. 532.[

Another case is that of Dean v. Nelson, 10 Wallace, 158. If the present had been a sale under judicial order, that case would have some analogy to this, and some expressions more general than was intended may, as this court has already said, tend to mislead. That case was a proceeding within an insurrectionary district, but held by our military forces, in a court established by military orders alone. It was a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on personal property, and it was instituted against parties who had been expelled by military force from their residence, and who were forbidden absolutely by the order which expelled them, and which was addressed to them by name, from coming back again within the lines of the military authority which organized the court. Inasmuch, as without their consent, and against their will, they were thus driven from their houses, and forbidden to return by the arbitrary, though probably necessary, act of the military power, we held that a judicial decree by which their property was sold during the continuance in force of this order, was void as to them. To that doctrine we adhere, and have repeated it at this term in the case of Lasere v. Rochereau.

But this court has never decided, nor intentionally given expression to the idea that the property of citizens of the rebel states, located in the loyal states, was, by the mere existence of the war, exempted from judicial process for debts due to citizens of the loyal states, contracted before the war. A proposition like this, which gives an immunity to rebels against the government, not accorded to the soldier who is fighting for that government in the very locality where the other resides, must receive the gravest consideration, and be supported by unquestioned weight of authority before it receives our assent. Its tendency is to make the very debts which the citizens of one section may owe to another an inducement to revolution and insurrection, and it rewards the man who lifts his hands against his government by protection to his property, which it would not otherwise possess, if he can raise his efforts to the dignity of a civil war.

The case of McVeigh v. The United States, 11 Wallace, 259, holds that an alien enemy may be sued, though he may not have the right to bring suits in our courts, and that when he is sued he has a right to appear and defend himself. "Whatever," says the court, "may be the extent of the disability of an alien enemy to sue in the courts of the hostile country, it is clear that he is liable to be sued, and this carries with it the right to use all the means and appliances of defence."

And this proposition is supported by the authorities there cited, as well as by sound reason. If such be the rule in regard to alien enemies in a war between independent states, it should be quite as applicable, if not more so, between citizens of the same government, who are only enemies in a qualified sense in a civil war. See, also, Masterson v. Howard, of the present term.

We are of the opinion, that the sale by the trustee, in the case under consideration, was a lawful and valid sale, and that complainant's bill should have been dismissed. The decree of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed, with directions to dismiss the bill.

REVERSED.

Husband and Wife Witnesses against each other. —Deed Delivered as an Escrow.

LUCRETIA H. SMITH AND ANNIE GUION, BY NEXT FRIEND, ETC., v. THOMAS R. TUGGLE, ET AL.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Jackson, Special November Term, 1873.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY, }
" ROBERT MCFARLAND, }
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" JOHN L. T. SNEED, }
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN, }

1 Competency of Witnesses—Husband and Wife.—A statute making parties competent as witnesses, does not render husband and wife competent to testify for or against each other.

2. Escrow.—In order that a deed executed by the vendor and delivered to a third person shall have effect only as an escrow, it is essential that the conditions upon which it is delivered, should have been agreed upon between the vendor and the vendee.

3. ——. The Rule more fully stated.—The rule is said to be, that in every case of escrow, there is a contract of privity between the grantor and grantee. The person to whom the deed is delivered is, by mutual agreement, constituted the agent of both parties. He does not hold the deed subject to the grantor; and it is always in the power of the grantee to entitle himself to the deed, and to the estate, by performing the stipulated conditions. [Acc. Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Georgia, 275; Carter v. Turner, 5 Sneed, 178.]

4. ——. The Rule illustrated—Case in Judgment.—Where the vendors delivered a deed to a third person upon the condition that it should not be delivered to the vendees, until payment of the purchase money should be made direct to themselves, but these conditions had not been agreed upon with the vendees, and were unknown to them, it was held that such third person was the agent of the vendors only; and he having received payment and delivered the deed to the vendees, the vendors cannot maintain a bill in equity to have such deed declared void, nor to enforce a vendor's lien for the purchase money.

6. ——. Subsequent Purchaser.—In such a case a subsequent bona fide purchaser has a right to act upon the faith that the deed was delivered as it purported to be; and he will not be deprived of his property because of any equities which previous vendors may have, unless upon unexceptionable evidence.

7. Innocent Purchaser.—A person who advances his money and takes a deed of trust to secure the debt, occupies the status of an innocent purchaser; otherwise, a person who takes a deed of trust to secure a pre-existing debt.

NICHOLSON, CH. J., stated the case and delivered the opinion of the court.

The bill in this case was filed by Lucretia H. Smith and Annie Guion against Thomas R. and J. J. Tuggle and H. L. Guion, husband of Annie Guion, to have certain deeds to the lot in controversy declared null and void. These lots belonged to complainants as tenants in common. In May, 1862, a deed therefor to McEwen and Taylor, was signed by them, together with H. L. Guion, the husband of Annie Guion, which deed was acknowledged and registered. Afterwards, McEwen and Taylor conveyed the lot, in trust, to F. M. Williamson, trustee, to secure a note for about $18,000, given by McEwen and Taylor, for money borrowed at the time, of one Franciola. The trustee, Williamson, sold the lot to T. R. and J. J. Tuggle, and made them a deed in satisfaction of the note, at $19,000, transferred to them by Franciola. The bill seeks to set aside these several deeds, upon the ground that the deed to McEwen and Taylor was signed and delivered to H. L. Guion, to be delivered to the vendees only on the condition that they should first pay $25,000, the price agreed on, to complainants, and hence that this deed was only delivered as an escrow, and because Guion delivered it without any payment being made to complainants, who are charged with notice of the condition, and that the deed is void, It is then alleged that the other deeds were made under circumstances fixing notice of the defect in the title of McEwen and Taylor, and therefore, that they were void. But it is alleged, that if the deed was so delivered as to pass the title to McEwen and Taylor, yet that the purchase money was not paid to complainants, and therefore, that they have a vendor's lien on the land, which they seek to have enforced.

Digitized by Google

The first question in the case is, whether Annie Guion and her husband, H. L. Guion, were competent witnesses against each other—she having been examined for complainants, and he having been examined for defendants. In their testimony they conflict and contradict each other in many material respects. The chancellor excluded the testimony of the wife entirely, and excluded that of the husband, also, except that he held it competent as against Lucretia H. Smith, the other complainant. We have held, in several cases, that the recent acts declaring that no person shall be incompetent to testify because he or she is a party to the record, or interested in the issue, was not intended to affect the rule of evidence which excludes the husband and wife from being competent witnesses for or against each other. This rule, so far as it rests on public policy, for the preservation of the harmony of the marital relation, continues in full force. In the present case, the husband refused to join his wife as complainant, and hence she has made him defendant, merely to comply with the rule which is assumed in the bill, to require that he must be a party. He has no real interest in the litigation; but according to the testimony of his wife, he received the deed to be delivered to McEwen and Taylor, upon the condition of payment in cash of $25,000, to complainants, and not to her husband; and that he delivered the deed without a compliance with the alleged condition. The husband, in his testimony, denies that he received the deed upon any condition, but insists that he delivered the deed in pursuance of the contract, and received the purchase money for complainants, with their sanction and approval. We think it clear, that it would violate the well settled rules of evidence to hold that such testimony, by either husband or wife, is competent. It comes directly in conflict with the reason on which the rule referred to is based. Nor are we satisfied that the husband could testify in the case, against Lucretia H., the other complainant, without testifying against his wife. The complainants rest their claim to relief on the same title and upon the same allegation, as to the misconduct of the husband.

Without deciding that Guion was incompetent to testify, as against Lucretia H., the co-complainant of his wife, we have examined the case without considering his testimony, which gives to her the full benefit of her own testimony, uncontradicted by his. Excluding the testimony of Mrs. Guion, and not looking to that of her husband, the case rests upon that of Lucretia H. Smith, the other complainant. She states that the property was offered for $25,000, cash; that it was a cash sale. That she and Mrs. Guion signed and acknowledged a paper, on the 30th of May, 1862, which, she thinks, was left in the hands of the clerk, to be handed to Col. Guion, to hold until the money was paid to Mrs. Guion and herself, by McEwen and Taylor; that they never received from McEwen and Taylor the price agreed to be paid, nor from any one; that she had never approved or confirmed Col. Guion's act, in delivering the paper as her deed; that Col. Guion was not her agent; that he had no authority to deliver the paper as her deed until the money was paid to her, and Mrs. Guion; that he delivered it without the knowledge or consent of herself or sister; that Col. Guion had no authority to receive the money. On cross-examination, she states that this paper was left with the clerk to be given to Col Guion, to hold until the money was paid to complainants by McEwen. She supposes it was agreed that the lot should be sold for currency. She does not know that any instructions were given to the clerk; the paper was left in his hands, and, of course, he would give it to Col. Guion to hold until the money was paid to complainants by McEwen; the paper would then be delivered as a deed to McEwen. On re-examination, she states that it was her understanding that the paper was to be placed in the hands of Col. Guion, to be held by him until the money was paid to complainants, and then it was to be delivered as their deed. The clerk testifies that he has no recollection as to any instructions given him when he took the acknowledgment of the parties and received the deed; but from memoranda on the deed, in his handwriting, he is satisfied that he delivered the deed to the register on the 31st of May, 1862, on which day the same was noted for registration, as appears on the deed. It is proven by McEwen, that on the 31st of May, 1861, he paid to Col. Guion $1,000, in Confederate money, and gave him an order on Taylor, at Columbus, Miss., for $24,000, which Guion received as payment, and that he then received the deed. Witness says he negotiated the purchase of the lot with Lyde, a real estate agent; that he had no knowledge when the money was paid; that the deed was delivered to Guion to be delivered to him only upon condition that the purchase money was first paid into complainants' hands; that nothing was said in his negotiation with Lyde as to the kind of money to be paid.

We think it may be fairly deduced, from this testimony, that it was understood and agreed by the complainants and Guion, that Guion was to take possession of the deed after it was certified by the clerk, and hold it until McEwen and Taylor paid the purchase money to complainants, and then to deliver the deed to McEwen and Taylor; but the evidence fails to show that McEwen and Taylor were parties to this arrangement, or that they knew of it. Under this state of the proof, the deed was not delivered to Guion as an escrow. An escrow is a conditional delivery of a deed to a stranger, or third person, to be by him delivered to the grantee—but not until a certain condition is performed, when the deed takes effect. It is said in Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Georgia, 267, 275, that "in every case of escrow, there is a contract and privity between the grantor and the grantee. The person to whom the deed is delivered, is by mutual agreement, constituted the agent of both parties. He does not hold the deed subject to the control of the grantor; and it is always in the power of the grantee to entitle himself to the deed and to the estate by performing the stipulated condition." This doctrine is recognized by this court in the case of Carter v. Turner, 5 Sneed, 178. In the present case, if it be conceded that Guion was such a stranger, or third person, that he might hold the deed as an escrow, yet the proof fails to show that it was part of the contract between the parties, that McEwen and Taylor were to receive the deed only on condition of paying the money directly to complainants. Such proof was essential to constitute the deed an escrow in the hands of Guion. It follows that Guion was only the agent of complainants, and that his violation of his instructions as such agent, could not affect the title derived by delivery of the deed to McEwen and Taylor, as it appears that they paid the money and received the deed without any knowledge of the instructions given to Guion by complainants. Blight v. Schenck, 10 Penn. 285; Pratt v. Holman, 16 Vermont, 530; Chitty on Bills, 33; Edwards on Bills and Notes, 92; 1 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 109.

Digitized by Google

Possession of a deed, by the obligee, is prima facie evidence of its execution, McEwen v. Frost, 1 Sneed, 186. The acknowledgment of a deed, and its deposit in the clerk's office, is no delivery, unless the vendee concurred in the act, or afterwards assented to it. McFadgen v. Eisensmidt, 10 Hum. 567. But as the fact of delivery is the assurance of the title, a purchaser for value has a right to act on the faith that it has been signed, sealed, delivered and acknowledged, as it purports to be, in proper form, and by the proper parties; and before such a purchaser can be deprived of his property, the facts which avoid his title must be proved by the grantor by unexceptionable testimony. Blight v. Schenck, 10 Penn. 289. This rule is still more manifestly applicable as between a subsequent bona fide purchaser from the first grantee and the grantor.

But it is claimed that if the delivery of the deed to McEwen and Taylor was such as to give them the title, yet that the payment was not a satisfaction of the purchase price for the lot. If the question here was between complainants and McEwen and Taylor, it might be argued with much force, that there was enough on the face of the deed to show to McEwen and Taylor, that the money was going to complainants, and that a payment to Guion under such circumstances, was no satisfaction of the debt to complainants. But the controversy is between complainant and the Tuggles, who claim the benefits of the position of innocent purchasers, for value, without notice of any defect in the title, by reason of a subsisting equity in complainants. This defence is properly made in the pleadings; and by the proof it is shown that the Tuggles succeeded to the rights of Franciola, who advanced his money to McEwen and Taylor, and took a conveyance of the title of the lot to Williamson as trustee, to secure the debt. While the trustee or the beneficiary under a trust deed, to secure a pre-existing debt, cannot defend as a purchaser for value, without notice, yet such a trustee or beneficiary of a deed, to secure a present debt for money advanced at the time of the execution, is held to be an innocent purchaser for value; and such purchaser can rely on that defence. According to proof in the case, the Tuggles occupy the position of innocent purchasers; and having the legal title, as well as an equity equal to that of the complainants, they are entitled to the protection of the court.

Upon the whole case, we find no error in the decree of the chancellor, and affirm it with costs.

DECREE AFFIRMED.

Bankrupt Act—Possession of Sheriff under Levy made before Bankruptcy Proceedings were commenced.

CYRUS TOWNSEND, ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY OF O. H. VIERGUTZ v. THOMAS LEONARD, SHERIFF, ETC., AND CHARLES H. POND.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kansas, November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Bankruptcy—Levy of previous Execution.—Property in the hands of the sheriff, under execution from the state courts levied before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, cannot, at the instance of the assignee in bankruptcy, be taken out of the possession of the sheriff by the federal courts.

2. ——, ——. Nature of Sheriff's Possession.—In such a case, the possession of the sheriff is the possession of the court of which he is the officer, and while his possession as such officer continues, no other court can interfere with it.

Judgments against the bankrupt were rendered in the state court, and levies made thereunder by the sheriff, before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. The sheriff has made sales under the levies, and the proceeds are in his hands. This is a bill in equity by the assignee in bankruptcy, against the sheriff and the execution plaintiffs, attacking the judgment, levy and sale, as having been obtained and made contrary to the bankrupt act, and with intent to acquire an illegal preference. The federal district court granted an order restraining the sheriff from paying over the proceeds of the sales to the execution plaintiffs, and the proceeds are still in the hands of the sheriff.

The bill prays for a perpetual injunction against the sheriff from paying over the proceeds to the execution plaintiffs, and asks that the proceeds shall be paid to the complainant, as assignee in bankruptcy. An answer has been filed by the sheriff, and proofs taken, and the cause is now upon final hearing. The other defendants have not answered.

Z. E. Britton and F. P. Fitzwilliam, for the plaintiff; Clough & Wheat, for the defendants.

DILLON, Circuit Judge:—The property or money, of which the assignee, by the bill of complaint, seeks to obtain possession, is in the hands of the sheriff, and was obtained under an execution, which was issued and levied upon the property of the bankrupt before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. Assuming that the bill in other respects, presents a case of equity cognizance, can this court take jurisdiction of the sheriff and the fund in his hands, and subject him and the fund to its control? That this cannot be done on general principles, is conclusively settled. (Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612: Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. 334.)

Is the rule in this respect changed by the bankrupt act? The presiding justice of this circuit has held that it is not. (Johnson, assignee v. Bishop, 1 Woolw. C. C. Rep. 324.) And such seems to be the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Marshall v. Knox, 8 Bank. Reg. 97; S. C. 16 Wall. 551.

In the case last cited, Mr. Justice BRADLEY says, arguendo, that "where an execution on final judgment has been levied by a sheriff prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, the possession of the sheriff cannot be disturbed by the assignee; the assignee is only entitled to claim the residue in the hands of the sheriff after satisfying the execution in his hands."

In Johnson v. Bishop, supra, Mr. Justice MILLER says: "The possession of the sheriff is the possession of the court, by the command of whose writ he seized the property. And so long as the proceedings in virtue of which it is taken, are pending, that possession will not be interfered with by any other court."

The bill must, therefore, be dismissed; but it will be without prejudice to any other action or suit by the assignee against the said judgment creditors of the bankrupt or either of them.

BILL DISMISSED.

Devise—Construction—Haley v. City of Boston.

We are indebted to Hon. S. J. THOMAS, of Boston, for the following notice of an interesting decision of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts:

Writ of entry to recover a parcel of real estate. Facts reported by agreement of parties. It appeared that in 1828, Lucy Bullman, a widow, made her will, which at her death, a few years afterward, was approved and allowed. At the date of her decease, her only near relatives were three nieces, one nephew, and one grand-nephew. One of these nieces was then forty-four years old, married, and died in 1849, without having had a child; another was forty-six years old, unmarried, and died in 1869; the other was thirty-nine years old, sick of consumption, and died soon after the will was made. The grand-nephew died without issue in 1849. The nephew died in 1857. The demandants are his children born after the death of the testatrix. The will was drawn by Mr. C. P. Sumner, at one time a sheriff for Suffolk, and the father of the Massachusetts senator. In the will, after a preamble in which she sets forth that she made it, "Wishing that the property with which God has blessed me, and of which I may die possessed, may, after my decease, go to those of my near relatives and friends for whom I have a regard," she devised, in the second item, to "my two unmarried nieces, my house and land on the south side of Cambridge street; also, my house and land on the west side of Belknap street; also, my house and land on Brighton street." In the third item she bequeathed to her married niece, $100, and provided that "in case she ever becomes reduced and equally needy with her two sisters, then she shall come in and enjoy one equal third of those three parcels of real estate mentioned; but none of the estates are to be sold unless it be to pay debts and legacies; nor are they to be divided and held in severalty; but they are to be leased and the rents and profits are to be divided between the two first named nieces and the latter, if she becomes as needy and dependent as her two unmarried sisters." In the fourth item she authorized her executors to sell her real estate on Brighton street, without license of court, for payment of her debts, and to divide any surplus of the proceeds among the three nieces. In the items next following, to the thirteenth, she gave specific legacies. The thirteenth was as follows:

Digitized by Google

"My two estates, one on Cambridge street and one on Belknap street, are to go to the three sisters equally; and if either of them die, then to the surviving two; and if two die, then to the single survivor; but if all three die without heirs, then the income of said estates is to go to John William Haley, son of Capt. John B. Haley, of Portsmouth, N. H.; and in case John W. Haley, should die without issue, then my real estate is to go to the city of Boston for the benefit of the poor. It is never to be sold, but the income is to go for the purposes set forth above. But it is always to be understood that Mrs. Dewolf is not to come in for any benefit derived from my real estate until she shall be needy and dependent, as her sisters now are. And she will, in my opinion, be so, if her husband should become insolvent, or should die, not leaving any property for her support."

John W. Haley was the grand-nephew, John B. Haley the nephew. For the demandants, it was contended that the true purpose of the testatrix was to provide, that at the death of the three nieces, their brother, John B. Haley, if living, should take the estate as heir; but if he was then dead, and John W. Haley alone, of all her near relatives, was left, then John W. Haley should take a life estate only; and if he should die without children, that would be the end of the Haley family, and near relatives, and then it should go to the poor—of whom there is no end. Expressed in informal words, her meaning was this: "If, when the last survivor of my nieces dies, their brother and heir is dead, and there are no other heirs than his son, John W., living, then, I do not devise these estates to him absolutely, as he would otherwise take them; because he may die without children, and then there is an end of the Haley family, in which case they shall go to the poor. The purpose was to limit the estate of John W. Haley. Hence the word "heirs" and the word "issue" in the same sentence. To the suggestion that this construction involves the absurdity of providing that in case of the death of these nieces without heirs, the property should go to one who was an heir, there are two answers: First, there is no such absurdity; since if the nieces died, John B. Haley living, John W. Haley was not an heir at all. The father would take to the absolute exclusion of the son. Second, the avoidance of this absurdity, if there were any, would involve the assumption of others still greater. First, that the testatrix should have contemplated that these nieces, at their ages, and in their circumstances, would have children; and second, that she should have intended to disinherit their brother, who was as near a relative as they were.

Opinion by COLT, J. The construction contended for by the demandants makes the thirteenth clause of the will suicidal, and cannot be supported. Judgment for the tenants.

Notes of Recent Decisions.

Foreign Judgment; Service by Publication; Jurisdiction.—Personal judgment, rendered in one state against several parties jointly, upon service of process on some of them, or their voluntary appearance, and upon publication against the others, is not evidence outside of the state where rendered of any personal liability to the plaintiff of the parties proceeded against by publication. Board of Public Works of Virginia v. Columbia College, et al; Supreme Court U. S., Oct. Term, 1873.

———; Constitutional Law; "Full Faith and Credit."—The clause of the federal constitution which requires full faith and credit to be given in each state to the records and judicial proceedings of every other state, applies to the records and proceedings of courts only so far as they have jurisdiction. Wherever they want jurisdiction the records are not entitled to credit. Ibid.

———; ———; ———; Interlocutory decree.—No greater effect can be given to any judgment of a court of one state in another state than is given to it in the state where rendered. So held in a case where a party, relying upon a decree of an inferior state court, objected to the character given to the decree as interlocutory by the highest appellate court of that state, and insisted that it should be treated as a final decree. Ibid.

Equity Jurisprudence; Aid of Creditor.—A court of equity will not exercise its jurisdiction to reach the property of a debtor applicable to the payment of his debts, unless the debt be clear and undisputed, and there exist some special circumstances requiring the interposition of the court to obtain possession of, and apply the property. Ibid.

This rule should be insisted upon with rigor whenever the property sought to be reached constitutes assets of a deceased debtor, which have already been subjected to administration and distribution; and some satisfactory excuse should be given for the failure of the creditor to present his claim, in the mode prescribed by law, to the representative of the estate, before distribution. Ibid.

Wife's separate property; Husband's debts.—Property acquired by a married woman on the credit of her separate estate, and afterwards paid for by profits arising out of it, is not liable for the debts of her husband. Purman v. Painter, Sup. Court Penn., Jan. 6, 1874; 4 Pittsburgh Legal Jour., N. S., 83.

Claim against United States; Attorney's contingent fee; Lien.—An attorney or counselor at law who successfully prosecutes a claim against the United States, for a contingent fee, being a part of the amount allowed, has a lien upon the fund, which may be enforced against the claimant, even when the money is in the Treasury of the United States; and the court will award an injunction to restrain the claimant from drawing from the treasury such portion of the money allowed, and decree its payment to the petitioner. WYLIE, J., dissenting. [Cases cited: Wylie v. Coxe, 15 How. 415; Painter v. Drum, 40 Penn. State, 467, 470.] Child v. Trist, Supreme Court Dist. Columbia in Gen. Term, Apr. 1873; 1 Wash. Law Reporter, 1.

———; ———; Not void as against public policy.—A contract to prosecute such claim before congress is not void as against public policy, when the services are to be rendered in an open and fair presentation of the facts; and where no secret and corrupt means are employed to mislead or deceive the members of the legislative body. Ibid.

———; ———; Act of Feb. 26, 1853.—Nor does such an agreement operate as a transfer or assignment of a part, or interest in the claim, so as to make it void under the act of February 26, 1853. It is a method of fixing the compensation in procuring the allowance of the claim. Ibid.

Lease of Real Estate by Church Committee.—A lease of real estate in which the lessors are described as "acting as a church extension committee by authority and on behalf of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, old school," parties of the first part, and who executed the lease in their individual names and seals, and which contained reciprocal covenants to be performed by the parties respectively, one of which was to pay rent on the part of the lessee to the lessors, as in their own right, is a nullity. It is a nullity as to the owner, because it is not his contract; and as to the lessors, because they have no estate in the property; and as to the lessee, because it is not binding on the other party. And the rule that a tenant shall not be allowed to dispute his landlord's title, has no application to such a case. [Cases cited: Frontin v. Small, 2 Ld. Raym. 1418; Crode v. Ingraham, 13 Pick. 35; Taft v. Brewster, 9 John. 334; Duvall v. Craig, 2 Wheat. 45; Lutz v. Linthicum, 8 Pet. 165.] Stoot v. Rutherford, Sup. Court Dist. Columb. Gen. Term, Apr., 1873; 1 Wash. Law Reporter, 1.

Digitized by Google

United States Supreme Court — Decisions Last Week.

[Compiled from the New York Herald.]

Resulting Trust.—No. 126. Kitchen v. Rayburn et al.—Appeal from the circuit court for Missouri.—This was the affirmance of the title of the appellees to certain lands in Missouri which, in the court below, the appellant alleged had been purchased by the proceeds of bonds held by Rayburn in trust for him. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Judgment on Postmaster's Bond.—No. 143. Jones Randolph et al. v. The United States—Error to circuit court for the southern district of Georgia.—This is the affirmance of a judgment on a postmaster's bond, against his sureties, for a defalcation. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion.

Certificate of Division; Jurisdiction.—No. 136. United States v. Arwo—Certificate of division from the circuit court for the southern district of New York. Instead of answering the questions certified, the court say that the circuit court had jurisdiction, and direct that this statement be certified to that court, as the only answer required to the several questions presented in the record.

Criminal Law—Fine—Imprisonment—Power of Circuit Court to correct erroneous sentence after sentence has been in part executed.—No. 9, original. Ex parte, Edward Lange.—The case of Edward Lange, a New York merchant, who was convicted of stealing mail bags, furnished his firm by the post office department, which was before the supreme court on certiorari and habeas corpus, was argued January 26th. Lange was sentenced to one year's imprisonment and to pay a fine of $500, and was on the same day committed to jail in execution of the sentence, and on the following day paid the fine. Five days after, at the same term, he was brought up on habeas corpus for his discharge, because of error in the sentence, on the ground that under the law he could not be both fined and imprisoned. Thereupon the sentence was vacated by the judge who pronounced it, and he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment. Upon another writ of habeas corpus the new sentence was affirmed, and it was here contended that the original sentence was illegal and the prisoner should have been discharged on the first habeas corpus, and that the sentence being in part executed, the case was beyond the authority of the court to vacate and re-sentence. It was also maintained that the payment of the fine is a bar to the infliction of imprisonment under either sentence. The government insisted that it is well established as the law of this court, and the general rule of the criminal law, that a sentence passed upon a person, if erroneous, may be vacated, like any other judgment, during the term in which it is pronounced, by the court which awarded it, and the prisoner resentenced according to law. As the power of the court to resentence a prisoner is not affected by the fact that he has entered upon the imprisonment ordered by the court under the first sentence, so it cannot be affected by the fact that he had paid the fine. Whether the fine thus imposed may be remitted by judicial authority, is not a question that can be raised in this proceeding; it is sufficient that the fact of its payment does not invalidate the second sentence. William H. Arnoux, for petitioner; Attorney General Williams and Assistant Attorney General Hill, for the government.

It was the opinion of the court that the prisoner was entitled to be discharged, as prayed for in the petition. Dissenting, Mr. Justice CLIFFORD and Mr. Justice STRONG.

Negligence a question of Fact for Jury.—No. 191. Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company v. Stout—Error to the circuit court for Nebraska.—This was an action to recover for injuries sustained by a child six years of age in playing on a turntable of the company at the town of Blair, in Nebraska. The questions were whether it was negligence on the part of the company to leave the table unenclosed and open to the approach in or near such a village—the company in no other way contributing to the injury—and whether the negligence was a question of law for the court to determine or of fact for the jury. The court below submitted the question to the jury as one of fact, and there was a verdict for the plaintiff. The judgment entered thereon is here sustained, the court holding, in substance, that where there is testimony tending to show negligence, it is for the jury, and not for the judge, to determine the question of proper care, or whether the facts established the negligence alleged. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Usury—Bankruptcy—A Trustee of a Bankrupt cannot recover a greater Penalty for the taking of usurious Interest than the Bankrupt himself could recover, if solvent and sueing in his own Right.—No. 179. Tiffany v. The Boatman's Savings Institution—Appeal from the circuit court for Missouri.—This was a bill filed by Tiffany, as surviving trustee of one Darby, a bankrupt, to recover money paid to the Savings Institution in discharge of a loan made to the bankrupt, and on which he had paid usurious interest. It was admitted that the bankrupt could not have recovered personally, because he had paid the usury without objection, but it was contended that, being a bankrupt when the usury was paid, the rights of the estate were superior to those of the Institution, and the trustee could not only recover the usury but the entire loan, under the statute against usury. This court hold, in substance, that the fact of usury does not change the transactions between the parties which were lawful, if not tainted with usury, so that Tiffany can recover back the whole sum, when Darby, if sueing personally, could recover only the excess of interest. The trustee has no larger interest than the bankrupt, and is entitled to recover only what Darby's estate was diminished by the transaction. To allow him to recover the whole sum, would be to transfer to the creditors of Darby a sum exceeding $150,000, which he never owned, by way of punishment to the bank for taking excessive interest. A court of equity will not deal with contracts affected with usury in this way. The relief it gives is always based on the idea that the money borrowed, with legal interest, shall be paid. Reversed with respect of certain accommodation notes on which usury was charged but not found below, and the case remanded to enable the circuit court to ascertain in some proper way, the excess of interest paid thereon, and to enlarge the decree so as to recover the sum. In all other respects, the decree of the circuit court was correct. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Courts—Appearance in Federal Court—Estoppel.—No. 192. Home Life Insurance Company v. Dunn—Error to the First Judicial Court of Hamilton county, Ohio. Defendant in error obtained a verdict against the company on a policy of insurance in the court of common pleas of the state. After judgment, a new trial was allowed as a matter of right under the statutes of the state. At the next term of that court, and before further proceedings, the case was transferred to the circuit court of the United States, where transcript was filed and the cause docketed within the proper time. Subsequently, a motion was made to dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction, and, being overruled, plaintiff below was granted leave and filed an amended petition, which is now pending. Thereupon plaintiff below, upon petition in error to the district court of the county, obtained a reversal of the order of removal. The plaintiff in error here then made application to the supreme court of the state for leave to file petition in error to reverse the order of the district court, which was refused, the supreme court thereby, in effect, affirming the order of removal made by the district court. A second trial was then had in the common pleas, which resulted in a judgment for the defendant in error here, which was affirmed by the district court. This writ of error was brought to reverse the order of the district court, reversing the order of removal; and, it is contended that the cause was properly removed, and, being so, it was the duty of the state court to proceed no further in the case. The court hold that the cause was properly removed to the circuit court, and that the plaintiff below, having submitted to its decision on motions therein made, was estopped from prosecuting the case further in the state courts, and reverse the affirmance and judgment affirmed by the district court, with directions to that court to proceed no further in the case. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Digitized by Google

Infringement of Patent.—No. 58. The American Wood Paper Co. v. The Fiber Disintegrating Co., and No. 157, the latter against the former—Appeal from the circuit court for the eastern district of New York.—This was a bill filed by the Paper Company to restrain infringements by the Disintegrating Company of several patents, alleged to be the property of the plaintiff, for the manufacture of paper pulp and fiber from wood, straw and other vegetable substances. The decree below found one of the patents void for want of novelty; another valid, and the Disintegrating Company infringers of it; a third was found not to have been infringed. From this decree both parties appealed to this court, and the decree was here affirmed, each party to pay his own costs in this court. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD dissenting.

Land Law—Spanish Grants—Lands within Tide Water.—The case of Walker v. The Board of Harbor Commissioners of the State of California, from the California circuit, involving the question of the right of the plaintiffs in error to wharf privileges in front of their lands in San Francisco, has been argued before the Supreme Court. The court below held that the premises—the block bounded by Montgomery, Francisco, Sansome and Chestnut streets—were entirely without the boundary line and the water front, and the decree was for the commissioners. This conclusion was assigned as an error here. On the part of the state, it was contended that the case of Weber v. The Commissioners, decided at this term, disposed of all the questions here present. That decision was in favor of the commissioners. Mr. Hall McAllister appeared for the plaintiffs in error and Mr. T. T. Crittenden for the defendants.

The court hold, in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of that state in the case of The People v. Davidson, that the alcaldes of the Pueblo of San Francisco possessed no authority to grant any lands covered by the tide waters of the bay, and that, therefore, the grants under which the plaintiff in error claims, were inoperative to pass any title to the premises in question. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Book Notices.

A QUARTERLY DIGEST OF DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN. By Henry A. Chaney, Attorney at Law. Lansing, Mich.: W. S. George & Co. For one year (4 numbers), $1.00. Single numbers, 25 cents.

Through the courtesy of the editor, we have been favored with the July and October numbers of this publication. We are highly pleased both with its plan and execution. The value to every judge and practitioner of Michigan of a complete abstract of the decisions of his court of last resort, issued very soon after the adjournment of each term, is so obvious, that it is unnecessary to dwell upon it. And when such a work is done, as this manifestly is, with such fullness and painstaking accuracy, that each case abstracted may be confidently quoted in court without the necessity of procuring a transcript of the original opinion, its value is still more enhanced.

The style adopted by Mr. Chaney, in his second number, is to give the cases in alphabetical order, prefixing each one with a brief statement of the county from whence it comes, and the judgment of the supreme court. Then follows a succinct statement of the facts, and this is succeeded by a statement of the points ruled, with running titles to facilitate reference. To each number there is an index. We here give the first two cases of the October number as specimens of the style of the work:

ATTORNEY GENERAL v. SOULE.

Error to Ionia. Decree affirmed; the State to pay the taxable costs of the defendants in both courts. See Comp. Laws, § 7407.

STATEMENT.—Soule's will provided funds "for the establishment of a school at Montrose for the education of children, to be expended according to the direction of (the) executors." The executors did not execute the special trust, and the state unsuccessfully brought suit to compel them to do so, or else to cast upon the court the duty of carrying out the trust according to the doctrine of approximate execution.

1. Charitable bequests sued for by State.—The basis of suit by the state for a charitable bequest is, that there has arisen such a public right, as makes it the state's duty, through its law officer, to take action for its enforcement; there is no public right of intervention, unless the gift is definitely to a charity, such as equity recognizes, and one more or less public or general.

2. Public application of bequests.— If a bequest is such that it may or may not be used for a charity, and is ambiguous as to the public or private quality of the charity, and if, consistently with the will, the fund may be applied to a purpose not public, the attorney general cannot interpose to compel a public application.

3. "Establishment of school;" how construed.—The term "establishment of a school," in a bequest for such a purpose, may mean the employment of a teacher, or the organization of an institution, or the erection of a building, or part or all of these things, and it does not bind the executors to any specific scheme, nor preclude them from erecting a school of an exclusive character, in no just sense public, nor to be recognized as a charity.

ATWOOD v. CORNWALL.

Error to Kalamazoo. Judgment reversed.

STATEMENT.—Atwood paid Cornwall a counterfeit fifty-five dollar bill. Five months later, Cornwall, having meanwhile transferred it and received it back with the information that it was bad, returned it to Atwood, and sued him for the amount. Atwood obtained judgment in a justice's court, but Cornwall recovered in the circuit.

4. Proof of counterfeits.—In a suit to recover the amount of a bill the genuineness of which is disputed, evidence of the conversations and opinions of persons through whose hands it has passed is foreign to the question of its identification, and not being lawful evidence of its bad character, ought to be excluded as in the nature of hearsay. But its character may be shown by the expert testimony of a banker.

5. Guaranty of negotiable paper.—A person passing negotiable paper, warrants its genuineness to the extent that if it is found bad, and returned within a proper time, he must make it good.

6. Recovery barred by negligence: estoppel.—A party who would otherwise be able to recover back the amount of bad money passed upon him, will be debarred of his action by lack of diligence. If payment of what is supposed to be legal-tender paper is to be regarded as contingent and not absolute, the receiver should be regarded as having elected to retain it, unless he uses speedy and active diligence to determine its character, and to notify the giver in order that the latter may protect himself against prior parties. Where "unnecessary delay" appears, the taker cannot keep alive the liability of the giver, and shall not recover. For cases of estoppel, see Camidge v. Allenby, 6 B. & C. 373; Jennison v. Parker, 7 Mich. 355; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Gray, 13 Mich. 191; Edwards on Bills. 207, 551.

7. Familiarity with legal tender.—Inasmuch as all creditors must receive coin and legal tender paper in payment, if offered, and as they refuse a tender thereof at their peril, the law assumes that every business man will become generally familiar with the money of his country, so as to be able to exercise a judgment upon it.

8. Innocent takers of bad money in equal equity.—The innocent taker of counterfeit money is not generally guilty of culpable negligence, and among several takers, one cannot be held more in fault than the rest for not detecting the cheat. The common law seems to indicate that of two innocent parties, the taker of counterfeit coin cannot claim recourse against him from whom he took it, (Sheppard's Touchstone, 140; Wade's case, 5 Co. 114), probably because parties in equal equity shall not be disturbed.

9. Distinctions between worthless paper.—For distinctions between counterfeit and otherwise valueless paper, see Edwards on Bills, 205-7, and note.

We heartily commend this effort of Mr. CHANEY, and hope it will serve as a model for imitation in other states. Considering the exceptionally high character of the supreme court of Michigan, we should think it would meet with considerable patronage outside of that state. We shall avail ourselves of the privilege of abstracting from its columns freely for the benefit of our readers.

Digitized by Google

THE SPIRIT OF LAWS. By M. de Secondat Baron de Montesquieu, translated from the French by Thomas Nugent, LL.D. A new edition, carefully revised and compared with the best Paris edition, to which are prefixed a memoir of the life and writings of the author, and an analysis of the work by M. D'Alembert. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co., 1873.

Montesquieu, in his day, one of the leading intellects of the civilized world, did not seek to lay down any code of so-called "natural laws;" nor was it his object to unfold a favorite system of his own which should at once revolutionize the jurisprudence of European states. He aimed to present in this, his great work, upon which the best years of his life were spent, a clear and logical statement of the results of his immense reading and extensive observation, regarding the different kinds of laws which men can have, the comparisons which can be made between them, and their relations with those things concerning which they prescribe rules. The store of materials, which by the voyages and discoveries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, were at the disposal of the sociologist, were used by him with freedom and yet with a scrupulous anxiety to avoid false conclusions.

The reception given to his work by the leading minds of France, showed that in a century when intellect seemed subservient to despotism, the spirit of progress and of civil freedom was abroad in the hearts of many who, perhaps, wondered that "* * * he dared to speak.

What some scarce dared to think."

He lived, thought, and wrote at the right time, and, though seemingly, far ahead of his age—was really its living, daring exponent.

His biographer says of him: "He first made himself, as it were, a stranger in his own country, that he might know it better. He next visited Europe, and with the deepest attention enquired into the characteristics of the several peoples by whom it was inhabited. In fine, he had examined and judged nations and eminent men that no longer exist, but in the annals of the world. Thus he gradually rose to the highest title a wise man can attain, that of legislator of nations."

Natural law, divine law, ecclesiastical law, civil law, political law, international law, all are discussed,—and the principles which prescribe their nature and which determine their objects, are announced.

While dwelling upon the Romans and the French as the peoples whose fame and interesting history make them especially useful as examples of the application of his principles, M. de Montesquieu evidently finds the highest political freedom established by the constitution and laws of England. Nor is it remarkable that he should be filled with admiration for that government, which then exhibited in its well-balanced stability, and in the apparent contentment and prosperity of its people, such a contrast to his native land, where checks upon an absolute monarchy were unheard of, and the mass of people were sunk in such misery as to lead De Tocqueville, in writing of them, to say, "No such state of things existed in any other great nation of civilized Europe. * * * * Crushed for centuries under the weight of abuses which no one shared with them, living alone, and brooding silently over their prejudices, their jealousies, and their hatreds, they were hardened by their hard experience, and were as ready to inflict as to bear suffering." This liking for the plan upon which the English government was administered, is displayed quite freely throughout the work; and as our own constitution bears a close resemblance, in many important particulars, to that of England, his views become of living interest to us Americans. Indeed, no student of law or of politics in any wide sense, can afford to neglect him. The style of the work is an admirable example of the superiority of the great writers of France to all other European writers, in the art or power of perspicuity. The most profound thoughts are expressed in the most simple and intelligible forms of speech. It is this virtue which makes his history—if so we may call it—of civil jurisprudence most simple and comprehensive. He always announces his opinions in terms perfectly unambiguous. He is, however, too fond of strewing his work with epigrams, brilliant and ingenious, but wearisome from their abundance.

Of the translation but little need be said. That of Dr. Nugent, of 1750, is retained; and that it is a faithful one we have the testimony of the author himself in a letter to the translator, in which he says: "Your translation has no blemishes but those of the original which are to be charged to my account; and I am much obliged to you for your ability in concealing them from the public eye." Montesquieu's epigrammatic French is rendered into clear and vigorous English.

CALIFORNIA CITATIONS: An Aphabetical Table of all the Cases cited in the Opinions of the California Reports, and of the California Cases cited in the Reports of the other States; with the points as to which they are Cited, Approved, Affirmed, Criticized, Doubted, Denied, or Overruled. By ROBERT DESTY, Attorney-at-Law. San Francisco: Sumner Whitney & Co. Price $7.50.

This work resembles somewhat in plan Bigelow's Overruled Cases. It is, however, much fuller, in that it states the point as to which each case has been cited, commented upon, overruled, doubted, etc. On the other hand, it embraces only such cases as have been cited in the reports of California. Works more or less similar to this have been found useful in other states. Linn's Index of Pennsylvania, Wait's Table of New York Cases, and Wendling's Index to Illinois Reports. This work will be indispensable to every lawyer in California, and will be a valuable addition to every bar and private library. If every state in the Union had an index of this character, it would be easy, by putting them together, to make a concordance of American cases which would be of infinite value to the practitioner.

The author has displayed considerable care and industry, and the publishers have brought out the work in excellent style.

THE LAW OF REMEDIES FOR TORTS, INCLUDING REPLEVIN, REAL ACTION, PLEADING, EVIDENCE, DAMAGES. By FRANCIS HILLIARD. 2d edition, greatly enlarged. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.: 1873. pp. 771. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

The profession is familiar with the various legal works of Mr. Hilliard, and with his mode of constructing them. The practical judgment of the bar establishes that they are useful: and this is a great merit. "The Law of Torts" is, perhaps, the best of his productions, and has been received with no inconsiderable favor by the body of the profession, The work before us, on the "Remedies for Torts" is a supplement or sequel to the former, but can be used either independent of it, or in connection with it. It was prepared afterwards, and the new matter in it ought, for convenience sake, to have been incorporated into the first work. If the author would hereafter recast the two works and throw them into one, he would render a service which those who have occasion to use the books, would not fail to appreciate. The work before us is the second edition, and the statement in the title page that it is "greatly enlarged," is borne out by the volume, which shows an increase of about two hundred pages.

Legal News and Notes.

—JUDGE R. W. HUGHES, the recently appointed judge of the United States district court, has arrived in Norfolk, and will make preparations to take up his permanent residence there.

—MRS. DELIA SHELDON DRUMMOND, the lamented wife of the Hon. THOMAS DRUMMOND, judge of the United States circuit court at Chicago, was buried in Graceland cemetery in that city on Thursday the 22d inst.

—THE house committee on the judiciary has not yet considered the Judge DURELL impeachment case, all the evidence not yet being in printed form for the information of its members.

—WE regret to learn that Judge EMMONS of the sixth circuit, is still suffering from a deprivation of his sight. We trust that this affliction is but temporary, and that the country is not to be deprived of the benefit of his clear judicial mind and great learning.

—MR. EDMUNDS of Vermont, has introduced a bill in the senate to provide assistance to circuit judges in certain cases. It authorizes the employment of a secretary, at a salary not exceeding $2,500, to assist any federal judge who, by reason of physical infirmity, is unable, in the opinion of the attorney general, to perform his judicial duties without such assistance. Referred to the committee on the judiciary.

—IN the Tichborne case, last week, Mr. Hawkins concluded his summing up for the prosecution with a passionate vindication of Lady Radcliff, who, he declared, had never been soiled by the filthy, blighting, unholy, and unnatural touch of the defendant.

—THE supreme judicial court in Boston, affirmed the decree of Justice DEVONS in committing for six months, for contempt of court, J. W. Cartwright, one of the receivers of the Hide and Leather Insurance Company, and former president thereof, for withholding and applying to his own use some $12,000 of the assets of the company.

Digitized by Google

—MR. MILLS of Texas, has introduced a bill to repeal all laws authorizing the formation of associations of persons for the purpose of banking, which, if it become a law, will abolish all national banks, and provide for the settlement of their accounts at the treasury and the surrender of the bonds upon which their circulation was based. The bill was referred to the committee on banking and currency.

—THE Supreme Court of the United States adjourned on Friday last until Monday the 2d of March. This recess is taken to enable the judges, who have a large number of cases before them, an opportunity to fully examine them and prepare opinions, etc. The court has accomplished more business this session up to the present time, than has been heretofore done in a full session. On the re-assembling of the court, the chief justice will take his seat.

—HON. JAMES THOMPSON, late chief justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, died suddenly in the supreme court room in Philadelphia, on the 28th instant, while engaged in the argument of a cause before the supreme court in bank. A colloquy of a not unpleasant character had taken place between the counsel and the bench, and Judge THOMPSON was leaning on a desk, about to resume his argument, when he dropped down, and in five minutes ceased to live.

Judge THOMPSON was born in Middlesex, Berks county, Pennsylvania, October 1, 1806. He received a good education, and after leaving school entered a printing office for the purpose of learning type-setting. He commenced the study of law, and in 1828 he was admit ed to the bar. His talent and energy speedily gained him a good practice, and turning his attention to politics, he was thrice elected to the legislature—in 1832, 1833, and 1834. During his last term he was elected speaker of the house, and made a very excellent impression as a presiding officer, by his knowledge of parliamentary rules, and firmness and impartiality. In 1836 he was a presidential elector, and for six years he sat in the district court as presiding judge. In 1845 he was elected to congress and served until 1851. He was elected judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania for fifteen years, in 1857, and was the democratic candidate for re-election in October, 1872, but was defeated. During the latter part of his term he was chief justice.

—MR. ALVORD has introduced a bill into the New York Assembly, to regulate the purchase and sale of gold bullion, gold coin or United States treasury gold certificates. The bill provides that all contracts for future delivery beyond the day of contract, whether it be seller's or purchaser's option or for a day certain, are hereby declared to be fraudulent and wholly void, unless at the time of the making of any such contract of sale, the seller shall actually have and hold in his possession, as his own property, such gold bullion, gold coin, or United States treasury gold certificates, and shall continue thus to hold, possess and own them, ready to be delivered at the time for the fulfillment of such contract, undiminished in the quantity required by the terms of the contract. Rules and regulations of associations contrary to these provisions, when enforced or published, are made a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or six months' imprisonment, or both.

—SINCE the bankrupt bill has passed the house, the judiciary committee of the house have been in constant receipt of communications from different sections of the country, nearly all of which object to a repeal of the law, but all asking more or less modification of the existing law; and there are quite as many minds as there are persons writing, each of whom suppose they have the exact remedy for existing difficulties.

—THE principal feature of the Indiana financial bill, introduced recently by Mr. Orth, of that state, into the national house of representatives, is the provision permitting any holder of a United States bond to take it to the treasury and exchange it for currency, and vice versa—exchanging one for the other back and forth at pleasure. Another provision authorises the the secretary to prepare two thousand million dollars of greenbacks, to hold in reserve, in readiness to exchange for bonds, or vice versa, as called for. The bill covers eighty-five pages of legal-cap manuscript, and is indorsed by petitions from twenty-seven counties of Indiana. Mr. Orth states that he introduced it at the request of petitioners, and will make a speech in its favor.

—MR. CONKLING'S bill to provide for an international commission of the maritime powers to lay down ocean courses for steam vessels, and otherwise provide for increased safety of sea travel, directs the president to appoint a commissioner on the part of the United States, to meet with such other commissioners as may be appointed by foreign maritime powers, whose co-operation he shall invite for the above described purpose. The United States commissioner is to be confirmed by the senate. The bill is to be framed in accordance with the memorial of the New York chamber of commerce on said subject.

—IN 1869 or '70, Amanda Rushing, a married daughter of Isaac Kembro, of Davidson county, brought suit in the circuit court for damages alleged to have been sustained from his whipping her. She was rendered judgment for $3,500 damages, when the defendant appealed to the supreme court, where the judgment of the court below was affirmed. It appears that, between the time of the alleged whipping and the bringing of suit, the defendant, by deed of gift, transferred all his property to his remaining children. Mrs. Rushing now files a bill in the chancery court alleging that the conveyance to the remaining two children was fraudulent, and made for the purpose of defeating her claims and those of other creditors against him, and asks that the conveyance on this account be set aside.—Nashville (Tenn.) Banner.

Notes and Queries.

EDITOR CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.—In view of the question and answer in your first issue, this question suggests itself: If the state supreme court, in a certain case has passed on questions involving a construction or an interpretation of the statutes, will the federal court for that state, for that reason, in an analogous case, follow the decisions of the former?

ANSWER.—If the decision of the state court were not upon the same, but only upon an analogous question, we presume it would have not an authoritative, but only a persuasive force.

 We hold over several questions proposed by correspondents, for future attention.

Notes of English Decisions.

[From the Law Times.]

Attachment for Disobedience of order to produce Documents—Servant forbidden to produce by Master—Corporation—Common Pleas at Lancaster.—In obedience to the instructions of his directors, and in disobedience of the order of the district prothonotary of the common pleas at Lancaster, and of the order of an arbitrator, the secretary of a railway company refused to produce before the arbitrator numerous books and papers of the company, which the attorney of the plaintiff in the case referred to swore to be material to the plaintiff's case: Held, that the secretary, being in the position of a servant, was justified in obeying the orders of his masters not to produce the documents, and a rule to attach him for contempt discharged. Whether an action would lie in such a case, quære: (Crowther v. Appleby; Re Sharpley, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580. C. P.)

Equitable Mortgage—Agreement to execute Legal Mortgage—Marriage Articles—Settlement—Constructive Notice—Priority.—In 1866, L. deposited with a bank the title deeds of certain real estate to secure the balance of his account, and at the same time he executed a memorandum by which he agreed to execute a deed for legally carrying out the security. In 1871, two days before his marriage, articles were executed by which he agreed to settle the same property, stating, in answer to enquiries by the solicitor of the intended wife, who prepared the articles, that the property was unincumbered, and that the title deeds were at his banker's for safe custody. Shortly after the marriage a settlement was executed by which he conveyed the legal estate in the property to the trustee of the settlement. On a bill by the bank for foreclosure, Held, that it was the duty of the solicitor to have made further enquiries of the bank; that the intended wife must be taken to have had constructive notice of the equitable charge in favor of the bank, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a foreclosure: (Maxfield v. Burton, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 571. Rolls.)

Power of Appointment—Execution—Doctrine of Cy-Pres—The donee of a power of appointment of an estate to one or more of the children of A., by his will devised the estate to B., the son of A., for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of B. (who were not objects of the power) in tail male. Held, that the cy-pres doctrine was applicable, and that B. took an estate tail; (Dine v. Hall, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 568. Rolls.)

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

Disturbing Religious Worship—A Curious Case.

It is not often that a case arises combining the comical with the serious in as peculiar a manner as the case of The State v. Linkhaw, 69 North Carolina Reports, 214. The defendant, a member of the Methodist church, was indicted for disturbing the congregation. It was in proof that he sang, during religious worship, in such a manner as to disturb the congregation, and greatly interrupt the services. One of the witnesses imitated his singing in a manner which "produced a burst of prolongued and irresistible laughter, convulsing alike the spectators, the bar, the jury and the court." It was in evidence that the disturbance occasioned by his singing was decided and serious. "The effect of it was to make one part of the congregation laugh, and the other mad; the irreligious and frivolous enjoyed it as fun, while the serious and devout were indignant." The defendant, being on many occasions expostulated with by the church-members and authorities, replied, "that he would worship God, and that as a part of his worship it was his duty to sing."

It was not contended by the state that the defendant had any purpose or intention to disturb the congregation; but on the contrary, it was admitted that he was conscientiously taking part in the religious services. Nevertheless, the trial court instructed the jury that he must be presumed to have intended the necessary consequences of his bad singing; and they accordingly returned a verdict of guilty. But the supreme court (SETTLE, J.) said that this admission of the state put an end to the prosecution; that, although a man is generally presumed to intend the consequences of his acts, yet the presumption is here rebutted by a fact admitted by the state. "It would seem," said the court, "that the defendant is a proper subject for the discipline of the church, but not for the discipline of the courts."

Bankrupt Act—Illegal Preference—Confession of judgment by Corporation—Is an Insurance Company a Banker or Trader?

Several interesting questions under the bankrupt act were decided by DRUMMOND, circuit judge, on the 31st ult., in reversing the decree of the district court for the northern district of Illinois, adjudicating the Great Western Telegraph Company a bankrupt. The petition was filed by one Hilton, claiming to be a creditor of the company for over $20,000, evidenced by several judgments obtained on promissory notes made by George L. Otis, treasurer, to Selah Reeve, and by him indorsed to David A. Gage, and by Gage to petitioner. Hilton alleged as acts of bankruptcy, that the company allowed judgments to be rendered against them by default in favor of the Commercial National Bank, on which executions were issued.

The company filed an answer denying the acts of bankruptcy, and alleging that they had had the judgments entered by default set aside, and pleas entered, and that, as to the judgment by confession, the power of attorney was void, since Otis, who gave it, was not authorized. The case was tried, and the company was adjudicated bankrupt. The case was taken before the circuit judge by a petition for review.

In giving his judgment, reversing the decree of adjudication of bankruptcy, Judge DRUMMOND is reported as making, in substance, the following observations: "That before the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wilson against the City Bank of St. Paul, 1 CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, 40, overruling the case of Buchanan v. Smith, 16 Wall. 277, it had been held that where a party was insolvent and allowed judgments to be obtained against him by default, without defence, such an act was suffering his property to be taken in legal process, within the meaning of the bankrupt law, and was the commission of an act of bankruptcy. But the rule laid down by that case establishes the reverse proposition.

"It was indispensable, also, in order that the judgments by confession be upheld, that the execution of the warrants of attorney by which judgments were confessed, should be clearly established as given, by the proper authority. In this case, it was contended that the attaching the seal of the corporation to the warrant was sufficient evidence of the lawful authority. The decision of the supreme court of this state in the Terwilliger case practically decided that the persons professing to act as officers were in reality enemies of the interests of the corporation, and the proof offered in the court below, of the seal having been attached by duly authorized officers was not sufficient. The executive committee, whose duties were defined by the charter, passed a resolution approving the execution of certain notes which were issued, upon which judgments were ultimately obtained, but made no allusion to warrants of attorney.

"Again, there being a controversy in the state courts as to the validity of the judgments which were rendered, the court below should have given a reasonable time to contest the validity of these judgments, before foreclosing all their rights by an adjudication in bankruptcy, not an indefinite time, but a reasonable time, and should have permitted and required it to contest these matters in the state courts.

"In regard to the alleged insolvency, the corporation being in the hands of its enemies, and on account of the peculiar condition of its property, it was difficult to say if it were absolutely insolvent. But assuming the validity of the notes, there might be a question as to whether non-payment thereof would be an act of bankruptcy, the company not being a merchant or trader. But it was not necessary to consider this question. It is better for the interests of the petitioning creditor that the company should be permitted to prosecute its own affairs, rather than be forced into bankruptcy. The foundation of these proceedings being of such a doubtful character, the court did not feel disposed to decide the company bankrupt. The adjudication would, therefore, be reversed, and an order be made of the district court to permit the company to contest the proceedings of the state courts and warrants of attorney.

"This does not dismiss the proceedings in bankruptcy, but sets aside the adjudication, and allows the company time to decide the suits in the circuit court against them, or the petitioning creditors can amend their petition, alleging new grounds, and obtain an adjudication in that way."

Digitized by Google

Negligence—Liability of a Railroad Company for Injury to a Child, Caused by an Unguarded and Unfastened Turn-table.

The Supreme Court of the United States, on the 28th ultimo, affirmed the important principle that under certain circumstances, a railroad company may be liable on the ground of negligence, for a personal injury to a child of tender years, caused by a turn-table, built by a company upon its own uninclosed land, and left unguarded and unlocked, in a situation that renders it likely to cause injury to children.

The case in which this doctrine was asserted, was Stout v. Sioux City & Pacific Railroad Co., and is reported in the court below, in 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 294. The action was brought by an infant, by his next friend, for an injury which happened in the town of Blair, in Nebraska, under the following circumstances:

The plaintiff was a boy of the tender age of six years and two or three months. The town of Blair was a new place, and contained a population of about one hundred people. On the plat of the town is a tract of land of variable width, extending almost the entire length of the plat, owned and used by the defendants for their road-bed and depot grounds, and which divides the town into two portions. The cross streets of the town run up to this railroad ground and there stop, with exception of one or two streets, which were laid out across it. On this ground, which was not enclosed, was situated the defendant's depot house, and, about one-quarter of a mile distant from the depot house was located the turn-table, on which the plaintiff was injured. There were but few houses in the immediate neighborhood of the turn-table, and the plaintiff's parents lived in another portion of the town, and about three-fourths of a mile distant from the turn-table.

The plaintiff, without the knowledge of his parents, started with one or two other boys to go to the defendant's depot, about half a mile away, with no definite purpose in view. When the boys had arrived at the depot, it was proposed by some of them to go to the turn-table to play; and the boys proceeded to the turn-table, about a quarter of a mile distant, traveling along the defendant's road-bed or track. When the boys had reached the turn-table, which was not attended or guarded by any employe of the company, and which was not then fastened or locked, and which revolved easily on its axis, two of them commenced to turn it, and the plaintiff, in attempting to get upon it, (being at the time upon the railroad track), had the misfortune to get his foot caught between the end of the rail on the turn-table, as it was revolving, and the end of the iron rail on the main track of the defendant's road, and his foot was badly cut and crushed, resulting in a serious and permanent injury.

There was the evidence of one witness, an employe of the company, that he had previously seen boys playing at the turn-table, and had forbidden his children to play there. But this witness had no charge of the turn-table, and did not communicate the fact to any of the officers or employes of the company having charge of the turn-table. It appeared from the plaintiff's testimony, that he had not before that day been engaged in playing at the turn-table. The turn-table was constructed on the defendant's own land, in the usual and ordinary manner.

The ground of complaint against the defendant, as set out in the petition, was that the turn-table, as it was constructed, was of a dangerous nature and character, when unlocked or unguarded, and that being, as it is alleged, in a place much resorted to by the public, and where children were wont to go and play, it was the duty of the defendant to keep the same securely locked or fastened, so as to prevent it from being turned or played with by children, or to keep the same guarded, so as to prevent injuries such as befell the plaintiff. The basis of this action, therefore, was that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of this kind; that, in failing to discharge this duty, the defendant was guilty of negligence; that this neglect caused the injury to the plaintiff, and that, therefore, the defendant is liable in damages therefor.

On these facts the company contended that the jury should be directed, as matter of law, that in respect to its turn-table it owed no duty towards the plaintiff, and hence, was under no liability to him. The circuit court refused, but submitted the question of negligence to the jury under instructions as to the elements of actionable negligence in such a case. The case appeared to be one of first impression. The jury found for the plaintiff and judgment was rendered upon the verdict, and it is this judgment which has recently been affirmed by the Supreme Court.

That court hold, under the circumstances, that it was for the jury, and not the court, to determine whether the alleged negligence, which was the foundation of the action, was established. We shall hereafter lay before our readers the text of the opinion in this novel and important case. Several other like injuries caused by turn-tables have been mentioned in the newspapers within the past two years.

Contract of Life Insurance not Abrogated by War.

JOHN WOODSON SMITH AND FANNIE M. SMITH, HIS WIFE, RESPONDENTS, v. THE CHARTER OAK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, APPELLANTS.

In the Circuit Court of Saint Louis County, Missouri, General Term, Jauuary, 1873.

Hon. JAMES J. LINDLEY,
" CHESTER H. KRUM,
" GEORGE A. MADILL,
" JAMES K. KNIGHT,
" HORATIO M. JONES, } Judges.

1. The late Civil War—When it began.—The war of the rebellion is held to have begun in the state of Virginia, at the date of the issuance by the president of the United States of his proclamation of intended blockade, which embraced that state, namely, on the 29th day of April, 1861.

2. Life Insurance—War—Agent in Insurrectionary State.—The breaking out of the late war did not operate to sever the relation of principal and agent between a Life Insurance company domiciled in one of the loyal states and its agent in an insurrectionary state; and the payment of premiums to such an agent was not unlawful.

3. ——. Tender of Premium to Agent in Insurrectionary State.—When, therefore, a premium was tendered to such an agent, it was his duty, notwithstanding the fact that communication with his principal was interrupted by hostilities, to receive it unconditionally; and the refusal so to receive it, constitutes on the part of the insurance company, a breach of the covenants of the policy, for which such company is liable in damages.

4. ——. ——. Measure of Damages in such Case.—The measure of damages in such a case, is the value of the policy at the time of the breach of its covenants by the insurer.

5. ——. ——. Subsequent Breach of Policy by Insured.—The fact that after the covenant of the policy had been thus broken by the insurer, the insured, in violation of the stipulations of the policy, voluntarily entered the Confederate army, does not prejudice his right to recover damages of the insurer for the previous violation of the contract on his part.

Digitized by Google

6. ——. ——. Case in Judgment.—In the year 1853, a resident of the state of Virginia effected an insurance upon his life for the benefit of his wife, in a company whose corporate residence was in the state of Connecticut. Payment of the stipulated premiums was regularly made until the 6th day of May, 1861, when, a payment becoming due, it was made to the agent, who received it upon the condition that he should be able to communicate with his principal and procure the proper receipt for the same. Being unable to communicate with his company, he subsequently, on the 14th day of March, 1862, returned the money to the insured. In November, 1861, the insured entered the Confederate army without the consent of the insurer, and remained in such service until the year 1863. The insurer having, at the close of the war, refused to renew the policy, the insured, jointly with his wife, brings this action to recover damages for a breach of the covenant of the policy, alleging that by reason of his advanced age, he is unable to effect an insurance on his life except at a much greater cost than the premiums stipulated to be paid in this policy. Held, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and that the measure of their damages is the value of the policy on the 6th day of May, 1861.

This case comes here by appeal from special term, having arisen under a policy of life insurance issued by the appellants.

The petition alleges, that on the 6th day of May, 1853, in consideration of the payment of an annual premium of one hundred and four dollars, during the life of John Woodson Smith, the appellants issued the policy sued on, whereby they insured the life of said Smith in the sum of five thousand dollars for the term of his natural life. The policy was obtained for the benefit of the wife of said Smith, the respondent, Fannie M. Smith. The petition alleges, that the premium due on the 6th of May, of each year, was paid from 1853 to 1861, but that on the 6th day of May, 1861, the premium then due and payable, was tendered by respondents to the appellants, who thereupon refused to receive and accept such premium. It is alleged also, that since the 6th of May, 1861, the appellants have refused to receive premiums which have subsequently become due, and have declared the policy void and of no effect. The petition negatives the conditions of avoidance specified in the policy, and alleges, that since the breach of the contract of insurance by the appellants, in 1861, John Woodson Smith has advanced so far in years, that his life cannot be insured in a solvent company at as favorable rate of premium as is stipulated for in the policy sued on, and that his life can only be insured by the payment of a premium largely in excess of that required by the contract of the appellants.

Under this petition, the respondent, Fannie M. Smith, seeks to recover such sum by way of damages, as will place her in as good a condition as she would have been in under the policy, had it not been terminated by the appellants.

The answer is a traverse, together with an affirmative defence of failure on the part of the respondents to pay the annual premiums due in the year 1861, and for each year thereafter. The answer alleges also a breach of the conditions contained in the policy; in that John Woodson Smith voluntarily entered the military service of the so-called Confederate States, and remained in such military service without having first obtained the consent of the appellants. The answer sets up a further breach, in that Smith has become so intemperate as to seriously impair his health. There is also a plea of the statute of limitations. To this answer there is a reply.

The case was tried at special term before a jury. Evidence was introduced by the respondents, which showed that they are husband and wife; that the premiums due under the policy were paid down to May 6, 1861; that, on the last named day, the amount of the premium was tendered by a brother of the assured to the agent of the appellants, in Lynchburg, Virginia; that the agent hesitated in regard to receiving this premium, on the ground that communication had ceased between his principal and himself; that he received the money, however, upon the condition, that he could communicate with his principal and obtain a proper receipt, and that subsequently, on the fourteenth day of March, 1862, the agent returned the money to the brother of the assured, who accepted it—the agent stating, that he had been unable to communicate with his principal and that he declined to take upon himself the responsibility of receiving such premium in the name of the appellants. The respondent, John Woodson Smith, testified that he entered the military service of the so-called Confederate States voluntarily in November, 1861, and remained in such service until the year 1863. It appeared, that the assured is a man in good health and not addicted to habits of intemperance. This is all of the evidence which is material to the questions raised by the instructions, whose propriety the appellants dispute, under this appeal. It should be stated, however, that evidence was introduced showing the present value of the policy sued on, and that the verdict was rendered in accordance with such testimony.

Samuel Knox, Esq., for appellants; Messrs. Noble, Orrick & Shannon for respondent.

KRUM, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

At the outset of this opinion, we announce, that we regard as proper the theory of the respondents as to the measure of the recovery upon the policy, whose covenants it is alleged were broken by the appellants. If the facts of this case show a breach of the policy sued on, then the measure of respondents' recovery will be the present value of such policy at the time of such breach. It is a matter clearly susceptible of determination; and we cannot see why the rule of recovery is not just and equitable. If, without fault on his part, a contract of life insurance be terminated unlawfully by the company, it cannot be maintained successfully, that the assured, cannot sue at once as for a breach of the covenants of such policy, and that the measure of his recovery will not be the value of his policy at the time of such breach.

Passing now to the questions raised by the instructions given for the respondents, we shall consider, first, the direction to the jury, as to the time when the war of the rebellion began in the state of Virginia. Under this instruction, the jury were directed that the proclamation of the president of the United States, dated August 16, 1861, was to be deemed and taken by them as the beginning of actual hostilities between the United States and the so-called Confederate States; and that before such date, neither of the parties to the contract of insurance was released from obligation under it by reason of the war of the late rebellion. The appellants complain of this instruction as designating an improper date for the beginning of the war in Virginia. This instruction does not state correctly the date when the war began in Virginia. This matter has been adjudicated expressly by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Protector, 12 Wall. 700. There the chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language: "Acts of hostility by the insurgents occurred at periods so various, and of such different degrees of importance, and in parts of the country so remote from each other, both at the commencement and the close of the late civil war, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to say on what precise day it began or terminated. It is necessary, therefore, to refer to some public act of the political departments of the government to fix the dates; and, for obvious reasons, those of the executive department, which may be, and, in fact was, at the commencement of hostilities, obliged to act during the recess of congress, must be taken."

And the court say, that the proclamation of intended blockade by the president, may be assumed as marking the date at which the war began. The proclamation of intended blockade, which embraced the state of Virginia, was issued on the 27th day of April, 1861. So that on the 6th of May, 1861, war existed in the state of Virginia.

It remains to be determined, now, what effect the existence of war had upon the duties of the parties to the contract of insurance. At the instance of the respondents, the jury were instructed that it was the duty of the agent of the appellants, at Lynchburg, Virginia, to receive the premium, unconditionally, upon the 6th of May, 1861. This was a proper direction. The inauguration of war, in the state of Virginia, on the 27th day of April, 1861, did not operate to sever the relations of principal and agent, between the appelants and their agent at Lynchburg. The payment to such agent was lawful; it was incumbent upon the respondents to make such payment, and it was the duty of the agent to receive it.

Digitized by Google

In Buchanan v. Carey, 19 Johns. 136, a contract made before the war of 1812, by a citizen of the state of New York, to deliver timber in the United States to a citizen of Canada, was upheld to sanction a delivery of timber, during the war, to an agent of such citizen of Canada, said agent residing then in the state of New York. The contracting parties had become enemies before the delivery of the timber called for by the contract. But the alien enemy had an agent in the state of New York, to whom the delivery was made in behalf of his principal. The court held, that had such contract been made during the war, it would have been illegal and void, but, as it was made before the war, no rule of public policy forbid its execution within the limits of the United States, after the war had begun, by a delivery of the property covered by the contract, to an agent of the alien.

In Conn. v. Penn., 1 Peters, Circuit Court, 496, it is held, that "the rule can never apply in cases where the creditor, although a subject of the enemy, remains in the country of the debtor, or has a known agent there authorized to receive the debt, because the payment to such creditor or his agent could, in no respect, be construed into a violation of the duties imposed by a state of war upon the debtor. The payment, in such cases, is not made by an enemy, but it is no objection, that the agent may possibly remit the money to his principal." This doctrine is approved in Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 447. The case of the United States v. Grossmayer is precisely in point. There, during the war of the rebellion, Grossmayer, a citizen of New York, being a creditor of one Einstein, a citizen of and resident of Georgia, made an arrangement with Einstein, by which the latter was to remit to the former the amount of his debt in money, or if that were not possible, to invest the sum in cotton and hold it for Grossmayer until the close of the war. Under this arrangement, Einstein bought cotton, and shipped it to Savannah, to be held there for Grossmayer. It fell into the hands of the United States forces and was sold. Grossmayer preferred a claim for the proceeds before the court of claims, and that court gave judgment in his favor. Upon appeal, this judgment was reversed, the supreme court holding that the contract made during the war was not only inconsistent with duties growing out of a state of war, but in open violation of a statute on the subject. The court say: "A prohibition of all intercourse with an enemy during the war affects debtors and creditors on either side, equally with those who do not bear that relation to each other. We are not disposed to deny the doctrine, that a resident in the territory of one of the belligerents may have, in time of war, an agent residing in the territory of the other, to whom his debtor could pay his debt in money, or deliver to him property in discharge of it; but in such a case, the agency must have been created before the war began; for there is no power to appoint an agent for any purpose after hostilities have actually commenced, and to this effect are all of the authorities. United States v. Grossmayer, 9 Wall. 72.

We hold, therefore, that the agent was bound to receive unconditionally, the premium which became due and was tendered on May 6, 1861. The misdirection as to the time when the war began in Virginia, was immaterial. This defect was cured, moreover, by the farther direction, that before the date named in the instruction, neither party was released from his obligation under the contract. This, however, was not because the war did not begin in Virginia until August 16, 1861, but because the outbreak of the war there on the 27th of April, 1861, did not alter the respondent's duty to pay the premium, or the agent's duty to receive it when tendered. The contract of life insurance is executory on the part of the insurer, while it has been executed by the payment of the premiums due from the insured. It is said to be a continuing contract, in the sense that it is to be performed in the future; but it is not a contract of continuance in its performance. Cohen v. N. Y. Mut. Life, 50 N. Y. 610. It is settled law, that the contract of life insurance is not dissolved by the outbreak of war. And in Sands v. N. Y. Life Insurance Co., 50 N. Y. 626, a payment by the assured to the agent of the company within the limits of the Confederate States, during the war, was sustained as valid, although such payment was made in Confederate notes. "The result is," say the supreme court of Massachusetts, in Kershaw v. Kelsey, 100 Mass. 561, "that the law of nations, as judicially declared, prohibits all intercourse between citizens of the two belligerents, which is inconsistent with the state of war between their countries; and that this includes any act of voluntary submission to the enemy, or receiving his protection, as well as any act or contract which tends to increase his resources; and every kind of trading, or commercial dealing, or intercourse, whether by transmission of money or goods, or order for the delivery of either, between the two countries, directly or indirectly, or through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form, looking to, or involving such transmission, or by insurances upon trade, with or by the enemy. Beyond the principle of these cases, the prohibition has not been carried by judicial decision." We hold, therefore, that the outbreak of the war did not operate to discontinue the appellant's agency in Virginia. The appellants may have expressly revoked the authority of their agent, but no such revocation has been shown. It was lawful on the part of the respondents to pay the premium to the agent. It was not only lawful for him to receive it in the name of his principal, but it was his duty to receive it without condition. He could have held it until the close of the war, but even if he had remitted it to his principal, such action on his part could not prejudice either party. These views are supported, not only by the authorities already cited, but by elaborate considerations of the doctrine in New York Life Insurance Company v. Clopton, 7 Bush. (Ky.) 179; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, 20 Grattan, 614, and Hamilton v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 9 Blatchford, 234.

The jury were instructed farther, in regard to the premium due on May 6, 1861, that if they believed that if the respondents paid such premium when due, and voluntarily accepted its return in March, 1862, then they should find for the appellants. On the other hand, if they believed that the agent refused to receive the premium except upon condition, and afterwards, in accordance with such condition, required the respondents to accept a return of such premium, then such conditional receipt was not in conformity to the contract of insurance, and the jury should find for the respondents. This direction put the issue of payment of premium fairly before the jury. If it was paid and then the respondents consented to receive it back, they could not recover in this action. But it is manifest, that there was no payment on the 6th of May, 1861. In order to constitute a payment, there must be both a delivery by the debtor and an acceptance by the creditor, with the purpose on the part of the former to part from, and of the latter to accept of, the immediate ownership of the thing passed from the one to the other. Thompson v. Kellogg, 23 Mo. 281. But the agent received the premium conditionally, and upon a failure of the condition, returned the money to the respondents. The respondents were ready, and offered to pay the premium when due—this was all that could be expected of them. When the agent of the appellants refused to receive the premium except upon conditions, there was a breach of the contract of insurance, and the appellants became liable to the respondents. In view of what we have said in regard to the attitude of the parties in May, 1861, the subsequent entry of the assured into the military service of the Confederate States, could not have prejudiced the rights of the respondents against the appellants. The contract was broken already—a cause of action had occurred already in favor of the respondents.

Digitized by Google

It seems to us that a proper determination of the case was had at special term. The case was tried upon a different theory from that which has been indicated; but the judgment is, manifestly, for the proper party, and we have been able to see no reason why it should be disturbed.

The judgment will, therefore, be affirmed.

The other judges concur.

AFFIRMED.

NOTE.—We have before us two other well-considered opinions upon the subject embraced in the above case: One by Hon. ROBERT A. HILL, sitting in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, in the case of Seyms v. New York Life Insurance Co., and one by Hon. H. H. EMMONS, sitting in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Tennessee, in the case of Tait v. New York Life Insurance Co. Judge HILL'S opinion is ably reasoned, but does not review the recent cases on the subject. He takes substantially the same view of the question as that taken in the principal case. Judge EMMONS' opinion is reasoned with his accustomed ability. He takes the opposite view of the case, and holds that the contract of life insurance was abrogated by the war, if the insurer and insured are citizens respectively of the opposing belligerents, and each domiciliated within the territory of the opposing belligerents.

His opinion contains an exhaustive review of the authorities, not only those precisely in point, but also those which bear upon the general question. We select for publication the principal case, because it is the opinion of five judges, before whom the case has been fully argued by able counsel and with full access to the authorities. We believe that the principal case cites all the reported judgments upon the question how far the contract of life insurance is affected by war, except the two we have just mentioned, and the case of Dillard v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 44 Ga. 119. This last case holds, like Tait v. The N. Y. Life Ins. Co., that the contract of life insurance was abrogated by the war; but the counsel do not appear to have cited any recent decisions bearing upon the question, and the opinion is very brief, and the subject does not appear to have received the attention at the hands of the court that its importance would warrant.

The reasoning on which Judge EMMONS proceeds is, that the keeping alive of such a contract is beneficial to the public enemy. This, it is admitted in the case of Sands v. The New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., 50 New York, 632, would terminate the contract, if such were the case; but this is denied, especially when the policy contains a provision rendering it void if the assured shall enter the military or naval service, or die in the known violation of any law of the United States. Where the policy contains such a provision, PECKHAM, J., argues (50 New York, 635) that its perpetuation would be injurious to the public enemy. Again, Judge EMMONS argues that the fact that the sum insured will not in any event be paid until after the return of peace, does not furnish any reason against the doctrine that such a contract is avoided by war; because, if continued, it remains "one of the most certain sources of future payment which could be placed in the hands of our enemies;" it constitutes "present capital in the hands of the enemy." This argument is forcibly answered by Judge BLATCHFORD in Hamilton v. The New York Life Ins. Co., 9 Blatch. 249-50, as follows: "Nor is it perceived how the amount or value of a policy on the life of an alien enemy, who dies during the war, can be availed of to aid the war, by the government of the country of the assured, in any way, or to any extent, in or to which the amount or value of a promissory note, made before the war, and falling due during the war, can be availed of to aid the war, by the government of the country of its holder, while its maker continues to be an alien enemy. Yet it was never heard that the obligation to pay a note was, under such circumstances, or for such reasons, abrogated by a war."

Judge EMMONS' opinion places the question entirely, as we understand it, upon grounds of public law, and political duty. In the Georgia case (44 Ga. 122), the same conclusion is reached on a somewhat different ground. MCCAY, J., pronouncing the judgment of the court, reasons as follows: "It would have been illegal for Mrs. Dillard, [the wife of the insured,] to pay the premium to the company, during the war, contrary to the act of congress. And were this a case of forfeiture for a failure, we should hold that a forfeiture was prevented by the illegality of the performance of the condition. But is this such a case? The company contracts to pay so much at the death of the insured, if the annual premiums are paid as stipulated. It is clear from the policy, and from the known practice of all the companies, that the insured has a right, at any time, to refuse to pay, and give up his policy. The contract, upon its face, requires to be renewed from year to year, by the payment of the premium. Indeed, a contract of life insurance is, at best, nothing but an undertaking that the company will take the annual premiums paid, invest them safely, and pay the insured the product, after deducting the expenses of the business. Indeed, if every person insured lived to an average age, this would be exactly the contract. But, as any individual may die at any time, the company agree to pay him what his premium would amount to, making up its losses upon him by the payment of those who live beyond the average age. The regular annual payment of the premium agreed on is thus a condition precedent of the contract, and not a condition subsequent. And it is just here, that the authorities relied on fail to apply. If a condition subsequent becomes illegal, there is no forfeiture; for the estate having once vested, it shall not be divested because the party fails to do an illegal or impossible act. (Code, § 2680). But it is different with a condition precedent. If that be illegal, the right never vests. It is not a question of forfeiture, but a failure to do the thing necessary to acquire the right. (Brown's Leg. Max. 176.) And this, it seems to me, is a distinction based upon principles of justice and sound sense. If I promise a man to sell him my house, provided he appear on a particular day with the money, and he fails, for whatever reason, other than my fault, he has no right in the house. But if I sell him the house, and it is agreed that he shall forfeit it, if he fail to pay me for it in full, by a particular day, then the cause of his failure may, both in equity and sound sense, become very material!" On the other hand, in the case of Cohen v. The New York Mutual Life Ins. Co. 50 New York, 623, we find the following counter reasoning: "At the time of making the contract in this case, the plaintiff had the legal right and ability to make the annual payment, but the effect of the war was to make the attempt unlawful without any fault on his part. The operation of a condition as express and absolute as in this case, was held suspended during the war, in Semmes v. Hartford Ins. Co. (14 Wall. 158). The condition there, as here, was by the act and agreement of the party; and yet its performance being impossible, it was held to be inoperative."

The cases which hold that the contract of life insurance was not abrogated by the war, proceed chiefly upon the ground, that such a contract is in part executed by the payment of premiums; that by such payment, the beneficiary acquires a vested right in the benefits promised by the contract, of which he cannot be deprived by a casualty beyond his control, like the breaking out of a war. And some of the cases urge, in forcible language, that to hold the contract abrogated by the war, would be grossly unjust to the person for whose benefit the insurance is effected, and that such a defence on the part of the insurer, is an unconscionable defence. Thus, it is said in the Kentucky case: "To subject to forfeiture all the premiums paid, as well as the five thousand dollars for the loss of life, would be harshly and unreasonably penal, for no better cause than the inevitable non-precise payment of premium, which the law prevented the appellant from a right to receive." * * * "A suspension of the remedy, and not a dissolution of the contract, is all that is necessary, befitting or just." New York Life Ins Co. v. Clopton, 7 Bush, (Ky.), 184, 188. In the case in 9 Blatchford, the question is put by Judge BLATCHFORD in this way: "The defendants in effect say to Goodman (the insured): 'It was unlawful for us to receive from you your premiums for 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865, as they became due; it would have been idle for you to have tendered them to us; yet, as the contract was that you should pay them at specified times, the contract is forfeited; our liability to pay you the $5,983.05 is at an end, and besides that, the $2,307.50 paid us as premiums on the policies of 1849, and 1858, is forfeited to us.' I do not believe a defence of that kind to a policy of life insurance situated like the present one, was ever allowed by any court of justice in any civilized community. I certainly shall not be the first judge to set a precedent of the kind." Equally strong is the language of ANDERSON, J., speaking for a majority of the court in the Virginia case, where he states the case thus: "They [the insurers] refused to receive the last premium when it fell due and was tendered, and now refuse to pay the policy because the premium was not paid; and, moreover, claim of the defendant in error a forfeiture of the premiums which he had paid, amounting to $5,155, besides interest; and they invoke the intervention of the court to sustain them in these pretensions." * * * "It would be a monstrous perversion of law, and repugnant to our every sense of justice, to say that this company, after having received more than half the sum assured, could, by this act, determine the policy, hold on to the money they had received, and say to their confiding victim, 'You may whistle to the winds for your merited reward, notwithstanding you relied upon our covenant and good faith to pay it.'"

And while the court admit that this language puts the case too strongly, yet they say further on, that the proposition that the company could withhold from the agent the printed receipts by which payment of the premiums was to be acknowledged, "would be to say that they could refuse to receive payment, and thereby release themselves from the obligation of the policy, and subject the assured to a forfeiture, without any default of his, of all the premiums he had paid—a conclusion against which the sense of mankind would revolt."

Digitized by Google

These extracts indicate, to a partial extent, the reasoning of the courts on the subject. The result of the recent adjudications may be summed up, as follows:

1. The contract of life insurance is not abrogated, but only suspended, by the outbreak of a war which places the insurer and insured within opposing lines of belligerent occupancy. Smith v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., supra; Seyms v. New York Life Ins. Co., U. S. Circuit Court Southern District Miss. Nov. Term, 1873, (HILL, J.); Cohen v. New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., 50 New York, 610; Sands v. New York Life Ins. Co., 50 New York, 626; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, 20 Grattan, 614, (two of the five judges dissenting); New York Life Ins. Co. v. Clopton, 7 Bush. (Ky.) 179; Hamilton v. New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., 9 Blatchford, 234. Contra, Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co., U. S. Circuit Court Western Dist. Tenn. (EMMONS, J.); Dillard v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 44 Ga., 119.

2. If the stipulated premiums are paid until the outbreak of the war, but not thereafter, and the assured die during the war, the beneficiary or legal representative may, by giving notice and making proof of death within a reasonable time after the close of the war, demand and compel payment of the sum stipulated in the policy, less the unpaid premiums accruing previously to the death of the insured, with interest. Sands v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra; Seyms v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra; Manhattan Life Ins. Co., v. Warwick, supra, (two of the five judges dissenting); Hamilton v. New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., supra; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Clopton, supra. Contra, Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra; Dillard v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., supra. And this principle applies to an insurance maintained by a creditor upon the life of his debtor. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, supra.

3. If the insured survives the war, and within a reasonable time thereafter the unpaid premiums accruing during the war are tendered by him, and the insurer declines to receive the same, or to acknowledge the policy as in force, the beneficiary in the policy may maintain a bill in equity to reinstate the contract and declare the rights of the parties. Cohen v. New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., supra.

4. Or, under like circumstances, payment of the premiums having been tendered to, and refused by, the company's agent, during the war, the beneficiary may treat such refusal as a breach of the contract, and may maintain an action at law for damages; and the measure of damages is the value of the policy at the time of such breach of contract. Smith v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., supra (principal case.)

5. The relation of principal and agent between an insuranee company residing within one of the lines of belligerent occupancy, and its agent residing within the other, is not terminated by the fact of war. Smith v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co., (principal case) supra; Sands v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra. Hamilton v. New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., supra; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, supra; New York Life Ins. Co. v. Clopton, supra. Contra, Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra. And see Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 447, 452; United States v. Grossmeyer, 9 Wall. 72, 75. Provided, the agent had been appointed before the war. 7 Wall. 75.

6. And it is the duty of the insurer to provide an agent in the state where the premiums, by the terms of the policy are to be paid; and this duty continues, notwithstanding the intervention of war. Hamilton v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., supra.

7. Although an agent under such circumstances, would not have the power lawfully to enter into new contracts of insurance, [New York Life Ins. Co. v. Clopton, supra; Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 452], nor to transmit money received for premiums across the hostile lines to his principal: yet he might lawfully receive premiums on policies in force before the war, and such the insured might lawfully pay. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, supra; Sands v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra. At least, a tender to such an agent, and his refusal to receive the premium because of his inability to transmit the same to his principal because of the intervention of a state of war, would save a forfeiture of the policy. Hamilton v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., supra.

8. Payment of premiums under such circumstances in Confederate money, is a good payment, Sands v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra. But the right of the company through its agent to refuse payment in such funds, is recognized in Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, supra.

The above summary and quotations give but a meager idea of the effect of the cases examined. The only object of this note has been to indicate, to some extent, the judicial sentiment on the question, and the grounds on which the courts have proceeded, as well as the chief points which have been ruled.

—THE attention of the Chilian congress had been taken up with the new penal code and the new educational act.

Warehouse Grain Receipts—Sale—Bailment.

PATRICK RAHILLY v. WILFORD L. WILSON, ASSIGNEE OF ATKINSON & KELLOGG.

United States Circuit Court, District of Minnesota, December Term, 1873.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

1. Grain in Elevators—Sale—Bailment.—Where grain is stored in an elevator warehouse with the understanding implied from the known and invariable course of business, that it may be sold by the warehouseman, and that when the depositor shall be ready to surrender the receipt of the warehouseman therefor, the latter will give the highest market price or the same amount of grain of the like quality, but not the identical grain deposited nor grain from any specific mass, the transaction is a sale and not a bailment.

2. Criteria of sales and bailments stated.

This is appeal in bankruptcy from the decree of the district court, granting the relief prayed in the original bill of Rahilly, filed for himself and the other warehouse grain receipt holders, and dismissing the cross bill of the First National Bank of St. Paul.

The suit was brought in the district court to settle the title to twenty-one thousand five hundred bushels of wheat, or its representative in money, now lying in the registry of that court.

Geo. Atkinson & Co., and their successors, Atkinson & Kellogg, were engaged at Lake City as warehousemen and commission and forwarding merchants, during the fall of 1868, and up to December 8th, 1870, when they filed their petition in bankruptcy, and were adjudicated bankrupts.

The firm of George Atkinson & Co. was composed of George Atkinson alone until April 1st, 1870, when Kellogg became a partner. The old name was used until September, and was then changed to Atkinson & Kellogg, and so continued until their failure, at which time they had in their warehouse the wheat in controversy, which was taken possession of by the assignee in bankruptcy.

At the date of their bankruptcy, they had outstanding warehouse receipts issued to farmers to the amount of about thirty-five thousand bushels, representing Nos. 1 and 2 grades of wheat, and two receipts dated November 23, 1870, to the amount of twelve thousand bushels, issued as collateral security for the payment of three drafts given to pay an overdrawn bank account with their bankers, to the amount of ten thousand dollars. These two receipts were issued to the drawee named in the drafts, and they had been endorsed over to their bankers. They represented twelve thousand bushels of wheat, and are now held by the First National Bank of St. Paul, having come into its possession in the course of a transaction which will hereafter be mentioned.

The complainant, a farmer to whom some of these receipts had been issued in behalf of himself, and the others holding receipts to the amount of thirty-five thousand bushels, filed this bill against the assignee, and seeks to appropriate the fund exclusively to the payment of their receipts. The bank, by stipulation, is made a party defendant, has answered the bill, and also filed a cross bill, alleging that it has, to the extent of its claim, a prior right to payment out of the fund in court.

Both suits were heard together in the district court upon proofs taken.

The complainant, Rahilly, and other owners, on whose behalf he sues, held receipts in the following form:

Not good unless Countersigned by Warehouseman.

LAKE CITY, Minn . . . . 1869.

Warehouse of George Atkinson & Co.
Received in store, of P. H. Rahilly . . . . bush. No . . Wheat.

(Signed) GEO. ATKINSON & Co.,

. . . . . Per Atkinson.

The receipts issued by Atkinson & Kellogg, were similar, with the addition of the words "subject to warehouse charges and advances," and an omission of the words "in store."

Digitized by Google

The proofs show that Atkinson & Kellogg were the owners of an elevator in Lake City, constructed in the usual manner, for the purpose of receiving, storing and discharging grain—the elevating machinery being propelled by steam. There are several similar buildings in the same city, and the proofs show that business in them is conducted in the same general manner. The wheat is brought in by the farmers and is either purchased and paid for at the time by the proprietors of the elevators, or received by them and receipts issued therefor, like the one above copied.

Wheat is classified or graded into what is termed No. 1, No. 2, and rejected. Wheat when received in either mode, is tested, graded, and put into a common bin, each grade being kept distinct, but all of the same grade is mingled together, and this is the invariable practice and known to be so. The warehousemen do not keep the identical wheat on hand for which receipts are issued, but sell and ship at their pleasure: at least, the evidence shows that this is the general practice. The receipts specify no time for the delivery of the wheat to the depositor, but the usage or custom is that the holder may select his own time for presenting them, and demand either the market price of the grain on that day, or the quantity and quality of grain called for in the receipt. It is expected that the ticket-holder will give the warehousemen who issued it the first privilege of buying, if he will pay as much as the holder can obtain elsewhere. In the event the holder sells to the warehouseman, the latter receives no storage, unless the grain has been carried over the winter; but if he demands grain, or if he sells the receipt to others, who demand grain instead of the market price or value, then the practice is to charge storage. The evidence shows that it seldom happens that the depositor demands grain, but almost invariably elects to take the money, that is the highest market rate of the grade of grain mentioned in the receipt on the day when he closes the transaction and surrenders the instrument. The warehouseman often makes advances on these receipts, charging interest.

The bankrupts, in addition to receiving wheat of farmers and issuing storage tickets as above, also purchased wheat for themselves under an arrangement with Eames & Co., of St. Paul, whereby the latter were to allow them a commission or compensation for their services, of two cents per bushel. Wheat thus purchased was paid for by the bankrupt's own checks on local banks, and the bankrupts reimbursed themselves by drafts drawn from time to time on Eames & Co., on account of wheat shipped to them. All wheat thus purchased was graded and put into its proper bin, mingled with wheat for which receipts or tickets were issued; and when shipments were made, the grain was taken from the amount in the elevator building. As wheat was being constantly received and constantly shipped, the amount in the elevator fluctuated from week to week. In the summer of 1870, before the new crop of that year came in, the bankrupts' elevator was entirely cleared of grain, although many of their receipts, issued in 1869, were then outstanding.

The storage capacity of the bankrupts' warehouse was about 60,000 bushels, although the amount of wheat which was received, handled and discharged therefrom in a year largely exceeded this amount.

When they failed they had on hand 21,500 bushels of wheat, of which about 18,000 had been purchased within a week previous to the failure and mixed with grain then in the building. To pay for this 18,000 bushels, the bankrupts drew checks on their local bankers, Williamson & Co., and between the 15th and 17th of November, 1870, drew in favor of these bankers three drafts on Eames & Co. for $10,000, which were dishonored and returned to Williamson & Co., who demanded warehouse receipts as security, and on the 23d day of November, when it was known that the bankrupts had stopped business, and were in failing circumstances, the bankrupts issued two warehouse receipts for $12,000, which afterwards came into the hands of the First National Bank at St. Paul, as collateral security, with full notice of all circumstances.

The district court held that this transaction was an attempt on the part of Williamson & Co. to obtain from the bankrupts an illegal preference, contrary to the bankrupt act, and that the St. Paul bank was affected with notice thereof, and it accordingly dismissed the cross-bill of the last named bank, but decreed that the ordinary receipt holders were entitled to the grain on hand at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed. From the decree dismissing the cross-bill, the St. Paul bank appeals, and from the decree on the original bill, the assignee in bankruptcy appeals.

E. C. Palmer & James Gilfillan, for the assignee; George L. Otis, for the first National Bank of St. Paul; Bigelow, Flandrau & Clark, for the complainant, Rahilly.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The proofs satisfy me that the invariable and known course of business at the elevator warehouses in Lake City, was to mingle together all grain of the same grade, whether purchased outright and paid for at the time, or received on tickets specifying the grade and quantity, and which contemplate the future delivery of the like amount of the same grade of wheat to the holders of such receipts when they should call for it, or the payment in money of the value of that amount and quality of grain. Those who deposited wheat must be taken to know, and in fact did know, that it would be thus mingled with other grain; that it would be shipped and sold by the warehousemen, when the latter should deem it to be for their interests (for such was the uniform practice) and consequently if the depositor should demand wheat instead of the value of the wheat, he would not receive, unless by accident, any of the identical wheat deposited, nor any of the immediate mass into which it went. As wheat was being daily received and constantly shipped, the amount on hand fluctuated from time to time. In July, 1870, there was not a bushel of wheat in the elevator building, although many receipts for the crop of the previous year, or years, were outstanding. The proofs show that it was very unusual to deliver wheat to the depositor, as he almost always chose to take the value of the amount and quality called for in the receipt at the date when he desired to surrender it and close the transaction.

Under these circumstances the question is, what is the relation which exists between the grain depositor and the warehouseman? Is the depositor a bailor, simply, and the warehouseman a bailee, or is the former a seller, and the latter a purchaser, of the wheat? The district court held the former theory, and that the holders of outstanding receipts were entitled to the grain in the warehouse at the time of the failure of the bankrupts, and that as the amount therein did not equal the amount called for in the outstanding receipts, they must share pro rata. This view proceeds upon the ground that the title in the grain deposited, does not pass to the warehouseman, but remains in the depositor, and that the latter has the title at all times to an amount of wheat in the warehouse equal to that called for in his receipt; and it is contended that if sales are made by the warehouseman, this is a conversion of the depositor's property, and if other like property is placed in the warehouse, the law will imply that it is placed there in substitution for that which was wrongfully removed, and hence that the grain at any time on hand belongs to the depositors to the extent of their receipts of tickets. It seems to me that this view cannot be maintained, and that it would lead to difficulties and confusion, and that it is against the established legal principles by which sales and bailments are discriminated. If this view is sound and the warehouse should burn without the fault of the owner, this would be a defence to any demand on the part of the ticket holder either for the wheat or its value—a proposition which cannot, I think, be maintained, and which is against the precise point adjudged in several well-considered cases, (Chase v. Washburn, 1

Digitized by Google

Ohio St. 244, 1853; The South Australian Ins. Co. v. Randall, Law Rep. 3 Privy Council Appeals, 101, 1869.)

Viewed in the light of the uniform course of business, the contract is not one of bailment proper, but one (mutuum) where the property passes to the mutuary or receiver, and is delivered to him for his own use or consumption, and where he is not bound to return the identical article in its original or altered shape, but property of the same kind and value; in which case it is a sale, and the title passes, and the receiver becomes a debtor for the stipulated return. (Jones on Bailments, 64, 102; Story on Bailments, sec. 439; 2 Kent's Com. 590.)

That this is a correct view of the relations between the wheat depositors and the bankrupts is expressly adjudged in the following cases which, in their facts, are identical with the one under consideration. (South Australian Ins. Co. v. Randall, supra; Chase v. Washburn, supra, Lonergan v. Stewart, 55 Ill., 44, 1870; Johnson v. Brown, infra. See Myers v. Adams, 8 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 214; Stearns & Raymond 26 Wis. 74.)

Applying the principle above mentioned, the privy council in the case of the South Australian Insurance Co., in an elaborate judgment, decided, where corn was deposited by farmers with a miller to be "stored," and used as part of the current or consumable stock or capital of the miller's business, and was by him mixed with other corn deposited for a like purpose, subject to the right of the farmers to claim at any time, an equal quantity of corn of the like quality, without reference to any specific bulk from which it is to be taken, or in lieu thereof, the market price on any equal quantity, on the day on which he made his demand, with a small charge for general purposes; that the transaction was a sale by the farmer to the miller of the corn deposited, and not a bailment. In giving their lordship's judgment, Sir Joseph Napier says: "It appears to their lordships that there is no sound distinction, in principle, between this, and the case of money deposited with a banker on a deposit receipt; * * * that it is not the case of a possession given (by the farmer) subject to a trust, but that it is the case of property transferred for value, at the time of delivery, upon special terms of settlement. Law Rep. 3 Privy Council Appeals 109, 113.

And so the supreme court of Iowa, in a case yet unreported, (Johnson v. Brown, Oct. 1873,) has also held. In the case just cited, wheat was left in an elevator with the understanding that when the depositor should be ready to sell it, the proprietor of the elevator would give the highest market price or the same amount of wheat of like grade and quality — the custom being to ship off grain, but to keep on hand sufficient to fill outstanding storage receipts, but not the identical wheat received — and it was adjudged that the transaction was a sale and not a bailment.

I regard the case at bar distinguishable from Young v. Miles, 20 Wis. 615, 23 Wis. 643; and Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 330; and like cases where the bulk from which the mingled articles were to be taken was specific and not subject to constant fluctuations.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the court erred in holding that the receipt owners had the right to the wheat in the warehouse as against the assignee, and its decree in this respect is reversed, and a decree will be entered here dismissing the bill.

I may add, that I am entirely satisfied, in view of the mode of conducting business at the grain elevators, as shown in the testimony, that the foregoing is a sound view of the relation between the grain depositor and the proprietor of the elevator, and that legislation to protect the former against the insolvency of the latter, would appear to be called for.

In respect to the claim of the bank upon the two wheat receipts for 12,000 bushels, made by the bankrupts after their failure to secure $10,000 to their local bankers, I concur so fully in the views of Judge NELSON that I do not deem it essential to do more than refer to his opinion. The decree of the district court, dismissing the cross-bill of the bank is affirmed. The cause will be remanded to the district court with directions to tax the costs in that court equitably as between the receipt holders and the bank. The costs on this appeal will be borne equally between the same parties.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—In Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244, the receipt of the warehouseman, was: "Milan, O., Nov. 5, 1847. Rec'd in store from J. C. W. thirty bushels of wheat. H. Chase & Co." The evidence aliunde showing that the wheat was received with an understanding that the warehouseman might dispose of it, and that, upon demand, he would return other grain, or pay for that deposited, the transaction was adjudged a sale and not a bailment, and therefore it was no defence to the warehouseman that his warehouse was destroyed by fire at a time when it contained wheat enough to answer all his outstanding receipts.

So, in the case of the South Australian Ins. Co. v. Randell, Law Rep. 3 Priv. Council App. 101, 6 Moore P. C. N. S. 341, as in the case to which this note is subjoined, the receipts issued to the farmers by the miller were "to store," and under the circumstances stated in the foregoing opinion, the transaction was considered to be a sale.

In 6 Am. Law Review, 450, the reader will find a valuable article entitled "Grain Elevators: the title to Grain in Public Warehouses." The case of Chase v. Washburn is there printed in full, and is selected "as presenting the ablest exposition of the opposite opinion" to that which the annotator there maintains to be the true doctrine. In that note is cited, perhaps, every reported case on the subject of the title to grain in elevators which had been decided down to April, 1872. The substance of that note will be found condensed in Holmes' edition of Kent's Commentaries. 2 Kent Com. 12th ed. 590.

The case of Rahilly, supra, is one where there was an understanding implied from the known and invariable course of business, that the warehouseman might mingle the specific wheat deposited with other wheat of like quality, and dispose of it at his pleasure, with the further understanding that on demand, he would pay the depositor the highest market price, or deliver the same amount of grain of a like quality, but not the identical grain deposited, nor grain from any specific mass. We have found no adjudged case which holds such a transaction to be a bailment, but there are several directly to the point that it is a sale. Such a case is obviously distinguishable from that of a specific deposit which is not to be changed by the warehouseman, but retained by him until called for by the depositor. This is a bailment. And the case is distinguishable, also, from those where specified amounts of grain of different owners is mixed by consent in specific mass, without any understanding that the warehouseman might dispose of the grain so deposited and mingled. And it may be different from the case where the proprietor of the elevator is a mere warehouseman and where his course of business is, and his duty is, always to keep on hand in the elevator sufficient grain to meet all outstanding receipts, though not the particular grain received. We say it may be different from such a case, but it is doubtful whether it is so. See Johnson v. Brown, Iowa Sup. Ct., 1873. But where it is known by the depositor that the warehouseman is himself buying and selling grain on his own account, and also receiving grain "in store," and that he intermingles all that is so obtained, and is constantly buying, receiving and selling, so that the mass is continually fluctuating, and there is no fixed time when the receipts are to be presented, it seems impossible to consider the holders of the outstanding receipts as tenants in common of the whole mass of wheat in the elevator in proportion to the amount of their receipts. And such a case seems to be the same in principle as an ordinary general deposit of money in bank; it creates simply the relation of debtor and creditor; and so the Privy Council in the case of the Australian Ins. Co., above cited, considered it.

The very recent case of Butterfield v. Lathrop, 71 Pa. St. 225, goes upon the same principle. Here, Baxter and numerous other farmers delivered milk to a cheese factory; each was credited with the amount of his milk, and all was manufactured together; the company sold all the cheese; each farmer was charged with the expense, and received his share of the proceeds in proportion to the milk furnished; Baxter's interest in the cheese, etc., was sold under an execution against him. Held, that the sale by the factory converted his interest into a money demand, and this interest was, therefore, not the subject of a levy. The arrangement at the factory did not constitute the farmers partners nor tenants in common in the cheese; nor was there an agency or bailment as to the particular milk delivered. It was a sale of milk to be paid for in a certain time and manner.

On the general subject see and compare Cushing v. Breed, 14 Allen, 376 Warren v. Milliken, 57 Maine, 97; Dale v. Olmstead, 36 Ill. 150; 2 Kent Com., 12th ed., 590, and cases cited in Mr. Holmes' note.

—A COMPULSORY EDUCATIONAL BILL has passed the lower house of the Illinois legislature.

Digitized by Google

Bankrupt Act—Lien Created by State Law—Deposits by Savings Banks in other Banks.

In re STUYVESANT BANK.

District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Before BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

Bankrupt Act--State Law creating Priority.--A state law which allows a savings bank to make, under certain restrictions, deposits in another bank, and provides that in case the bank receiving such deposits becomes insolvent, its directors shall, after providing for the payment of its circulating notes, apply its assets to the payment of such deposits, does not create a lien, nor is a lien created simply by the making of such deposits in pursuance of such statute, which is enforceable under the bankrupt act.

In bankruptcy. The facts are stated in the opinion.

T. Hughson, for the New York Savings Bank; D. Noble Renan, for the Sixpenny Savings Bank; F. N. Bangs, for the assignee in bankruptcy.

Extract from the opinion of the court—BLATCHFORD, J.—The second section of the act of the legislature of the state of New York, passed April 15, 1853 (Laws of 1853, chapter 257), provides that it shall be lawful for any savings bank or institution for savings, in the city and county of New York, then chartered, or that might be thereafter chartered, "to make temporary deposits in any bank or banking association to an amount equal to ten per cent. of the actual cash capital stock paid in of such bank or banking association, and to receive interest thereon at such rates, not exceeding that allowed by law, as may be agreed upon; provided that all the deposits in any one bank or banking association shall not exceed in amount twenty per cent. of all the deposits belonging to such savings bank or institution for savings, and that no contract or agreement in relation to said deposits shall be for a longer period." The third section of said act provides that "it shall not be lawful for any such savings bank or institution for savings to make any loans to any bank or banking association exceeding the limits above prescribed, unless such savings bank or institution for savings shall require and receive of such bank, for all sums so deposited exceeding the limits above prescribed, such securities therefor and equal in amount as the comptroller or superintendent of the banking department is now lawfully authorized to receive in exchange for bills or notes for circulation." The fourth section of said act provides that "all the assets of any bank or banking association now or hereafter to be created, that shall become insolvent, shall, after providing for the payment of its circulating notes, be applied by the directors thereof, in the first place, to the payment of any deficiency that may arise on the sales of the securities aforesaid, and thereafter, of any sum or sums of money deposited with such bank or banking association, by any savings bank or institution for savings, within the range of twenty per cent., as provided in the second section of this act." The first section of the act of the legislature of the State of New York, passed April 10, 1858 (Laws of 1858, chapter 136), provides that the temporary deposits which any savings bank or institution for savings in the city and county of New York is authorized to make, by the second section of chapter 257 of the Laws of 1853, shall not exceed in amount twenty per cent. of all the deposits belonging to any such bank or institution for savings, nor shall the deposits of any such bank or institution for savings, in any bank of issue, exceed in the aggregate, at one time, the sum of $100,000.

The Sixpenny Savings Bank of the city of New York, a savings bank in the city and county of New York, chartered by the state of New York as a corporation, has proved against the estate of the bankrupt a claim for the sum of $23,261.06, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the 11th of October, 1871. In its proof of debt it claims that, under the said two acts, it has a valid and just lien on the estate of the bankrupt, and is, in the distribution and division of said estate, entitled to a preference or priority of payment to any creditor of the bankrupt, other than the New York Savings Bank, on the ground that the said moneys were deposited and loaned under the express agreement that the Sixpenny Savings Bank should be entitled to such priority under the said two acts, and that the said two acts entered into and formed a part of the contract under which said deposit or loan was made to the bankrupt.

The New York Savings Bank, a savings bank in the city and county of New York, chartered by the state of New York as a corporation, has proved against the estate of the bankrupt a claim for the sum of $20,020.41, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, from the 12th of October, 1871. In proof of its debt it claims that under the said two acts, and its agreement with the bankrupt thereunder, and in pursuance thereof, prior to the insolvency of the bankrupt or any suspension thereof, it is entitled to have its said claim paid in full out of the assets of the bankrupt, before any payment is made to other creditors not entitled by law to a preference. Assuming that all or some parts of the amounts of these claims fall within the terms of the provisions of the state acts, the question arises whether the priority or preference claimed under the fourth section of the state act of 1853, can be allowed in the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt. It is contended on the part of the savings banks that, by virtue of the agreements made by them with the bankrupt under and within the provisions of the state acts, they acquired a lien on all the assets of the bankrupt, in case of insolvency, and are in the distribution of the proceeds of its assets, entitled to the same preference and priority of payment over its general creditors, to which they would have been entitled if its assets had been distributed under the state laws; that the provision of the fourth section of the state act of 1853, is not an insolvent law; that it contemplates a lien on the present and future assets of the bank; that all liens are made in contemplation of insolvency in the same sense as the lien created by the said fourth section; that the bankruptcy act preserves all liens, both legal and equitable, and all charges or encumbrances, and except in cases of fraud on the act, gives to the assignee in bankruptcy only such rights and interests in the estate of bankrupt as the bankrupt had or could assert; and that the rights acquired by the savings banks under the state act, were rights of property, in the form of contracts, constituting equitable liens, which can be enforced against the estate of the bankrupt in the hands of the bankrupt, in case of insolvency, if there had been no proceedings in bankruptcy.

I have given much consideration to the question involved, especially in view of the fact that, at a prior stage of these proceedings, I indicated an opinion in support of the claims of the savings banks, when the question was submitted to me on written briefs. But an oral re-argument, and a full consideration of the provisions of the bankruptcy act have led me to the conclusion that these claims cannot be allowed. I do not think that these claims can, under the terms of the state act, be properly considered as rights of property, inhering in, or adhering to the property of the bankrupt. The savings banks, it is true, made contracts with the bankrupt, but these contracts were merely contracts for the making of deposits and the paying of interest thereon. No part of the state act gives any lien for such deposits on any assets of the bankrupt. Those assets, consisting in part of the moneys so deposited, could be dealt with and disposed of by the bankrupt, free from any lien, charge or encumbrance thereon arising out of such contracts. No provision of the state act purports to interfere with the disposition of the assets of the bankrupt until insolvency occurs, and then a rule for the application of such assets in the distribution of the estate of the bankrupt as the estate of an insolvent debtor, is created by the fourth section of the state act of 1853. But that rule establishes in favor of the savings banks no such interest in the property of the bankrupt, that such property passes under the bankruptcy act into the hands of the assignee, subject to such interest. * * * The twenty-eighth section of the present act provides that certain claims shall "be entitled to priority or preference and to be paid in full in the following order." Then follow five clauses. The fifth is, "all debts due to any persons who, by the laws of the United States, are or may be entitled to a priority or preference, in like manner as if this act had not been passed." This is limited to priorities or preferences created by the laws of the United States. It does not extend to priorities or preferences created by the laws of a state. Under it the state could have no priority for debts due to it which were not liens or securities, and but for the provision, in the third class of priorities, for such debts due to the state, there could be no priority for such debts. * * * But such priorities or preferences created by state laws in the distribution of insolvents' estates are not liens or securities, or rights or interests in property. If so, they are not saved by the general scope of the bankruptcy act, and they are not recognized by the twenty-eighth section. The claims to priority on the part of the savings banks must be disallowed.

Digitized by Google

Sale—Attachment of Goods in Transitu—Attachment of Interest of Partner or Joint Owner.

ROLFE S. SAUNDERS v. BARTLETT, GOULD & HEATH.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Jackson, Special November Term, 1873.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK,
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN, } Judges.

1. Consignor and Consignee—Attachment.—Where a debtor ships goods to his creditor, agreeing with the latter that he shall receive and sell the goods and apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt, such goods may be attached by another creditor, although they have reached their place of destination, and although the bill of lading may have reached the first creditor, if he has not actually taken possession of the goods. Such a transaction is not a sale, and the title remains in the consignor until actual or constructive possession by the consignee; and the delivery of the bill of lading is not such constructive possession.

Attachment of partnership goods for debt of partner or joint owner.—An attachment in a suit against a partner or joint owner may be levied upon goods belonging to the firm or joint proprietors, and the levying officer is entitled to the possession of the goods as against a third person who claims them.

FREEMAN, J.,—Joyner & Son were indebted to defendants, and agreed, or it was understood, that said Joyner & and Son should ship their bale of cotton in this case to defendants, and when sold, its proceeds should be appropriated by them to the payment of the debt. The cotton, says the bill of exceptions, was shipped to Bartlett, Gould & Heath, as cotton factors, for sale. When the boat on which it was shipped, arrived at the wharf at Memphis, the bill of lading was sent to Bartlett, Gould & Heath, but before anything was done by them to reduce the cotton to possession, it was attached by Saunders, or at his suit, when the factors replevied it in this suit. We take it to be clear, that the consignors were the owners of this property; it was not a sale; and that the factors had no lien, either general or special, on the cotton, without actual or constructive possession. The possession of the bill of lading was not such possession in this case, but only gave the authority to reduce the cotton to possession as consignee. See. 2d. Head, 94. The case of Kinloch v. Craig, 3d Term Rep. 119, cited and approved by Judge WRIGHT in 2d Head., was a much stronger case than the one now under consideration, yet it was held that the rights of consignee had not attached.

The next question presented by counsel is, that the attachment was against Rodney Joyner, Jr., the second member of the firm, and not against the firm, and that, therefore, the sheriff was a trespasser, not having the right to take possession of the property. This question is one of more or less difficulty, as the authorities are contradictory on the subject. Assuming that the owners were partners, it presents the question as to whether the sheriff can levy an attachment against one of the partners, on the property of the firm, and take possession by virtue of such levy. We think it settled in Tennessee, that he may do so in case of an execution, but he can only sell the interest of the partner against whom the process is issued. Haskins v. Everett, 4 Sneed, 531. The same doctrine was laid down in a case of joint ownership in the case of Rains v. McNairy, 4 Hum. 356, Such seems to be the weight of authority in most of the other states of the Union, as well as in England. In fact, it would seem to follow as a matter of necessity, from the principle of allowing the interest of the partner to be sold or taken at all under process against him. See 1st Amer. Lead. Cases, 382-3-4, Ed. 1871. We, therefore, hold that the attachment might properly be levied on the interest of Rodney Joyner, Jr., whether he was partner or joint owner, and the sheriff was properly in possession of the cotton, and that plaintiff below did not have the right to possession as against said officer.

We see no error in the charge. So far as it goes it is correct. It might have been fuller on the questions presented, but no request was made for any additional instructions.

Let the case be REVERSED.

Title to Grain in Public Elevators.

At the instance of several bankers we publish elsewhere in this number the opinion of the United States circuit court for Minnesota, as to the nature of the relation which exists between the depositor of wheat in a public elevator and the proprietor of the building. Such elevators are very numerous, and a large portion of the grain business of the country is transacted in them. It is the practice to issue to the depositor a warehouse receipt, and these receipts are sold and extensively used as collateral security. The nature of warehouse receipts proper is well understood. In cases of bailment, they represent the property bailed, and their transfer passes the title to it. (Gibson v. Stevens, 8 How. 884; McNeil v. Hill, Woolw. C. C. R. 96; Harris v. Bradley, 2 Dillon C. C. R. 284.)

The case of Rahilly presents some different considerations; and is said to have occasioned some surprise to business men who have, perhaps not unnaturally, regarded all grain warehouse receipts as standing upon the same footing.

According to the views propounded in the opinion in Rahilly's case, whether the deposit of grain in a public elevator amounts to a bailment or a sale depends upon the nature of the transaction, to be inferred, in the absence of express agreement, from the usual and known course of business. As business at these elevator warehouses is generally conducted, the transaction, in most instances, assuming the correctness of the decision in Rahilly's case, is a sale, and hence these receipts in such cases represent only the personal responsibility of the warehouseman. If this is so, it would seem that the subject is a fitting one for legislative protection to the grain depositor, by requiring the elevator proprietor to give security to the public for the benefit of his receipt holders, or in some other manner to guard them against loss.

Similar principles would apply to cotton in store. If the specific cotton is to remain in store with no power of sale in the warehouseman, it would be a bailment; but otherwise, a sale. Whoever would have a full understanding of the objections which may be urged against the doctrine of Rahilly's case, should read Judge Nelson's opinion in the same case in the court below, published at the time in the Chicago Legal News, and particularly the article in the American Law Review on Grain Elevators. (Vol. 6, p. 450.)

Digitized by Google

Book Notices.

COMMENTARIES ON AMERICAN LAW. By JAMES KENT. 4 vols. 12th Edition. Edited by O. W. Holmes, Jr., of Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1873. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

We have delayed to notice this edition of Kent until we could find time carefully to examine it. A comparison with preceding editions has satisfied us of its superior accuracy, fullness and value.

It is needless to enlarge upon the unequalled merits of this great and crowning work of the chancellor's life. It will perpetuate his fame to the latest times. In every respect it equals, and in some respects it surpasses, the similar work of the great English commentator. It is a noble monument to the ripe learning, the cultivated literary taste, and the wisdom that came from the long and varied judicial experience, of its illustrious author.

Unless Mr. Justice Story forms an exception, Chancellor Kent has done more than any American lawyer to make the jurisprudence of our country known and respected throughout the civilized world. In natural endowments, Marshall was the equal of either of them, and perhaps their superior, and in his long career on the Supreme Bench of the United States, he rendered services in the settlement of constitutional questions, whose value to the country are incalculable; but his name, unlike that of Story and Kent, while it is a household word in America, is not familiarly known to the lawyers of Great Britain or of Europe. The highest title of Chancellor Kent to lasting veneration, is not in his Commentaries, but in his long and arduous life upon the bench, where, almost unseen by the public eye, he gave to private suitors the benefit of his learning, wisdom, and disciplined judgment. The popular fame of the great chancellor rests however, rather upon these Commentaries than upon his Judgments contained in thirty volumes of Law and Chancery reports.

These Commentaries, it is well known, were written after the chancellor's retirement from the bench by reason of his having reached the constitutional limit then in force as to age. The first volume appeared in 1826. The author lived to correct the sixth edition. Previous to the present, five editions have, from time to time, appeared since the author's death. The present is the twelfth; and it sums up the result of a critical examination of it, to add that it is, in our judgment, the best. Since the author's death, the work has had several editors, and the notes had become cumbrous and frequently confused, and inserted without method.

We approve the plan of the present editor, which adopts the text and notes as Chancellor Kent left the work in the sixth edition, and keeps these strictly and visibly separate from the editorial additions. The great and almost authoritative weight which belongs to the opinions of the author, makes it very desirable that there should be no confusion as to what is his and what is not.

We think, also, the editor did wisely to reject, with but two exceptions, the mass of notes, which accompanied the former editions since the sixth, and to edit the work de novo, as this has enabled him to systematize and harmonize the editorial additions.

It is an arduous and difficult task to perform thoroughly and well the work of editing the four volumes of Kent, covering, as they do, almost the entire field of jurisprudence except criminal law. Since the author's death, a quarter of a century has elapsed, and it is quite needless to remind the reader how great, in the meantime, have been the changes, and how great have been the additions, both by enactment and adjudication, to the body of the law as it then existed. Obviously, the cardinal duty of the editor is to note these changes and additions, so as to make the work exhibit the law as it exists to-day. To do this thoroughly, methodically, without diffuseness, and yet with sufficient fullness, keeping faithfully within the scope of the original work, and not smothering it with the weight of the additions, requires patience, industry, skill, and good judgment. We find evidence of the presence and careful touch of the present editor in almost every page. After an attentive examination of his labors, we readily credit his statement that they have taken more than three years of his time. His editorial management of one of the leading law journals of the country had well prepared him for work of this character. Bearing the weight of an illustrious name, and animated, doubtless, by a noble ambition to justify the expectations it excites, he has given the profession an amount of faithful, carefully considered work that would not be likely to originate in motives any less cogent; which, we trust, will be appreciated, and which, at all events, demonstrates his various learning, capacity and unflagging industry.

We do not deem it necessary to go into much detail to verify the statements we make concerning the thoroughness with which the work has been brought down to date. The reader will find it illustrated, if he will open the first volume which treats of the Law of Nations and of War, and the Jurisprudence, Federal and State, of the United States. All the important decisions which have grown out of the late rebellion are carefully stated and properly arranged.

Two or three examples will suffice to show the manner in which Mr. Holmes has done his work. An important topic at the present time is the law concerning the removal of suits from the courts of a state to those of the United States. When Chancellor Kent wrote, the 12th section of the judiciary act was the only enactment of congress upon the subject, and he refers to but one decision. The present edition (vol. 1, p. 303), in a condensed note cites the very numerous decisions since made, and gives the points they establish. Another example: Chancellor Kent states (vol. 1, p. 410) that "if a marshal of the United States, under an execution in favor of the United States against A., should seize the property of B., the state courts have jurisdiction to protect the person and the property so illegally invaded." The editor is careful to note that the Supreme Court has twice denied this statement to be law, and refers to the many decisions touching the respective jurisdiction and powers of the federal and state tribunals. Another example: in the Lecture on Bailments (vol. 2, p. 590), the editor in a note that displays his industry and power of condensation, and which to a lawyer who should have occasion to investigate the subject, is alone worth the price of the work, discusses the question whether the deposits in grain elevators are bailments or sales, and the nature of purchases of grain therefrom. We had occasion recently to look for the cases upon this subject, and after several days' search, we discovered only a portion of those here cited, and none which are here omitted. Among other improvements, we are indebted to the present editor for subdivisions of the chapters, indicated by full-faced type; for an improved index, and for presenting all the cases cited in one table. No previous edition equals this in the style in which it is published.

Notes and Queries.

MORGANTOWN, KY., January 28th, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL: My object in writing this, is to ask you a question, viz: C. held a policy of insurance, by assignment from H.; but before the assignment was ratified by the company, the house insured was destroyed by fire. C. then placed his policy in the hands of F. as special bailee. F. was sub-agent of the insurance company, and without authority, and against the order of C., surrendered the policy to the company. C. brought an action of replevin against F. to recover the policy.

Can F., as a matter of defence to C.'s action, prove that the policy was worth to C. less than the amount of insurance? or, in other words, can he prove that C. could recover nothing on the policy from the company, and that it was consequently worthless. L. J. S.

ANSWER.—The right to maintain replevin in such cases and what defences may be made to the action, may depend so much upon the local legislation and practice, that we feel scarcely warranted in making a specific answer to our correspondent's inquiry. See in Iowa, Savery v. Hays, 20 Iowa, 25, and cases there cited. As to replevin for public records and papers, see Parish &c. v. Stearns, 21 Pick. 148; School District v. Lord, 44 Maine, 374. Contra, LaGrange v. State Treasurer, 24 Mich. 466. Compare Desmond v. McCarty, 17 Iowa, 525.

GRANT CITY, MO., January 10, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL: If you will, you may explain how homesteads of widows and children become a vested fee in the widow when the children attain their majority, subject to be disposed of by her in such a way as to defeat their reversionary interest. I am placed in this dilemma by Kelly in his Chapter on Homesteads, Probate Guide, pages 361 and 362, while section 1 and 2, chap. 130, G. S., seem to me to conflict with his opinion. W. J. G.

ANSWER.—There appear to be no decisions in this state illustrating the question; and professional opinion here (at Saint Louis) is somewhat divided as to the construction of the 5th section of our homestead law. By some, it is regarded substantially as a statute of descents, vesting in the widow the fee or whatever estate the husband had, subject to an incumbrance, namely, the right of the children so long as they remain in their minority, to an occupancy in common with the widow. According to this theory, upon the youngest child becoming of age, the fee (or whatever estate the husband possessed) becomes an absolute estate in the widow, which she may alienate at pleasure, and which, upon her death, descends to her heirs and not to the heirs of the husband. Upon the happening of this event, if this view be the correct one, the estate becomes by operation of the statute, a vested fee in the widow, subject to be disposed of by her so as to defeat the reversionary interest of the children, in precisely the same way as any other heir takes the estate of his or her ancestor by virtue of the statute of descents. In other words, in this view of the statute, the wife is simply the heir of the husband in respect of the homestead property, subject to the incumbrance before mentioned.

Digitized by Google

But is this the correct view? Other members of our bar (and some of our judges) are of opinion that the statute is not a statute of descents, but a statute of exemptions merely; that its object and policy are simply to prevent creditors from sweeping away the homestead and pauperizing the family, and that when this object is attained, the whole force of the statute is discharged. According to this view, the wife, upon the death of the husband, takes a possessory interest merely in the homestead property, which she holds during her life, subject to the right of common user of the children during their minority; she may not alienate it during the minority of the children, so as to deprive them of this right of common user, nor after their majority, so as to defeat their reversionary interest; and upon her death, it passes under the general statute of descents, to the heirs of the husband. In opposition to the view that the widow takes the fee, it is urged that upon the death of the widow without issue, the estate would pass to her collateral relatives—an injustice to children which the husband may have had by a former marriage, which the legislature never could have intended. And it is hence urged, that when the law has succeeded in securing a homestead to the widow and minor children, not subject to be taken for the debts of the husband, the boundaries of the legislative intent are reached; and that it is a perversion of the statute to go beyond those boundaries and interpret it as changing the general statute of descents, altering the rights of widow and children inter se thereunder, and perhaps disinheriting the children of the husband in favor of distant relatives of the wife.

Without expressing any definite views of our own upon the question, we would say that our homestead law, G. S. ch. III.; 1 W. S., ch. 68, is copied from the Vermont, act, of 1855, (Gen. Statutes Vt. ed. of 1863, p. 456). It would follow that, until it is expounded by our own supreme court, we should naturally look to the decisions of that state for its exposition. The 5th section of the Vermont statute is the same as our 5th section, with one or two slight verbal alterations which do not change the meaning; and the understanding of the supreme court of that state appears to be that it passes the fee, (or the full estate which the husband had,) to the widow, subject to the right of user in common with her, by the children during their minority. See Doane v. Heirs of Doane, 33 Vt. 649, 652; Day v. Adams, 42 Vt. 510, 516. See also 1 Washburn on Real Property, 352, where Prof. Washburn describes the interest of the wife, under the Vermont statute as follows: "The homestead belongs to her in fee, vesting upon the death of the husband, and on her death descends to her heirs." The late case of Day v. Adams, 42 Vt. 510, is, however, thought by some to support a different view.

Notes of Recent Tennessee Decisions.

IN THE SUPREME COURT AT JACKSON.

[Courtesy of Hon. J. O. Pierce of Memphis.]

Bonds of State and County Tax Collector.—The bonds were taken by the county commissioners, who have been since held to be usurpers of office. Though all the acts of the county commissioners were nullities, if it appear that the bonds were given for purposes which make it the interest of the state to accept them, acceptance will be presumed. State v. McLean, October Term, 1873.

Chancery Practice.—It is not the effect of consolidating causes, without more, to make the testimony taken in one cause apply as well to the other. Lofland v. Coward, October Term, 1873. See Parties—Relief.

Confederate Money.—Under pleas of nil debet and payment, the plaintiff need not account for the value of Confederate money received by him under duress, because there was no contract. Wilkins v. Fransioli, October Term, 1873.

Where an agency was revoked by the breaking out of the war, but the acts of the agent were subsequently ratified, the principal must account for the value, as scaled, of Confederate money received by the agent. Bruce v. Houghton, October Term, 1873.

Execution.—Property levied on by, and for which a delivery bond is taken, is in custodia legis until the forfeiture of the bond. James v. Kennedy, April Term, 1872; James v. Kennedy, April Term, 1873.

Fraud.—Gross inadequacy of price in a sale, is evidence of fraud, as affecting rights of creditors. Hartsfield v. Simmons, April Term, 1873.

———. If the bill alleges facts which constitute fraud, it is not necessary that they be so characterized. Moore v. Shepherd, October Term, 1873.

———. If one seeks to rescind a contract for fraud, he must give notice in a reasonable time after discovering the fraud, and if after knowledge he by act or by silence indicate an acquiescence, he cannot ask rescission. Gilbert v. Hunnewell, October Term, 1873.

Judgment.—see Nul tiel record.

Jury.—Want of instructions to, which are not demanded, is not error, if the charge as given reflects carefully and without obscurity the principles applicable to the case. Plunkett v. Robbins, October Term, 1873. See Verdict.

Justice of Peace—has no jurisdiction over $50—in a suit against a steamboat under the lien law. Goodloe v. Str. Lloyd, October Term, 1873.

———. Is not punishable for profanity by dismissal from office unless especially indicted therefor as a J. P. Carpenter v. State, Oct. Term, 1873.

Municipal Corporation.—A return of nulla bona on an execution against, is not alone sufficient cause for a mandamus to levy a tax. Kimbro v. Memphis, October Term, 1873.

Nul tiel record.—On plea of, in a suit on a foreign judgment, the court may try the question, whether the foreign court had jurisdiction of defendant's person. Barrett v. Oppenheimer, October Term, 1873.

Parties, in chancery.—A purchaser pendente lite being in any event bound by the result of the suit, he is not a necessary party, and the court is not bound to admit him as a party. Amer. Exch. Bank v. Andrews, October Term, 1873.

Partnership.—On an issue between the firm and third persons, as to the existence of the firm, while the articles alone are not evidence in its favor, (see 14 Wall. 570), they are still competent, when extrinsic evidence shows they were made on the day they bear date. Plunkett v. Robbins, Oct. Term, 1873.

———. In a suit against, on notes given by one partner in firm name, after dissolution, (plaintiffs having knowledge of the dissolution), in renewal of notes accrued before dissolution, the other parteners pleading non est factum, he is held discharged from the original consideration by the acceptance of the new notes, and discharged on the first notes because they were not sued. Farnsworth v. Wade, Oct. Term, 1873.

Relief.—Under a prayer for general, relief may be granted different from that specifically prayed for, if not inconsistent with case made by the bill. James v. Kennedy, April Term, 1873.

Rescission.—See Fraud.

Return.—Of Sheriff, upon an execution, may be attacked in chancery, for fraud or mistake. (Acc. 11 Hum. 526.) James v. Kennedy, April Term, 1872.

Taxes.—Though the assessment of, was unconstitutional, yet, as they were paid by the tax payers without protest, and are now in the hands of the tax-collector, he must refund to the state and county, and the remedy by motion exists. State v. McLean, October Term, 1873.

[CONTINUED IN OUR NEXT.]

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass'te Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

Bankrupt Act—Corporation—Deed of Trust Executed by Officers Without Authority—Ratification, Effect of.

The last number of the National Bankruptcy Register (vol. 9, p. 76) contains an interesting opinion from J. K. CRAVENS, Esq., register in bankruptcy for the western district of Missouri, in which he rules the following propositions:

1. Where an officer of a corporation, without authority, executed a deed of trust upon its property, as security for the payment of a negotiable instrument, more than four months prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and no ratification takes place until within four months of the commencement of proceedings, the deed will be held to have been executed at date of ratification.

2. An act done in the name of another, but without previous authority, does not become his act until ratified, and then only by the fiction of relation; and the act of ratification, to relate, must take place at a time, and under circumstances, when the ratifier may himself lawfully do the act which he ratifies. He must be able at the time to make the contract to which by his ratification he gives validity. By ratification he cannot acquire nor confer rights resulting from a transaction, unless in a position to enter directly upon a similar transaction.

3. Where security for the payment of negotiable paper is taken in violation of the bankrupt law, and the paper is transferred by endorsement before maturity, for value, to an innocent taker, the security may be defeated when asserted by the indorsee the same as if asserted by the original holder. But as the indorsee only takes the security as an incident to the debt, and does not exact it from the insolvent, he may prove his claim without prejudice, while the security will be rejected. [As to this last proposition see, however, Carpenter v. Longan, 16 Wall. 271; Kennicott v. Supervisors, Ib. 452, where the reverse is held.] We hope to find space hereafter for the full text of Mr. Register CRAVEN'S opinion, which was evidently prepared with care.

Writ of Error: When Served—Supersedeas Bond—Act of Congress of June 1, 1872, Section 11, Construed.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Western Union Tel. Co. v. Eyser, recently decided, has construed the practice act of congress, of June 1, 1872, sec. 11, as to the time and manner of superseding judgments, pending proceedings on writ of error or appeal. That section is as follows:

"That any party or person desiring to have any judgment, decree or order, of any district or circuit court, reviewed on writ of error or appeal, and to stay proceedings thereon during the pendency of such writ of error or appeal, may give the security required by law therefor, within sixty days after the rendition of such judgment, decree or order, or afterward, with the permission of a justice or judge of the said appellate court."

It will be recollected that the 23d section of the judiciary act of 1789 declares "that a writ of error as aforesaid shall be a supersedeas and stay of execution in cases only where the writ of error is served by a copy thereof being lodged for the adverse party in the clerk's office where the judgment remains, within ten days, Sundays exclusive, after rendering the judgment or passing the decree complained of."

The position was taken that since the act of June 1, 1872, sec. 11, supra, it was still necessary to serve a copy of the writ of error within ten days from the rendition of the judgment. But after referring to the above enactments, to the 2d section of the act of 1803, (placing appeals upon the footing of writs of error,) and to rule 29 of the Supreme Court, that court holds that the writ of error, under the act of June 1, 1872, sec. 11, which is remedial, and, therefore, to be liberally construed, may be "served at any time before or simultaneously with the filing of the bond." Discussing the point thus ruled, Mr. Justice SWAYNE says: "It is expressly declared that the supersedeas bond may be executed within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment, and later, with the permission of the designated judge. It is not said when the writ of error shall be served. Its issuance must, of course, precede the execution of the bond; and, as the judge who signs the citation is still required to take the bond, we think it is sufficiently implied that it may be served at any time before or simultaneously with the filing of the bond. Indeed, the giving of the bond alone is made the condition of the stay. The section is silent as to the writ. A construction which requires the service to be still within ten days from the rendering of the judgment is, we think, too narrow. It is sustained by no sufficient reason, and would largely defeat the salutary purposes of the statute. The execution, approval, and filing of the bond are substantial. The filing of the writ is matter of form. Form, under the circumstances, must not be allowed to defeat substance, where the consequences would be of so serious a character."

Bankrupt Proceedings against Corporations—Authority of Counsel.

In Leiter v. Payson, assignee of the Republic Fire Ins. Co. (6 Chicago Legal News, 157), DRUMMOND, circuit judge, decides, construing the bankrupt act, and particularly section 37, that when a petition in bankruptcy is filed against a corporation, it is not necessary that the authority to employ counsel, and the authority of counsel to file an answer confessing the acts of bankruptcy, should be previously sanctioned by a vote of the stockholders; and an adjudication upon a confession in an answer filed by counsel, where there was no question as to their employment or as to their good faith, was sustained.

In the course of his opinion, Judge DRUMMOND observes:

"It might be said, with as much reason, that where a corporation is made an involuntary party, indirectly or collaterally, in a bankruptcy proceeding, counsel could not appear to represent it, unless expressly authorized by a vote of the corporators or shareholders. And that would hardly be contended. It is conceded by petitioners here, that, if the proceedings had gone on in the usual way—if there had been a default and adjudication in bankruptcy rendered, or an appearance by counsel and a hearing or trial, and verdict and a decision of the court making an adjudication—a vote of the corporators would be immaterial, but it is denied that the rule applies to the case of appearance and of a cognovit made by counsel. The necessity for resorting to a vote of the corporators would not seem to exist, in as great degree, in one case as in the other. The corporation, in this case, was not a volunteer. It was compelled to come into court, and plead in conformity with the rules of the court. As it could appear by counsel without a vote of the corporators, there was nothing to prevent counsel, when warranted in so doing by the regular agents of the corporation, from admitting the acts of bankruptcy stated in the petition, provided, upon a proper examination, they were satisfied that the allegations were true, and that a trial or hearing would involve unnecessary expense and delay, and be no advantage to the corporation itself or its creditors. There is no question made as to authority having been given counsel by the proper officers of the corporation, nor of the good faith of either, nor of their having acted upon the subject matter after proper enquiry. All these points must be assumed in favor of the acts of counsel and of the officers of the corporation. The question is, then, simply as to the authority of the corporation to act through counsel in the manner pursued here, and the case would hardly seem to be one calling very stringently for the exercise of the power of interference of the district or of this court."

Digitized by Google

Illinois Warehouse Law—Legislative Control over Storage Rates.

We publish elsewhere the full text of the opinions of the judges of the supreme court of Illinois on the warehouse law of that state, passed April 25, 1871, entitled "An act to regulate public warehouses, and the warehousing and inspection of grain, and to give effect to Art. 13 of the new constitution of the state." The nature of this article of the constitution appears in the separate opinion of WALKER, J., who rests his judgment, concurring with the majority, wholly upon it. It will be seen that the judges, with the exception of McALLISTER and SCOTT, JJ., sustain the constitutional validity of the enactment.

This opinion is one of unusual interest, in two respects. First, as a determination of the immediate question involved, viz: the extent of legislative control over the compensation of grain-warehousemen in the state of Illinois; and second, because of its real or supposed bearing upon the right of the legislature to regulate the compensation of those who conduct other employments which affect the public weal, such as railway companies.

The act in question treats the grain warehouses of Chicago as public warehouses, though owned by private persons, and established and conducted without any charter or special franchise, and fixes the maximum rate of compensation to be received by the proprietors, and prohibits them, under severe penalties, from contracting with customers for any higher rates. It requires the proprietors of the warehouses also to obtain a license to carry on the business, and to give bond with sureties, for compliance with all of the requirements of the law. Munn & Scott, who were the proprietors of a grain warehouse, and had been for many years before the act of July 1, 1871, continued after the passage of that act to carry on their business without obtaining the required license; and, therefore, they were convicted in the lower court and sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and costs. They sought to reverse this judgment on the ground that the act was in conflict with certain provisions of both the federal and state constitutions; and the question of its constitutional validity was the only one decided by the court.

The majority of the court place their decision upon the ground, not of any special power conferred upon the legislature by Art. 13 of the state constitution, but upon the broad ground that the interests involved in the legislation concerning grain warehouses are public, such as intimately concern the general welfare, and therefore are within the rightful domain of legislative power unless withdrawn by some express constitutional provision. To sustain an act of the legislature, if possible, is the acknowledged duty of the judicial tribunals; and in this view, the majority of the court treat the act as intended to prevent the evils which come from a combination between the railroad companies and elevator proprietors, to the detriment of the producers and shippers of grain, who are said to be "under a kind of moral duress" to use these warehouses, and as intended, also, to prevent unreasonable and oppressive charges for such use.

The decision authoritatively establishes for the state of Illinois, that such legislation does not "deprive" warehousemen "of their property without due process of law"; that it does not "take or damage private property for public use without just compensation," and also, that it is not repugnant to any other provision of the state constitution.

Although it may not follow from the judgment of the court, that the legislature, on the assumption that the majority view is sound, would have the extensive powers supposed by Judge McALLISTER in his dissenting opinion, yet the logic or principle of the decision is that the legislative control over property is such that whenever it is necessary for the protection of the public interests, the prices which may be charged for the use of such property, or for services of a given character, which the public are under a sort of necessity to have, may be regulated or fixed by the legislature, and that the power of individuals in such cases to fix their own terms or rates, is not unlimited. It is only in this aspect that the decision bears upon the power of state legislatures to control railway tariffs.

If a railway company has the right to fix its own rates for freights and fares under its charter, operating as a legislative contract to this effect, it is obvious that this decision does not affect the right of such a company. Whether a railway company has such a right under the doctrine of the Dartmouth College case, is a subject we do not propose now to discuss, and to which we made allusion, in some of its aspects, in a previous number. But if there is no such right given or existing in the nature of a legislative contract, which is inviolable by state legislation, then the course of the reasoning of the supreme court of Illinois on the subject of compensation to public warehousemen, seems to be applicable to compensation to railway companies, except so far as this may be affected by the exclusive power of congress over all that relates to inter-state commerce and the agents and instrumentalities by which it is conducted.

Digitized by Google

Validity of the Illinois Warehouse Law.

MUNN & SCOTT v. THE PEOPLE.

Supreme Court of Illinois, February 3, 1874.

Hon. SIDNEY BREESE, Chief Justice.
" PINKNEY H. WALKER,
" BENJAMIN R. SHELDON,
" JOHN M. SCOTT,
" W. K. MCALLISTER,
" A. M. CRAIG,
" JOHN SCHOLFIELD,
} Judges.

1. Constitutional Law—Illinois Warehouse Law.—The Illinois act "to regulate public warehouses and the warehousing and inspection of grain, and to give effect to article 13 of the constitution of the state," approved April 25, 1871, is a valid and constitutional enactment.

2. Fourteenth Amendment.—The said statute is not repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution.

3. ——. Special Laws—Exclusive Privileges.—Nor is it repugnant to the inhibition in the constitution of Illinois against "local or special laws granting to any corporation, association or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity or franchise whatever."

4. ——. Bill of Rights—"Due Process of Law."—Nor does the legislative regulation of warehouses in the manner prescribed by said act involve a deprivation of "life, liberty or property without due process of law," contrary to the Illinois bill of rights, art. 2, clause 2.

5. ——. ——. Future Profits not Property.—Future profits in a business already established are not property; and a law which abridges such profits for the protection of the public does not destroy property, and is not unconstitutional.

6. ——. ——. Kindred subjects, Mills, Ferries, etc.—And held arguendo, that the act in question falls in the same category with laws regulating public ferries, public mills, the weight and price of bread, and the interest upon money.

7. ——. ——. Taking Private Property for Public Use.—Nor is the statute in question obnoxious to clause 13 of art. 2 of the constitution of Illinois, which provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

8. ——. ——. Inherent Powers of Government.—The power exercised by the legislature in the passage of this law, belongs inherently in every government, and the legislature may exercise it without the aid of any constitutional grant.

9. ——. ——. The Power Conferred by the Constitution.—WALKER, J., concurring, considered that in view of the fact that the power to pass the statute in question is expressly conferred by the constitution of the state, the correct result was reached by the majority of the court, but declined to express any opinion as to the inherent power of the state legislature to pass such a law.

10. ——. ——. Dissenting Opinions.—MCALLISTER, J., dissenting (with whom SCOTT, J., concurred), was of opinion that the act in question is an infringement of the right to acquire and enjoy property; that it is, hence, an invasion of vested rights; that it involves an exercise of the power of suppression or destruction of private property—a power which has no limit as to the degree of its exercise but the discretion of the legislature; and that it is an invasion, under pretence of police regulation, of the power of the federal government to regulate inter-state commerce.

BREESE, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a proceeding by information in the Criminal Court of Cook County, on behalf of the People against Ira Y. Munn and George L. Scott, for a violation of the 3d and 4th sections of an act of the General Assembly of this State, entitled "An act to regulate public warehouses and the warehousing and inspection of grain, and to give effect to article 13 of the constitution of the state," approved April 25, 1871. The information was filed by the state's attorney at the July term, 1872. A motion to quash having been overruled, the defendants pleaded not guilty, waived a trial by jury, and submitted the case to the court. The court found the defendants guilty, and, overruling a motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, assessed against them a fine of $100 and the costs. To reverse this judgment the defendants bring the record here by writ of error, assigning various errors, one of which raises the question of the constitutionality of the act under which the proceedings were had, and is the only important question in the case.

This is the second argument of the cause. On the first argument, at the last term, the court, after much deliberation, were unable to reach a satisfactory conclusion. In the meantime the court had undergone a change by the election of two new members, and it was deemed expedient and proper that they should take part in the decision; and, to enable them to participate, a reargument was directed, and the questions have again been fully, elaborately, and ably discussed. A case of so much importance demanded, and has received, our most careful consideration, and we are prepared to state the conclusions which a majority of the court has reached. We do not deem it necessary to take up seriatim and discuss the various propositions presented by counsel, or go over the field of argument they have so fully explored; but, in what we shall say, it will be found they have all been considered.

Plaintiffs in error insist the statute in question is repugnant to the provisions of our constitution found in the bill of rights, as clause 2 of article 2: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law;" and to this other provision in clause 13 of the same article: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." One of the counsel for appellants makes these points in addition: The act is repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States; and further, if its provisions can be construed as an inhibition of the warehousing business, except under special conditions, and as conferring the privilege of doing that kind of business upon persons able or willing to comply and actually complying with these conditions, then, in so far as it is not based on article 13 of the state constitution, it is repugnant to sec. 22 of article 4, which prohibits the general assembly from passing any local or special laws "granting to any corporation, association, or individual, any special or exclusive privileges or immunity whatever." We will consider these propositions first, as they appear to be thrown into the controversy as mere make-weights,—the real merits resting in the two first.

As to the repugnancy of the warehouse act to the 1st clause of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, a slight consideration of that amendment and judicial decisions upon it will be sufficient to satisfy any one, itt has no application to this case. That amendment is as follows: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, or subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law." It is well known the amendment in question was incorporated into the federal constitution to shield a certain class, who had been born and reared in slavery, from pernicious legislation, by which their newly-acquired rights by their emancipation might be so crippled as to render them wholly worthless. In the discussions upon the effect of this amendment, in the slaughter-house cases from New Orleans, and the case of Myra Bradwell, plaintiff in error, taken up from this court, it was not intimated by the Supreme Court of the United States that a regulation by a state legislature of a permit or profession, as a regulation of the use of property, abridged in any manner the liberty of the citizen, white or black.

Upon the other proposition, we cannot perceive that the statute can receive the construction contended for. The section relied on is in these words: "The general assembly shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say." Then follows a large number of specified subjects, the last of which is this: "Granting to any corporation, association, or individual, any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever." The inhibition extends only to passing special laws for such purpose. But the law in question is general in its objects, operative throughout the state, and confers no immunity, or special or exclusive privilege or franchise, upon any individual, association, or corporation. It deals with an existing business, closely associated with the great agricultural interests of the state, and seeks to regulate it by laws. This is the whole scope of the act.

Digitized by Google

But the important question remains as presented on the first two points made by appellants, and argued with great ability. Does the act in question deprive the owners or managers of this warehouse of their property, in the sense of the constitution? If it does, it is void, and must be so declared. This view of appellants seems to be based, in a great degree, on the fact that they had constructed their warehouse and established the business long anterior to the enactment of this law. It was established while there was free trade in the business, and their charges were subject to regulation only by competition and agreement, and they now claim a right to continue such use without legislative restraint. They further say they have complied with all the provisions of the act, except the one requiring them to take out a license and enter into bond. The argument is, by this legislative interference they are deprived of the use of their property, and, so depriving them of its free and untrammeled use, they are deprived of their property in the sense of this clause of the Bill of Rights. Much ingenious argument has been employed to establish this proposition, and the case of Wynehamer v. The People, 3 Kiernan, N. Y., 378, cited as 13 N. Y., invoked in support, and greatly relied on. We have looked into that case, and find that the court were divided in opinion, and that the judges who held the act unconstitutional were led to that conclusion because, by the terms of the act itself, the property in intoxicating liquors was substantially destroyed, and thus the owner deprived of his property by mere legislative will. They say if the act by its terms had been applicable only to liquors imported or manufactured after it took effect, it would not have been in conflict with the constitutional provision declaring that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The question before the court was, "Did the prohibitions and penalties of the act pass the boundaries of trade-regulation and police, and, by their own force, work the essential loss or destruction of the property at which it was aimed?" The laws in question subjected the liquors to seizure and physical destruction; and, as they were, in every sense of the term, property, and so recognized by law, the owner was, by mere legislation, deprived of his property. It was held that, by the operation of this law, the commercial value of the liquor was annihilated; that it could not be sold; that it was unlawful to keep it; that all legal protection was withdrawn from it, and that it had become a public nuisance. These provisions and results, it was held, swept the liquors from the commerce of the state, and thus annihilated the quality of sale which made them valuable to the owner. This, it was held, was destructive of the notion of property.

It was further said, when a law annihilates the value of property, and strips it of those attributes by which alone it is distinguished as property, the owner is deprived of it, according to the plainest interpretation, and certainly within the spirit of a constitutional provision intended to shield private rights from the exercise of arbitrary power.

This case is much relied on by one of the counsel for appellant, and a labored effort made to bring this within its scope. But the distinction is so obvious that "he who runs may read." Had the act in question sought to deprive warehousemen of any of their antecedent acquisitions, or deprive them of the use of their establishments, or confiscate them, as was the case with the New York liquor law, there would be some appositeness and analogy.

Nothing of the kind has been done or attempted; and it is not even complained by the plaintiffs in error that, by compliance with these sections of the law, they would not receive a fair remuneration on their capital invested, and a reasonable recompense for all their labor and responsibility. In the case relied on, the majority admitted the legislature could regulate trade in property of all kinds, but they could not totally annihilate commerce in any species of property, and so condemn the property itself to extinction. It was on this latter ground that the law was held invalid. What analogy, we ask, is there in these cases? Does the act of our general assembly destroy any species of property, or deprive its owners of the use of it? It does not aim at the extinction of these warehouses, or any of their attributes. The statute may affect them injuriously in a degree, but it does not say they shall not be allowed to exist at all. The constitutional provision is: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, property," and so forth. This clause, so taken, declares that, in the exercise of the admitted functions of government, private property may not receive remote and consequent injury. No person can claim that, in the exercise of the proper functions of government, his property shall not be diminished in value. The point is, the owner shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law. If, in the exercise of any admitted functions of government, a person's property is rendered less valuable, can it be seriously claimed this provision in the bill of rights has been infringed?

Government in this State is reposed in three departments, composed of separate bodies of magistracy. The whole legislative power is vested by the constitution in the general assembly, composed of two houses—the members of each to have certain qualifications, and to be elected by the people. Every subject within the domain of legislation, within the scope of civil government, not withdrawn from it by the constitution of the state or of the United States, can be dealt with by that body by general laws to affect the whole state and all the people within it. That body is emphatically the guardian of the public interests and welfare, and would be derelict in its duty did it fail to exercise all its powers to their promotion and protection. That body is the sole judge of such measures as may advance the interests of the people. Coming, as its members do, directly from the people, and of them, they know the course of trade, the manner in which the great internal commerce of the state is conducted, and by what instrumentalities, and how by them the producing and other interests of the state are affected. These, it must be conceded, are all fit subjects for legislative consideration, and independent of any constitutional provision; and they would have an undoubted right, knowing that a large proportion of our cereals, to reach the markets of the world, were compelled to pass through certain warehouses called elevators, and subjected to such charges as their owners might see fit to impose, to take up this whole subject as one legitimately within their domain; and if, in their examination of it, they find the owners and managers of these warehouses are an organized body of monopolists, possessing sufficient strength, in their combination and by their connection with the railroads of the state, to impose their own terms upon the producers and shippers of these cereals, to the great detriment of the latter, who are under a kind of moral duress in sending to them, can it be said to be an usurpation of power on the part of the legislature to bring them in subjection to law, so to regulate their conduct and charges by law as to prevent oppression and extortion? Can there be a more legitimate subject for the action of a legislative body? We think not. Shall it be said an interest so vast as this is does not deserve governmental care, and is not a proper subject of some kind of governmental control? And if, in the means provided by the legislature to that end, some reduction in their monthly or annual receipts may be the result, can it be said the owners are thereby deprived of their property? In the case so much relied on, supra, it was admitted it was not sufficient; the law might impair the value of the property in even so great a degree as that, and yet destroy no rights. It does not deprive the owner of any right of property. All regulations of trade with a view to the public interests may more or less impair the value of property, but they do not come within the constitutional inhibition unless they virtually take away and destroy those rights in which property consists. Their destruction must be, for all substantial purposes, total. By the law under consideration, no right of property is taken away or destroyed.

Digitized by Google

All the property the owners ever possessed in this business remains to them untouched by the strong hand of legislative power. The law must be held to be one potent effort on the part of the legislature to arrest a great and growing evil, by regulating the charges which these warehouses shall demand, and placing them under bonds that they will not violate its provisions.

Great stress is laid on the fact that this warehouse was erected in 1862, long anterior to the passage of the laws, and by this kind of legislation the alternative is presented, either to abandon the use of the property for which it was fitted, or to do business for less compensation than its owners had theretofore and always received. In another part of their argument they say that they, by consent of their customers, have received, during the past year, higher rates of storage than those specified in the act; and so, in this respect, the act is a plain, palpable violation of the clause of the constitution relied on; that depriving them of the value of the use is depriving them of their property. This argument is answered by what we have already said.

It is idle to talk about the consent of their customers to higher rates of charges than this law allows a man to receive. Their customers, before this law was enacted, had no protection against those monopolists; they had no consent to give; they were obliged to have their grain taken to these warehouses, and be subjected to such charges as the organized combination, shutting out competition, might choose to demand. The producer and shipper had no alternative but submission; they were completely in the power of this combination, and it did not fail to demand and enact the highest charges. It is this state of things the law is designed to remedy. One of the first and most imperative duties of the law-making power is to enact all necessary laws to remedy existing evils, taking care, in so doing, not to transgress any constitutional limitation. The means by which to do so most effectually is in the discretion of the legislature, keeping in view the provisions of the organic law. This law in no respect affects the title, possession, or use of this warehouse, by the plaintiff in error. It deprives them of nothing they owned or possessed at the time of its enactment. Anticipated profits are not, and cannot be, held and regarded as property in the ownership and possession of him who owns the article out of which profits are expected to flow. The property is one thing and remains untouched; the profits are not in esse, and cannot be claimed as property. When it is said one is deprived of his property, the understanding is, it has been taken away from him—he is divested of title and possession. This provision in the bill of rights has never been so construed by the courts of any state whose constitution has such a provision as to deny to the legislature the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting use and enjoyment of property. Ever since the organization of our state government the legislature has exercised this power unquestioned. Familiar instances are found in regulating public ferries and public mills. and affixing the compensation in the shape of toll. Another is in delegating power to municipal bodies to regulate the charges of hackmen and draymen, and the weight and price of bread; but, in a property the most largely sought after by all classes of the community, and deemed the most valuable of any, as it controls all others, the legislative power of every state in the Union has been brought to bear upon it, and no court has ever questioned the right so to do. We allude to the interest laws—laws declaring at what rate a man may loan his money. The argument used here, it seems to us, would pronounce these laws unconstitutional; for they do regulate the use of a man's property; they do fix a value upon its uses; and as all observation shows, in most localities, greatly below its market-value. It may be answered, such has been the policy of states, and such legislation has been so universal and continuous as to have familiarized the people to it, and who have adapted their business to its requirements. But here they say, "we were in this business when it was free and unrestricted, and this new policy abridges our gains. It was rightful," they say, "to engage in this business, and so to employ our capital that we may make the largest gains out of it." The interest on money loaned is by law six per cent., with the right to contract for ten per cent., and such has been the law for a long series of years. Under the cover of that law, capitalists have engaged in loaning money at those rates. Some, on the strength of it, have erected costly buildings of granite and marble in which to transact their vast business, surrounded by a corps of clerks and other officials, to whom high salaries are paid.

Will any one deny, after this banker has completed his structure and arranged everything in profitable working order, that the general assembly may declare by law that, after the passage of the law, the legal rate of interest shall be four per cent., and it shall be extortion to contract for more than six per cent., and a violation of the law, to be punishable by fine and imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court? Would the money-lender have any right to complain? Would his appeal to this clause in the bill of rights be listened to for a moment? Would any court in Christendom condemn such an enactment as unwarranted by the fundamental law? The use of money is a matter of the greatest public concern, and that it may be regulated by law has never been authoritatively denied. Kindred subjects, such as public warehouses, public mills, the weight and price of bread, and public ferries, are so connected with the public welfare that a government destitute of the power to regulate them, to impose such restrictions upon them as may be deemed necessary to promote the greatest good of the greatest number, would be but the shadow of a government, whose blazonry might well be a "cap and bells" and a pointless spear.

We have not remarked upon article 13, under which this law is supposed to have its efficiency, for the reason we hold the law as effectual for all the purposes contemplated by it, and as valid without as with this article. The article itself seems out of place in an organic law; but the convention, however incongruous it may appear, had undoubtedly the right to put it there. That body could not withstand the appeals that went up to them from the producers and shippers of the great and indispensable wants of man, and forming the most valuable portion of our staple productions, to provide some remedy against the aggression and extortions to which they were subjected by this organized combination of monopolists, already such a formidable power, with but one heart, and that palpitating for excessive gains. We place the right to legislate on this subject upon that power, call it by what name you will, inherent in every organized civil government. Every sovereign power possesses inherently unlimited legislative power when the organic law imposes no restraints. The power to legislate on all subjects affecting the great interests of the whole community must be conceded to exist, and it will not cease to exist until civil government shall be resolved into its original elements. We have nothing to do with the policy of this enactment. That was a question exclusively within the jurisdiction of the general assembly, which under no circumstances has the judicial department a right to question or arraign.

We think what we have said disposes of the other point made by plaintiffs in error, arraigning the law as violative of sec. 13 of art. 2. There is no taking or damaging private property here, and devoting it to public ure. It is an expression of the will of the people, through their representatives in the general assembly, that these instruments of oppression and extortion shall be brought into subjection, to the great relief of the people. We are of opinion the law is a valid, constitutional enactment; and so believing, affirm the judgment of the criminal court.

WALKER, J.—The constitution authorizes the general assembly to pass laws for the inspection of grain, for the protection of producers, shippers, and receivers of grain and produce, and to prescribe by law such other and further remedies as may be found expedient—not to deprive any person of existing common law remedies—to regulate warehouses. This, I think, confers ample power to enact the law under consideration. I, however, express no opinion as to such power independent of these constitutional provisions. I, therefore, concur with the majority of the court in the decision announced.

Digitized by Google

McALLISTER, J., dissenting.—In 1862, Munn & Scott, the plaintiffs in error, having leased premises, as a mere private enterprise, erected thereon the warehouse described in the information, in which to store grain for hire. They then commenced the business of warehousemen, which was continued down to the commencement of this prosecution for carrying it on without a license from the circuit court of Cook county so to do. It is not disputed that, for the nine years they carried on the business before July 1, 1871, when the act in question went into force, they held title to the premises and exercised their employment in accordance with the law of the land; and it is not pretended that they did so under any grant of the legislature in the nature of a franchise or privilege. Their property was private property; their business was wholly a private enterprise; and their rights in both were necessarily the rights of private property. These propositions cannot be successfully controverted.

On account of the views expressed by my brethren, and the conclusions arrived at, it becomes necessary to examine the questions involved in this case upon elementary grounds. All consideration of a franchise being excluded from the case, the examination, so far as it relates to the nature of their rights, may be regarded as precisely the same as those by which any individual may base a claim of private rights and constitutional protection. The natural rights of individuals are antecedent to and exist independently of the constitution. It is the office of the latter to secure, not to create or bestow them. Therefore, the extent of constitutional protection can only be determined by a correct definition of the rights it was intended to secure. For that purpose I shall rely upon one authority alone, as none can question it.

Chancellor Kent says: "The absolute rights of individuals may be resolved into the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty and the right to acquire and enjoy property. These rights have been justly considered and frequently declared by the people of this country to be natural, inherent, and inalienable." 1 Kent's Com. (Comstock's Ed.), 587. Again, on the same page he says: "Right itself, in civil society, is that which any man is entitled to have or to do, or to require from others, within the limits prescribed by law."

Then plaintiffs in error, it must be conceded, had a natural, inherent right to acquire the leasehold estate, to erect the warehouse upon it, and employ the same in the business of storing grain for reasonable reward or hire; and, when the act in question went into force, that right was a vested one.

As was said by CHASE, J., in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dallas, 394: "When I say that a right is vested in a citizen, I mean that he has the power to do certain actions, or to possess certain things, according to the law of the land." And again: "If any one has a right to property, such right is a perfect and exclusive right." It is to secure these rights that governments are instituted. I cannot stop to give even a brief account of the development or the definition of the natural rights of individuals as recognized by the common law long before the American Revolution, or how the words of Magna Charta became fundamental in all our state governments, and incorporated into the constitution of the United States. I am considering a question now solely under the constitution of this state—the very first section of which, after enumerating the rights of personal security and personal liberty, declares: "To secure these rights and the protection of property, governments are instituted among men," etc. Then the next section embodies the great fundamental declaration of Magna Charta, that "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Here, it will be perceived, are three subjects, each expressed by a single word respectively answering to and covering the three absolute natural rights, viz: the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property. It will be further perceived that the right of property is placed upon the same footing as the rights of personal security and liberty; and why, in point of reason and philosophy, should not this be so? It must be admitted that the sense of property is deeply implanted in human nature—is inherent in man; and, if we are to infer a purpose from results, this sense must have been bestowed for the purpose of rousing mankind from sloth and stimulating them to activity, and has, in fact, had far greater influence in founding civil government upon correct principles than any other motive or perception of the human mind. In the elegant and comprehensive language of Kent, "The natural and active sense of property pervades the foundations of social improvement. It leads to the cultivation of the earth, the institution of government, the establishment of justice, the acquisition of the comforts of life, the growth of the useful arts, the spirit of commerce, the productions of taste, the erections of charity, and the display of the benevolent affections."

Such being the beneficent influence of the natural sense of property in forming and animating all the institutions of a true civilization, the right to its gratification, within the limits of law, was regarded as an absolute, natural, inherent right by the founders of the common law; is included in the fundamental doctrines of the Declaration of Independence as among the inalienable rights of man, and there denominated as the right to the pursuit of happiness; and, in the bill of rights in American governments, it is placed upon an equality with the great natural rights of personal security and personal liberty.

It seems to me palpable that the views of the majority of the court narrow this right below its proper measure. They hold that, if their private property is not taken, if the title to it is not disturbed by the act in question, then these parties cannot be considered as being thereby deprived of their property, within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition. This seems to me an erroneous view.

The bill of rights, as I have said, does not create or bestow these natural rights, and has no reference to remedies between man and man, but was intended for the protection of the citizen as against the agencies of the government itself; and that protection was intended to be as broad as the rights protected. The right under consideration is not only to acquire, but to enjoy, property. Our government is one of the people, and its functions subject to disturbance by popular excitements, by which one class of men, with certain particular interests and prejudices, either political or otherwise, may come into power, displace all against whom these prejudices run, and oppose them with unfriendly legislation. Suppose the displaced class to be those engaged in agriculture, then laws are passed to cripple the interests of those engaged in it. The price of laborers or employes is fixed at a high rate, and maximum prices for all products at low rates. By-and-by this oppressed class come into power, and they retaliate by singling out the large cities; they prescribe the rates of insurance, a standard for rents, prescribe a schedule of charges for commission-merchants, hotel-keepers, proprietors of newspapers, and, above all, maximum low prices for all implements to be used by the dominant class. Now, in none of these instances would property itself be taken, or the title to it disturbed; but can there be any doubt that by the principles of the bill of rights all such legislation would be unconstitutional and void? It was for the prevention of such things that constitutions are adopted. "When the government," says Cooley, "through its established agencies, interferes with the title of one's property, or the independent enjoyment of it, and its act is called in question as not in accordance with the law of the land, we are to test its validity by those principles of civil liberty and constitutional defence which have been established in our system, and not by any rules that pertain to forms of procedure merely." Cooley's Const. Lim. 356.

Digitized by Google

Having given this exposition of the nature and extent of the right of property which the bill of rights was intended to secure against the agencies of the government, let us see whether such right was unconstitutionally invaded by the act in question. Before proceeding to that enquiry, it is proper to state that there is no question arising which has any reference to the power of eminent domain or taxation. The act singles out from all the establishments of the state of a similar character the grain warehouses of Chicago. It arbitrarily fixes the maximum rates of hire or reward to be received by the proprietors, and forbids them from contracting with customers for any higher rate. It then prohibits, under severe penalties, their continuance, unless they shall first apply for and obtain a license to carry it on from the circuit court of the county in the manner prescribed, and enter into bond, with sureties, conditioned for a full and unreserved compliance with all laws of the state respecting their business, including, of course, that fixing the minimum rate of hire or reward; for breach of which the license may be revoked, the business made criminal and stopped, and themselves and sureties liable on their bonds. As was justly said by Mr. Justice JOHNSON, of the Supreme Court of the United States: "Licensing acts, in fact, in legislation, are universally restraining acts; as, for example, acts licensing gaming-houses, retailers of spirituous liquors, etc." Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 232.

The proposition is, it seems to me, too plain for argument, that the nature of the power over the business of warehousemen of grain in the city of Chicago, here assumed by the state, is one of suppression—of destruction. For, if the legislature can fix the rate of compensation, then make it criminal to prosecute the business unless they shall obtain a license to carry it on, and give the bond required to submit to the rate so fixed, then the power is limited only by the pleasure of the state, and it may fix the rate so low that the business cannot possibly be continued under it, and is therefore suppressed—destroyed. This is purely a question of power. "Questions of power," says Chief Justice MARSHALL, "do not depend on the degree to which it may be exercised. If it may be exercised at all, it must be exercised at the will of those in whose hands it is placed." Brown v. State of Maryland, 12 Wheat. 439. This principle was illustrated in the case of McCulloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, where it was not claimed that the particular tax levied by the state upon the United States Bank would destroy, or even embarrass, that institution. But the validity of the act was assailed wholly upon the nature of the power involved in it; and the central idea of Chief Justice MARSHALL'S opinion was, that a power to tax was a power to tax limited only by the pleasure of the state, and that it was, therefore, a power to destroy. So here, the power to fix the maximum rates of compensation, and make the continuance of the business criminal unless the parties will submit to such rates, procure license, and give the bond—a power whose exercise is limited only by the pleasure of the state as to what that rate shall be—is necessarily a power to destroy a business which had been carried on for nine years according to the law of the land, and in which these parties had vested a right. I insist that they could not be deprived of their rights except by due process of law. The legislature had no more power to accomplish the destruction of such business, and deprive them of their property by such indirect modes, than by a distinct fiat to require the sheriff of the county to burn their warehouses. The majority of the court seem to place their conclusion in part upon the ground that those parties exercised a public employment, and were, therefore, subject to the police power of the state. We had occasion, in The Town of Lakeview v. Rosehill Cemetery, Sept. 7, 1873, to examine somewhat into the nature of that power when resorted to as a color for subverting private rights of property; and there held that it could not be invoked to sustain legislation which invaded private right, where the police-power was but a mere color for such invasion. But these parties did not exercise a public employment. Such was not the character given to their business by the common law. In Coggs v. Bernard, the leading case on the subject of bailments, Chief Justice HOLT, in his celebrated judgment, says: "As to the fifth sort of bailments, viz: a delivery to carry or otherwise manage for a reward to be paid to the bailer, those cases are of two sorts: either a delivery to one that exercises a public employment, or a delivery to a private person. First, if it be to a person of the first sort, and he is to have a reward, he is bound to answer at all events, and this is the case of the common carrier, master of a ship, etc." This degree of liability, viz: to answer at all events, attaches by the common law in this country only to common carriers and innkeepers. It does not attach to warehousemen.

Hence we find that Mr. Justice STORY, in classifying bailments, locatio custodiæ, or deposits for hire, puts agisters of cattle, warehousemen, and wharfingers together as those whose obligations would fall under the same rule. Story on Bailments (8th ed.) sec. 442. Warehousemen are bound to take common and reasonable care of the commodities intrusted to their charge. Ibid, sec. 444. While common carriers and innkeepers are usurers because they exercise a public employment. Their business was, therefore, simply that of warehousemen. Such was the character given to it by the common law, and in which they had vested rights for nine years anterior to this act. This being so, it was not within the power of the state government, by any declaration, either through a constitutional amendment or the legislature, to change the character of such business so as to subject it to legislative control in the nature of a power of suppression. Because a convention is assembled to amend the constitution, no individual is thereby subject to be deprived of vested rights. The great fundamental principles of a republican form of government continue in force during such conventions, and are not superseded by an amendment of the constitution. Besides, the constitution as amended by the introduction of the article concerning warehouses in no wise contemplated or authorized the assertion of the power of suppression.

But there is another view, in which it is clear the legislature transcended its power by this act. The Chicago River, running west from its connection with Lake Michigan about a quarter of a mile, and then dividing into two branches, one north and the other south, running through the city, forms the port of Chicago. The warehouse in question, and probably all others at which this statute was aimed, are situated upon this port, and constitute the direct and indispensable accessories to commence in grain upon the Great Lakes, between that port and other states. And the question arises: Can these accessories to such commerce be suppressed by the state government? The states have ceded, by express grant in the federal constitution, to the government thereby organized, the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states." The power, therefore, to regulate inter-state commerce is gone from the several states, and vested exclusively in congress, especially after it has been exercised by the latter. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1; Steamboat Co. v. Livingston, 3 Cow., 743; Thurber v. The People, 13 Ill., 535; 5 Howard, 573.

The power to regulate commerce upon the Great Lakes has long since been exercised by congress. If their grain warehouses be in fact, as doubtless they are, the direct and indispensable accessories to commerce in grain upon the lakes, and between the port of Chicago and ports in other states, will it be said that this state can exert a power over them whose very nature is that of suppression—of destruction?

Can the state, by her legislative authority, suppress all commerce in grain upon the lakes between Chicago and the Eastern

Digitized by Google

States, when not necessary to the preservation of the morals, health, or safety of the community? If not, then how can it restrain and destroy the very means by which alone that commerce may be carried on with the conveniences suitable to the activity of the age? This power in congress to regulate commerce among the several states is contained in the same grant as that to regulate it with foreign nations, and is placed upon identically the same footing. Now, suppose the legislature of New York should pass an act like this, designed and directed against all warehouses in the city of New York, engaged in receiving, storing, and discharging all commodities, whether imports or exports, brought within the channels of said commerce. These warehouses, it must be conceded, are as directly employed in that commerce, and as indispensable to it, as the vessels upon which it is borne from port to port. The act, it will be perceived, operates directly upon the entire business of warehousemen. The component parts of that business are various transactions in which the carrier and the merchants engaged in such commerce, as well as the warehousemen, are directly interested. So far, therefore, as it operates upon the business, it must upon all these various transactions forming its component parts, and it prescribes rules by which they must be governed or cease altogether. This could be nothing more nor less than an attempt to regulate foreign commerce, as a direct exercise of such power without reference to any police-power. The act was not necessary to the preservation of the health, the morals, or the safety of the community, which are the true purposes of the police-power; but its purpose was to compel the warehousemen to conduct their business upon a compensation prescribed by the state. As was said by Mr. Justice McLEAN, in 3 Howard, 592: "Under the pretence of a police regulation, a state cannot counteract the commercial power of congress." It seems to me the cases are parallel and the act void.

SCOTT, J.—I do not concur in the reasoning or conclusion reached by the majority of the court.

Practice—Appeal Bonds—Liability of Sureties—Bankrupt Law.

HUGH B. MARTIN v. GEO. E. KILBOURN.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Jackson, Special November Term, 1873.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY, }
" ROBERT MCFARLAND, }
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" JOHNL. T. SNEED, }
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN, }

Discharge in Bankruptcy—Liability of Sureties in Appeal Bonds.—Where judgment is rendered by a justice of the peace on a note, and the defendant appeals, and gives an appeal bond conditioned that the defendant will "prosecute his appeal with effect, otherwise comply with and perform the judgment of the court;" and in the circuit court the defendant pleads a discharge in bankruptcy, upon which judgment is rendered in his favor, it is error to render judgment against the surety in the appeal bond for the amount of the justice's judgment with costs.

Opinion of the court by NICHOLSON, CH. J.—Kilbourn obtained a judgment on a note of hand against John R. Allen, before a justice of the peace, for $99. Allen appealed to the circuit court of Shelby county and executed appeal bond with Hugh B. Martin as his surety. The condition of the bond was that Allen should prosecute his appeal with effect; otherwise comply with and perform the judgment of the court. In the circuit court Allen filed his plea of discharge in bankruptcy, which was found in his favor, and judgment in his favor rendered. Thereupon the court rendered judgment against Martin, the surety, for the amount of the judgment of the justice of the peace and costs. Martin appeals to this court.

The contract of Martin was that Allen should prosecute his appeal with effect; if not, that he should perform the judgment of the circuit court. Allen did prosecute his appeal with effect, and obtained a judgment of discharge from the debt. We know of no principle on which judgment could be rendered against the surety, unless there is something in the bankrupt law which controls the case. It is provided by the bankrupt law that no discharge of the bankrupt shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt, either as partner, joint contractor, endorser, security or otherwise. Martin never was liable on the debt with Allen, in any character. The appeal vacated the judgment, and Martin was only liable in the event judgment should be rendered against Allen in the circuit court. This was not done. On the contrary, Allen prosecuted his appeal with effect, and Martin was no longer liable on his bond. Able v. Payne, 7 Bush, 344.

JUDGMENT REVERSED.

NOTE.—The Kentucky case above cited, holds that sureties in attachment bonds are released by discharge of their principal in bankruptcy before judgment rendered against him. 7 Bush, 344.

Resulting Trust—McGlory v. McGlory.

We are indebted to Hon. S. J. Thomas, of Boston, for another interesting decision of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, which we take pleasure in laying before our readers:

Bill in equity, brought by William McGlory and others to establish a resulting trust in their favor as heirs at-law of James McGlory, deceased, in five undivided twelfth parts of a parcel of real estate in Boston, against Margaret McGlory, the devisee of said estate under the will of John McGlory, deceased. The case was reported by WELLS, J. In 1848, James McGlory executed a deed of one undivided half part of said estate to his brother John. The consideration expressed in the deed was "one dollar, paid by John McGlory, grocer, trustee of Neil McGlory, and of the love and affection I bear for my brother, the said Neil," do hereby grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said John McGlory, all my right, title and interest in and to that certain parcel of land, etc. At the end of the description, the grantor declared it to be his "intention hereby to convey one undivided half part of the premises to said John McGlory in trust for said Neil McGlory." John owned the other half. The habendum was, to have and to hold the granted premises to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, to his and their use and behoof forever. And there were covenants of warranty of seizin etc., with the said grantee, his heirs and assigns. James and Neil respectively died intestate without issue. Afterward John died, leaving a will in favor of his wife, the defendant. James left six brothers and sisters, his heirs, of whom John was one. The claim was to recover the other five-sixths of the half belonging to James, or five-twelfths of the whole. The case was argued at the November sittings, 1871. The court was divided in opinion. At the request of the present chief justice, the case was re-argued in November last, and especially upon the question whether, as the deed purports to convey the whole estate to the grantee and his heirs and assigns "to his and their use and behoof forever," and contains full covenants of warranty, the grantor or his heirs can be permitted to assert a resulting trust. The following rescreipt has now been sent down: The deed to John McGlory was for the declared purpose of creating a trust for the grantor's brother Neil; but for want of words of inheritance, this trust terminated with Neil's life. The consideration was the grantor's love and affection for Neil, and a nominal payment of one dollar, paid in his behalf. The habendum and the covenants of warranty, etc., do not necessarily give a benficial interest to the grantee, personally, but are to be interpreted as if the words "trustee as aforesaid," or some equivalent expression, followed the word grantee whenever it occurs in the deed. Judgment for plaintiff, with costs. Decree to be drawn up accordingly.

Digitized by Google

Acts of Congress—When they take Effect—Signature of the President.

On the 3d inst., the case of N. D. Carlisle & Son v. Collector Arthur, which had been instituted in the United States circuit court, before Judge NATHANIEL SHIPMAN and a jury, came up for trial. The plaintiffs, as previously reported, are importers in this city, and in that capacity imported a quantity of wool upon which the collector levied a tax of ten cents per pound, and an ad valorem duty of eleven cents, the collector alleging that he was authorized to take this course under the act of congress, of March 2, 1867. The duty thus imposed amounted to $20,000, and was paid under protest by Carlisle & Son, who brought this action against the government to recover back the amount exacted, and claimed that the act of congress under which they were assessed was inapplicable, on the ground that it was not signed by the president until the 4th of March, 1867. The importation was made on the day before the act received the signature of President Johnson. The deposition of ex-President Johnson showed that, though the act appeared to have been signed by him on the 2d of March, 1867, the day of its passage, he did not actually sign it until early in the morning of the 4th of March, 1867, and that he acted thus in pursuance of a custom then prevailing with regard to the signing of bills passed by congress. This deposition was admitted in evidence by the court. Mr. J. H. Choate, when the case came up yesterday, urged on the part of the plaintiffs, that by admitting evidence which showed that President Johnson had not signed the act referred to until the 4th of March, 1867, the court would, in effect, decide that although Presidents were in the habit, when they approved of acts of congress, to date them back to the time when they were passed, the acts did not, according to the constitution, become law until the very day when the President really signed them. Judge SHIPMAN briefly charged the jury and directed them to find a verdict for the plaintiffs. This they accordingly did. The amount of the verdict is $20,000 in gold.—New York Herald.

Street Railways—Obligation of Conductor to Remove Drunken Passengers.

In the suit by Mrs. Putnam, whose husband was killed by Foster with a car hook on a Broadway and Seventh Avenue car, and on which she obtained in the superior court $5,000 damages, which verdict was sustained in general term, the court of appeals, in Albany, has just rendered a decision reversing this judgment. The latter court hold that, however intoxicated a person may be on a car, if he makes no disturbance, and no passenger requests his removal, the conductor is not obliged to put him off the car. In this case Mr. Putnam only requested the conductor to keep Foster quiet, which he did, and for this reason the court of appeals hold that the railway company are not responsible.—N. Y. Herald.

Notes of Recent Tennessee Decisions.

IN THE SUPREME COURT AT JACKSON.

[Courtesy of Hon. J. O. Pierce of Memphis.]

[CONTINUED FROM OUR LAST.]

Verdict.— Resting upon sufficient evidence, for substantial and not merely nominal damages, will not be set aside for error of court in the charge, where it is evident the jury did not proceed upon that ground and were not misled by the charge. Babb v. Dunlap, October Term, 1873.

Vendor's Lien,—Implied, exists and will be upheld in a sale of a leasehold estate. Choat v. Tighe, April Term, 1873.

War.—In a suit on a note, both debtor and creditor continuing to reside in Memphis, but the note itself having been carried south into the Confederate lines, there was no such obstacle to its payment as to relieve the debtor from interest during the war. Gates v. Union Bank, October Term, 1873.

———. The occupation of Memphis by the Federal forces, and the suspension of the courts, suspended the running of the statute of limitations during the war. Apperson v. Harris, October Term, 1873.

———. The Federal commander at Memphis, in 1863, had no authority to establish a "civil commission for the trial of civil suits between citizens," and a judgment by such commission is null and void. Walsh v. Porter, October Term, 1873.

Will—In a will, devising specific legacies to testator's children, to pass to each child when she shall marry or attain lawful age, a condition that any such child marrying within certain prohibitions named, shall forfeit the legacy, is a condition in terrorem only, and does not apply to the marriage of any such child before testator's death, nor impose a forfeiture in such case. Brown v. Severson, October Term, 1873.

Recent Reports.

NORTH CAROLINA REPORTS, VOL. 69. Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of North Carolina, June Term, 1873. By TAZEWELL L. HARGROVE, Attorney General. Judges: RICHARD M. PEARSON, Chief Justice; EDWIN G. READE, WILLIAM B. RODMAN, THOS. SETTLE, NATHANIEL BOYDEN.

Pursuing our purpose of noticing new volumes of American Reports as far as they are issued, we come to the 69th North Carolina Reports, in which we note several interesting decisions, among them the following:

Agent of Lunatic—Surety.—A plaintiff who has endorsed the notes of a self-constituted agent of a lunatic, to enable such agent to raise money ostensibly for the amily of such lunatic, which money was used by the agent in cultivating the farm of the lunatic, can only recover, in a suit against the lunatic upon the notes signed by the agent, so much of his debt as he can show was actually expended for the necessary support of the lunatic, and such of his family as were properly chargeable upon him. Surles v. Pipkin, 513.

Agreement Compromising debt—Confession of Judgment.—If upon confessing judgment in a suit by a bank against one of its debtors, it be agreed and entered upon the docket at the foot of the judgment, that it may be discharged upon the payment of a certain per cent. in United States currency, or the full amount in the notes of the bank, the plaintiff will be bound by the agreement; and an execution issued for the full amount in United States currency more than two years afterwards, may be set aside, and the bankruptcy of the bank will not alter the case. Hardy v. Reynolds, 5.

Agreement, void.—By a creditor to take one-half of his debt in discharge of the whole; and this although the debtor is a surety, and the debt is due by bond. Bryan v. Fay, 45.

Agreement for Protection of Sureties.—Where, upon the purchase of a chattel personal, the purchaser gave his note, with sureties, for the price, and it was agreed by parol between the parties at the time, that the chattel should belong to the sureties until the note was paid—the effect of such agreement was to pass title to the chattel from the seller direct to the sureties, and not from the seller to the purchaser, and then from him to the sureties for their indemnity; for in the latter case it would have been a mortgage which would have been void for want of registration. Worthy v. Cole, 157.

Agreement between Husband and Wife.—That the wife shall receive in personal property, the price for which land belonging to her was sold, and hold the same to her separate use, to enable her to purchase another tract of land with the same, is valid, such price not resting in the husband, jure maritii, so as to be reached by his creditors. Teague v. Downs, 280.

Agreement by Solicitor to discharge defendant—Recognizance.—Parol agreement by state's solicitor to discharge defendant for turning state's evidence, no answer to a forfeited recognizance; because the latter is a matter of record and can only be discharged by something of equal dignity. State v. Moody, 529.

Arbitration and Award.—Where arbitrators undertake to make the case turn upon matters of law, and mistake the law, their award is void. Leach v. Harris, 532.

———. Arbitrators not bound to decide according to law, being "a law unto themselves" but may decide according to their own notions of justice, and without giving any reasons. Ibid.

Digitized by Google

Arson—Limitation of Prosecution.—A person may now be indicted, convicted and punished for burning a mill-house in 1863. State v. King, 419.

Assignee in Bankruptcy.—May sue and be sued in the state courts. Cogdell v. Exum, 464.

Assignment, equitable.—An agreement by a debtor sued, to subject one-half of his assets to the payment of the debt, makes him a trustee pro tanto of the particular creditor, who thereby acquires a lien and preference over other creditors subsequently suing. Perry v. Merchants' Bank of Newbern, 551.

Attorney.—Cannot compromise client's debt, nor receive anything in payment but legal tender, without special authorization. Moye v. Cogdell, 93.

Bankruptcy—Statute of Limitations.—A bankrupt brings suit in his own name, Sept. 19, 1870, an assignee having been previously appointed. March 11, 1872, the assignee is made plaintiff: Held, that the suit is barred by the two years' limitation of the bankrupt law, the statute running from the appointment of the assignee, and not interrupted by the suit by the bankrupt. Cogdell v. Exum, 464.

Bastardy.—Impotence of putative father may be proved as a defence. State v. Broadway, 411.

Bonds, official.—Bond given by treasurer of railroad company, conditioned that he "shall faithfully discharge the duties of the office, and well and correctly behave therein," does not bind him to keep moneys against all hazards; and sureties are not responsible for moneys lost by a sudden failure of a banking house, such moneys having been there deposited by the treasurer when it was in good standing and apparently solvent. Atlantic & N. C. R. R. Co. v. Cowles, 59.

———. By-Laws of Company.—The obligation of the sureties is not affected by the by-laws of the corporation, unless the same are referred to in the bond. Ibid.

Disturbing Congregation.—Singing not indictable, if the singer does not intend to disturb the congregation, but is conscientiously taking part in the services, although he may be a subject for church discipline, on account of his bad singing. ["The effect of it was to make one part of the congregation laugh and the other mad."] State v. Linkhaw, 214.

Confessions.—On a trial for infanticide, it is not competent to prove that the defendant had said that she had had a child this way before and put it away. This would be admitting evidence of a distinct offense. State v. Shuford, 486.

Homestead Laws of North Carolina.—Not unconstitutional. Garrett v. Chesire, 396.

Interest—Promissory Note.—When a note is given with the stipulation that the interest is to be paid annually or semi-annually, the maker is chargeable with interest at the like rate upon each deferred payment of interest, as if he had given a promissory note for the amount of such interest—thus taking a middle course between simple and compound interest. Bledsoe v. Nixon, 89.

Libel—Pleading.—An allegation that the defendant published concerning the plaintiff, in a newspaper, etc., a certain article containing the false and defamatory matter following—setting out the article in full, is sufficient, without alleging that each part of the article was concerning the plaintiff. Carson v. Mills, 122.

———. And see the same case for language apparently libellous, imputing professional misconduct to a lawyer.

Mortgages and deeds of trust—Constitutional Law.—An act providing that "no property shall be sold under any deed of trust or mortgage, until the debts, secured in said deed, are reduced to judgment according to the provisions of this act," impairs the obligations of contracts, and is unconstitutional. Latham v. Whithurst, 33.

Sale of Land for Taxes—Notice—Mortgagee.—The mortgagee being the legal owner of the land mortgaged, is the person to whom notice must be given by the sheriff of a levy and sale of such land for unpaid taxes. Whitehurst v. Gaskill, 449.

Sheriff.—Not liable criminally for levying bona fide on the property of the wrong person. State v. Tatom, 35.

Taxation—Non-residents.—The levying of a tax upon a non-resident which is not levied upon residents, contravenes the constitution of the United States. Sinclair v. State, 47.

———. Bank Deposits.—Money deposited in banks loses its distinct character as money, and becomes a debt due to the depositor from the bank, and as such is a proper subject of taxation. Lilly v. Commissioners, 300.

———. "Solvent Credits."—Taxable as property, although derived to a merchant in the usual course of business. Ibid.

———. United States Circulating Medium.—A state cannot tax U. S. treasury notes. Ruffin v. Commissioners, 498.

———. ———. Otherwise the circulation of the national banks, until congress prohibits such taxation. Ibid; Lilly v. Commissioners, 300.

Title—Adverse Possession.—The operations of building a shed, quarrying rock, and cutting wood for fuel in a lime-kiln, on the land in dispute, continued uninterruptedly for more than seven years, constitutes such a possession as will give a good title to the person claiming adversely under it. Moore v. Thompson, 120.

Vendor and Vendee—Preference of Assignee.—Where land is sold and title retained by the vendor until the payment of the promissory notes given by the vendee to secure the purchase money, and these notes are assigned by the vendor, with the knowledge and consent of the vendee, the assignee will have the right to have the notes paid out of the land in preference to any claim that may have been acquired by other persons subsequently to the time when the sale was made and the notes given. Hadley v. Nash, 162.

We also note several interesting cases involving the construction of wills. The opinions are in general brief—a merit which the judges seem to have successfully studied. The work of the reporter apparently leaves nothing to be desired. His head-notes are exceptionally distinguishable for brevity and clearness of statement. The state printers have not, however, produced the work in becoming style.

WARE'S REPORTS, VOL. 3.—Reports of Cases Determined in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maine and Massachusetts, with some opinions of the District Judge in cases determined in the Circuit Court. By ASHUR WARE, District Judge. Edited by GEO. F. EMERY. Portland: Loring, Short & Harmon.

The publishers' advertisement states that this volume contains the latest opinions of Judge Ware, and is entirely new. It is a sequel to the first and second volumes (the latter originally entitled Davies' Reports) issued in his life-time. The three volumes embrace his judicial labors for more than forty years. The cases embraced in this volume extend from the year 1853 to 1865. The decisions are mostly of cases in admiralty, with a few relating to questions arising under the customs laws. We presume that such questions do not interest many of our readers, and shall not notice these cases further.

Notes and Queries.

SHENANDOAH, IOWA, February 7, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Will a chattel mortgage of a debt, note, judgment or other chose in action, duly recorded, hold good against third parties, to the same extent as of specific personal property?

Yours truly, W. P. F.

ANSWER.—No; unless some statute so declares. A chose in action may be assigned, and if the assignee gives notice of the assignment to the debtor the latter cannot afterwards make a valid payment to the assignor.

SALISBURY, N. C., Feb. 2d, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, page 51, is an interesting article as to the power of a father to surrender his rights over his infant children by contract. I have recently had occasion to investigate this question: Is the widowed mother of an infant child entitled to its earnings? The case was that the infant, aged 18, had worked with another under a contract made with the infant, when the mother, the father being dead, brought an action to recover the value of the infant's labor. I can find no authority directly sanctioning it. If worthy of note please to put it amongst your "notes and queries."

J. M. M.

ANSWER.—A father may ordinarily claim the benefit of his minor children's labor while they live with him and are maintained by him; and he may ordinarily claim the wages of his minor children, unless he has emancipated them, or waived or relinquished the right in their favor. Consult on this point the following authorities: 1 Bla. Com. 453; 2 Kent Com. 193; Jenness v. Emerson, 15 N. H. 486; Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272; Hillsborough v. Deering, 4 N. H. 86; People v. Meroein, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 408; Snediker v. Everingham, 3 Dutch. (N. J.) 143; Prickett v. Prickett, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. E. Green) 478; Dodge v. Favor, 15 Gray, 82; Brown v. Canton, 4 Lansing, 409; Corey v. Corey, 19 Pick. 29; Boobier v. Boobier, 39 Maine, 406; Burlingame v. Burlingame, 7 Cowen, 92; Whiting v. Earle, 3 Pick. 201.

Digitized by Google

Does the mother, on the death of the father, succeed to the same right? In the following cases it is held that she does: Hammond v. Corbett, 50 N. H. 501, where the subject is amply discussed; Matthewson v. Perry, 37 Conn. 435; Simpson v. Buck, 5 Lansing, 337. And in the last case it is held that the fact that the minor contributed to the support of the mother, and was not dependent upon her for his support, does not alter the question of her right to recover his wages. These cases, no doubt, express the modern and more liberal view of the question. The old law, however, appears to have proceeded upon the ground that, whereas, the father must support his minor children in any event, he has an absolute right to their earnings; while the widow, since she is bound to support them only when it is necessary that she should—that is, when they (the minors) have not sufficient property, exclusive of their earnings, to support them, is entitled to their services only in a qualified sense; that is, she is entitled to their services when she supports them. Reeves' Dom. Rel. 283, 290, 291, 295, 319, 324, 343.

And there are cases which take this view of the question. Thus, the understanding of the supreme court of Pennsylvania seems always to have been that a widowed mother has no right at common law to the services of her minor children. Com. v. Murray, 4 Binney, 494, 495; South v. Deniston, 2 Watts, 474; Fairmont & Arch Street Passenger R. R. Co. v. Stutler, 54 Penn. State, 375. And the same doctrine has been intimated in Alabama. Morris v. Low, 4 Stew. & Port. 123.

OBERLIN, January 9, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Whenever any of the states of the northwestern territory had 60,000 inhabitants, they had the liberty to form a permanent constitution, and be admitted to the union on an equal footing with the original states, provided the constitution and government to be formed should be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in those articles of compact. Question: Can the present constitutional convention of Ohio leave out or essentially change the principles of the first five of these articles or of any of them? An answer to this in your valuable journal, if it is in accordance with your plan or purpose, would be gratefully received. J. W. M.

ANSWER.—The ordinance of 1787 provides that the five articles named by our correspondent, as well as the sixth which follows them, "shall be considered as articles of compact between the original states and the people and states in said territory, and forever remain unalterable except by common consent." This ordinance was passed July 13, 1787. Nearly two years later, namely, on the first Wednesday in March, 1789, the constitution of the United States went into operation. Owings v. Speed, 5 Wheat. 420.

Very soon after the adoption of the constitution, an act of congress was passed relating to the northwest territory, which recites in its preamble that in order that the said ordinance "may continue to have full effect, it is requisite that certain provisions should be made, so as to adapt the same to the present constitution of the United States;" and these provisions related to matters of detail, conferring on the president certain powers and duties with reference to this territory, which before belonged to congress. And the validity of the ordinance has been frequently recognized and declared by the subsequent legislation of congress. 1 Statutes at Large, 50; 2 Ibid, 58, 309, 514; 3 Ibid, 289, 399, 428, 770; 5 Ibid, 15. By the act of May 10, 1800, the ordinance was extended to and put in force in the Mississippi territory. The acts in pursuance of which Ohio, Indiana and Illinois were admitted into the union provide respectively that the state government "when framed shall be republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance of July 13, 1787, between the original states and the people and states northwest of the river Ohio." 2 Statutes at Large, 174, § 5; 3 Ibid, 290, § 4; 3 Ibid, 430, § 4. These provisions do not, however, appear in the acts admitting Michigan and Wisconsin. It also appears that the compact was modified by congress so far as it related to the boundaries of the states to be formed out of the northwest territory. On the other hand, in the act providing for the admittance of Indiana into the Union, the provisions of the ordinance are declared to be "irrevocable between the original states and the people and states of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, excepting so much of said articles as relate to the boundaries of the states therein to be formed."

The question propounded by our correspondent, then, is, are the people of the state of Ohio so far sovereign that they can, without federal coercion, in changing their organic law, violate the terms of the compact under which they were thus permitted to come into the Union of the States? As a matter of first impression we should say that they cannot, unless by the "common consent."

Upon examination we find, however, that the Supreme Court of the United States has determined that the ordinance of 1787 was extinguished by the constitution; or, that if any of its provisions have continuing validity, it is not because they are in the ordinance, but because they may have derived authority from some other source, such as compacts of cession or acts of congress under the constitution. Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. 212; Permoli v. New Orleans, 3 How. 589, 610; Strader v. Graham, 10 How. 82, 94. There are a number of other cases bearing upon the question more or less directly: Spooner v. McConnell, 1 McLean, 337; Palmer v. Commissioners, 3 Ibid, 226; Jones v. Van Zandt, 2 Ibid, 611; Lewis v. Baird, 3 Ibid, 56; Astrom v. Hammond, 3 Ibid, 107; Vaughan v. Williams, 3 Ibid, 530; Columbus Ins. Co. v. Peoria Bridge Co., 6 Ibid, 70; Jolly v. Terre Haute Draw Bridge Co., 6 Ibid, 237; Menard v. Aspasia, 5 Peters, 505; Jones v. Van Zandt, 5 How. 230. The decisions of the state courts are conflicting. Two cases in Ohio incline to the view that the ordinance is of perpetual obligation: Hogg v. Zanesville, 5 Ohio, 410; Hutchinson v. Thompson, 9 Ohio, 52. And see, as supporting the same view, Winney v. Whitesides, 1 Mo. 472; Lagrange v. Chouteau, 2 Mo. 19; Rankin v. Lydia, 2 A. K. Marsh, 467. But contra, La Plaisance Bay Harbor Co. v. Monroe, 1 Walker Ch. (Mich.) 155. T.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE amendatory bankrupt bill, as reported by the senate judiciary committee, has, after receiving several amendments, passed that body.

—ARTICLES of impeachment have been presented in the house of representatives against Judge BUSTEED.

—"MISS SALLIE KILGORE, attorney and counsellor at law," is on a sign at Noblesville, Ind. She graduated at the Michigan Law School.—Exchange.

—MR. TREMAIN, of the house judiciary committee, will shortly report a bill to divide the northern district of New York. It provides that the present northern district of New York shall hereafter embrace only the counties of Cayuga, Tomkins and Tioga, and the several counties of the state of New York lying westerly of said counties, and is to be called the "western district." The residue of the state, not included in the eastern and southern districts, is made a new district, and is called the northern district. The change will make one additional appointment. It is believed that the measure will pass.

—JAMES W. GERARD, an octogenarian lawyer, of New York city, died on the 7th instant. His whole life was devoted to the practice of his profession and to private objects and charities. He never filled a public station. In 1868, on the occasion of his retiring from practice, the members of the New York bar gave a banquet in his honor. At the bar meeting on the occasion of his death, some of the most eloquent and feeling tributes were paid to his memory, which the character of any private citizen can evoke. Mr. Evarts is reported to have applied to him the language of the Roman moralist: Not he alone serves the state who presides in the public councils, or administers affairs of peace or war, or brings forward candidates, or manages conventions; but he who either by steady avocation, or by particular devotion, cares for the nurture and education of the people; he who advances public morals and who diffuses just sentiments of which others have greatest need; and he in his private station is all the while filling a public office. In privato publicum negotium agit.

Digitized by Google

—A SINGULAR case of marine insurance has recently been tried in New York. One Leitch, engaged in the Mexican trade, insured through correspondents, mahogany and bullion from Minititlan to this city with the Atlantic Mutual Insurance company. According to the statement of Leitch, the bullion was smuggled out of Mexico, and, for concealment, put under the stone ballast. The ship, becoming water-logged, was abandoned, but was subsequently picked up. The insurance company defended on various grounds, but their main ground was that the whole thing was a fraud. The jury gave a sealed verdict for the plaintiff for $46,000.—N. Y. Herald.

—FROM the following list of cases disposed of by Hon. JOHN ERSKINE in the federal courts for Georgia, we infer that the position of district judge for that state is no sinecure. Disposed of during November term: Equity, 28; common law, 233; criminal, 12; seizure, 4; scire facias, 6; admiralty, 5. Disposed of at September term, 1873, in the northern district of Georgia: Equity, 2; common law, 35; criminal, 101; seizure, 18; scire facias, 30. In bankruptcy, 248 petitions for adjudication have been filed in the southern district alone during the last half year of 1873; in over fifty of these petitions for injunctions have been filed. All of these orders have been taken in chambers, and in many of them arguments have been had involving nice points of law and equity.

—REPRESENTATIVE LAWRENCE'S bill, introduced and referred to the committee on war claims, provides, that for the purpose of providing a tribunal to hear and determine the claims of aliens against the United States for compensation for alleged torts suffered through the acts of persons for whose doings it may be asserted the United States should be held responsible, there shall be established in Washington a court, to be called the court of alien claims, to consist of three judges, with the power to hear and determine all claims on the part of corporations, companies or private individuals, citizens or subjects of any foreign power, upon the United States, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of such citizens or subjects during a period of recognized war between the United States and a belligerent, the sovereign of the claimant.—Washington Chronicle.

—RIGHT HONORABLE BARON COLONSAY, formerly lord justice general and president of the court of session of Scotland, died on the 1st instant, aged eighty years. Duncan McNeill (Lord Colonsay), son of the late John McNeill, Esq., of Colonsay, was born in 1793. He was educated at the universities of St. Andrew's and Edinburgh. He was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1816, and served as one of the junior counsel of the crown from 1820 to 1824; as sheriff of Perthshire; solicitor general for Scotland under Sir Robert Peel's administration, in 1835, and in the same office, and as lord advocate, under Peel's second administration. He was dean of the faculty of advocates from 1843 till he was appointed a judge of session, in 1851. He represented Argyleshire in parliament from 1843 to 1851. His lordship was sworn in a member of the privy council in 1853, and created Baron Colonsay on the 22d of February, 1867.

Singular Case of Identity.

[From the Cleveland Leader.]

Portland, Maine, has just witnessed one of the most singular cases on record, in which the defendant was a woman variously called Catharine Waller, alias Carrie M. Kent, alias Carrie M. Waite, and whose maiden name, it was charged, was Catharine McKenzie. To commence at the beginning: In May, 1862, John Waller, at that time living in Pictou, Nova Scotia, was married to Catharine McKenzie, of the same place. Two children, one now eleven and the other seven years old, were the fruits of this marriage. In November, 1869, Mrs. Waller came to the States to earn money enough to furnish the house. She stopped a portion of her time in Portland, and the balance of the time in Boston, and seems to have been known as Kate Waller, Kate Wallace, and Carrie M. Kent, and related various stories concerning her life. During all this absence it is reported that she corresponded with Waller. The husband, John Waller, claims that early in 1873, his wife, Catharine Waller, married a man by the name of Waite; so he had her arrested for bigamy.

The case came up for trial in Portland recently, the woman pleading mistaken identity. Mrs. Waite and her husband were in court at the appointed time. Waller was sworn, and testified that the woman in court was his wife. Waller's sister and his brother-in-law also identified the woman as the wife of John Waller. The girl of eleven years stepped up close to the woman and said, "yes, sir, that is my mother." The little boy said this was the woman who visited their home in July last and lived for a time with his father as wife, and that she bought him, the boy, a pair of boots and a jack-knife. Other witnesses were called, who knew this woman as Catharine McKenzie and as Mrs. Waller.

The defendant is said to be quite a handsome woman and was unmoved during the trial. She introduced witnesses to show that she had been mistaken frequently for a woman known as Catharine Wallace, who, it was claimed, was the real wife of Waller, and of course swore positively that she knew nothing about Waller or his children. She made quite a strong defence and the jury failed to agree, nine standing for acquittal and three for conviction.

This is really a most remarkable case, and will pass into the law books to afford precedent as a most singular case of mistaken identity, or of the ability of some persons to show that they are not themselves, but somebody else.

Important Bond Decisions — Doctrine of Lis Pendens not Applicable to Holders of Commercial Paper.

[Associated Press Telegram.]

CHICAGO, February 12.—In the United States circuit court, Judge Drummond has overruled the demurrer to the replications in the Warren county bond cases. The suits are of public interest, not only on account of the amount involved, but in presenting a new phase of liability of towns and counties on their bonds issued in aid of the building of railways. The arguments were very elaborate. Ex-Chief Justice Lawrence and Mr. Harding appeared for the county of Warren, and Judge T. G. Wilson and E. B. McCogg, Esq., for the bondholders. The cases involved the legality of $200,000 of the bonds of the county of Warren in aid of the Rockford, Rock Island and St. Louis Railroad company. Before the bonds were issued certain tax-payers filed a bill in chancery, in the circuit court of that county, to enjoin the board of supervisors from issuing the bonds, alleging that no sufficient notice of the election at which the bonds were voted had been given, and that the county officers had acted collusively with the railway company in issuing the bonds. Upon a hearing, the injunction was dissolved by the circuit court on the 23d of January, 1871. Two days after, the bonds were issued and registered in the state auditor's office, and were subsequently put on the market and sold. After the dissolution of the injunction and issue of the bonds, the complainant appealed to the supreme court of this state, where the decree of the circuit court was reversed, and the bonds declared to be unauthorized and void. Thereupon the tax-payers filed a second bill, making as new parties defendant the unknown owners of the bonds and asking for a like decree as in the first chancery suit, which second bill is still pending. The Portsmouth Savings Bank of New Hampshire, and Augustus T. Post of New York, having purchased the bonds in question in open market, without any actual notice of the pendency of the chancery proceedings in the state courts, commenced the present suits for the recovery of the unpaid interest on coupons due in July and August. The county pleads the adjudication of the state supreme court, declaring the bonds invalid in bar, and insists that the pendency of the chancery proceedings was notice to the purchaser of the bonds. To these pleas the plaintiff filed replications, setting up that they are bona fide purchasers for value, and that they had no actual notice of the pendency of the chancery suits, nor any notice that the bonds were invalid. The county demurred to the replication, claiming that the pendency of the suit was notice.

It is this demurrer which Judge DRUMMOND overruled, holding that the doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to commercial paper, and also in effect re-affirming the principle, that whenever there is a statute authorizing a municipality to issue bonds, and it does, then they are not liable to be impeached in the hands of a bona fide purchaser. The above ruling was in pursuance of the case of Olcott v. The Supervisors of Fond du Lac county, 16 Wallace, 678. In that case the question of lis pendens is involved, but the Supreme Court of the United States, on affirming the validity of the bonds did not refer to this question in any manner. Judge DRUMMOND, on this point, is understood to have differed from the ruling in the case above referred to, but felt bound to follow its decission. The present case will shortly be tried on the facts, and the defendants will be allowed to bring up the disputed point on the moving for a new trial.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

The Louisville and Portland Canal Injunction Case.

We publish in this number the full text of the opinion of Mr. Justice MILLER in the case of the United States v. The Louisville & Portland Canal Company, in the United States circuit court for the district of Kentucky. Although the immediate question arose out of a very special state of facts, local in their character, yet the principles by which it was determined are general, and the manner in which they were applied to the complicated nature of the relations of the canal company to its creditors, to the general government and to the public at large, is both highly interesting and instructive. What can be clearer than the analysis there given of the complex character of the canal corporation under its two-fold legislative history, and the nature of its trust duties? The thoughtful reader will not fail to observe the high view that is taken of the legal rights of the creditors of the corporation, and to note that the learned justice unhesitatingly asserts that their rights cannot be impaired, even by congress.

Does an Action for Breach of Promise die with the Defendant?

It will be remembered that about two years ago Mary Francis Wade instituted an action against Martin Kalbfleisch, ex-mayor of Brooklyn, to recover $100,000 for alleged breach of promise of marriage. The ex-mayor was a wealthy widower, somewhat advanced in years, and the "expectations" of Miss Wade were no doubt great. She is said to have been a lady of great beauty and accomplishments; and if this be true, and she could have brought her action to a favorable verdict during the life of the ex-Mayor, no doubt the damages awarded her would have been heavy. This would be inferred, not only from the great wealth of the defendant, but also from a consideration of the very eligible offers of marriage she must have lost, through being the recipient of his attentions. But, unfortunately for her, before the case came to a trial, the defendant died; and she thereupon sought to have the action continued against his estate. But Judge NELSON, of the supreme court of New York, sitting at special term, decided that this could not be done. This decision has now been affirmed in general term; and it is said the question will go to the court of appeals.

Internal Revenue Law—Effect of Supplementary Assessments.

In the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York, on the 14th instant, a decision was rendered by Judge SHIPMAN, upon the question of the power of an internal revenue assessor to make supplementary assessments, and the effect of such assessments as evidence of the liability of the tax-payer. The New York Herald states the case substantially as follows:

The action was brought to recover $3,773. This amount of money was paid under protest to the defendant, who had been collector of the sixth district. Under the act of July 20, 1868, the plaintiff took out a license as a distiller, and in the months of October, November and December, 1868, and February, 1869, he presented to the assessor the returns as required by law. On these returns an assessment was made and sent to the collector, and the plaintiff paid the amount of the assessment. In July, 1869, the assessor, following the instructions of the commissioner of internal revenue, made a re-assessment for the months already specified. This re-assessment increased the first assessment to the sum of $3,773. This amount, as above mentioned, was paid under protest. The case came on for trial in the United States circuit court, before Judge NATHANIEL SHIPMAN; Mr. Goodlett, United States district attorney, appearing for the government, and Mr. Thomas Harlan for the plaintiff. On the trial it was conceded that the returns made by the plaintiff were correct, and that the assessment proceeded upon the supposition—a belief of the commissioner of internal revenue—that the original assessment, as made upon the returns, was erroneous in consequence of a mistake made by the collector. The collector gave proof of the assessment, but did not offer any testimony as tending to show wherein the imputed error in the original assessment consisted. Two questions have arisen on these facts. (1.) When the tax-payer has made a correct return, and the assessor has made an erroneous assessment thereon, which assessment has been paid, has the assessor, under the law, power to make a supplementary assessment? (2.) Is the re-assessment presumed to be correct without affirmative proof on the part of the government that there was an error in the original assessment?

The decision of Judge SHIPMAN decides the first point in the affirmative, provided that the assessor makes the supplementary assessment within the time (fifteen months) stated in the ninth section of the act of July 13, 1866. He answers the second question in the negative.

Contracts by Banks for Interest in Excess of Charter Rates Void—Accommodation Paper—Usury.

Our readers will thank us for laying before them at this early day the opinion of the Supreme Court, in Tiffany v. Boatmen's Savings Institution, published in another column, substantially affirming the views of the circuit court in the same case (1 Dillon C. C. R. 141). It decides several questions of great interest and moment, and, notwithstanding the marked judicial caution of the learned justice by whom it was prepared, it indicates, perhaps, with some degree of certainty, the views or inclination of the court upon some other question not directly in the path of its judgment.

The opinion is important, because it adheres to the case of the United States v. Owens, 2 Pet. 557, and declares that it must be "accepted as the doctrine" of the court, where the charter of a bank prohibits it from taking greater than a specified rate of interest, and is silent as to the penalty if more than the charter rate be taken, that the effect is to render the whole rate void, and not simply the excess beyond the legal rate. Since the case of the United States v. Owens was decided, the same question has frequently arisen, and the courts elsewhere have generally, but not uniformly, held that the contract was avoided only as to the excess (see cases cited,

Digitized by Google

1 Dillon C. C. R. 149); but the Supreme Court hold, affirming the judgment of the circuit court on the point, that if the contract be executed and the money paid, neither the borrower, nor his assignee in bankruptcy, can recover anything but the excess beyond the legal rate of interest.

As to the other main point in the case, as presented to the Supreme Court, though not raised below, the court hold that where negotiable paper, which is, in fact, accommodation paper, is purchased with knowledge of its origin, and with reason to believe that it was not created in the regular course of business, it is open to the defence of usury. What would be the rule if the purchase was made in good faith, without such knowledge, is not decided; but the reader will notice with interest the observations of Mr. Justice DAVIS, in respect to Nichols v. Fearson, 7. Pet. 103, and "the general current of decisions" upon the subject.

It was made a point in the court below, that the remedy to recover the excess of interest beyond the legal rate was exclusively at law. The circuit court decided that equity would entertain a bill for this purpose, and the point does not seem to have been questioned in the Supreme Court.

Conflict between Federal and State Court for Possession of Property of Insolvent.

Some time since a petition was filed in the United States district court for the southern district of New York, praying that the Glenham Manufacturing Company be declared bankrupt. On this petition Judge BLATCHFORD adjudicated the company bankrupt, and appointed a trustee. It appeared that the marshal, acting under the warrant of the court, took possession of the property of the company; but it was claimed that before he did so, actual possession of it had been obtained by a receiver, who had been appointed in certain proceedings in the state court. The marshal claimed that he held the property by virtue of the warrant issued from the United States district court, but he had been called upon, under an order of the state court, to show cause why he kept possession of the property or be punished for contempt. The case is said to be an important one, involving over a million dollars. Most of the property consists of real estate.

Mr. J. H. Choate, who appeared on behalf of the petitioning creditors, said that the property was now in the custody of the marshal, and he asked that it be delivered to the trustee. With regard to protection or indemnity to the marshal, the court had the whole of the property; it was in the keeping of the marshal; and three-fourths of the creditors had united in a deed to the trustee. Mr. J. C. Carter, who appeared for the marshal, said that the possession was obtained by the marshal without force: it was silently and quietly yielded to him under the authority of receiver; and the question was, was that such an acquiescence as would preclude the state court from again resuming its authority over the estate?

Judge BLATCHFORD is reported to have said that the principle was well settled that the court never issued its warrant to the marshal to take possession of property out of the hands of a receiver of a state court. He had always held that property in the hands of a receiver of a state court could not be disturbed at all. When the marshal took property out of the hands of a receiver of a state court he must give it up; he would no more sanction a marshal taking such property than he would sanction a receiver of a state court taking property out of the hands of the marshal. If the receiver had this property in his hands at the time the marshal took it, the marshal had no business to touch it, and ought to give it back.

Mr. Choate read an affidavit, which contained a statement to the effect that the receiver voluntarily allowed the marshal to take possession at Glenham. Mr. J. C. Carter said the warrant did not tell the marshal what property to take. Judge BLATCHFORD: If the marshal took this property away from the receiver he must give it back; as to indemnity to the marshal, the trustee cannot give it. Some further discussion having ensued, the court denied the motion, with leave to Mr. Choate to renew it again, when the question as to what indemnity should be given to the marshal (in case he has to surrender the property to the receiver) will be taken into consideration.

Indiana Divorces—The "Seventh Clause"—Incurable Insanity no Ground of Divorce.

Indiana has been proverbial for easy divorces. Many an unhappy husband or wife has resorted thither to procure a release from the matrimonial obligations which the laws of no other state would accord them. The peculiar feature of the Indiana divorce act which has given that state such an eminence, is known as the "Seventh Clause." The statute, (2 Gavin & Hord, 351,) after enumerating six separate grounds of divorce, provides (clause 7) that divorces may be granted for "any other cause for which the court shall deem it proper that a divorce shall be granted."

The supreme court of that state seem to have shown a proper disposition to check the unlimited discretion thus conferred, by declaring, as they did in Ritter v. Ritter, 5 Blackf. 81, and in Rubey v. Rubey, 29 Ind. 174, that an appeal lies from a decree granting a divorce under the discretionary clause of the statute. They said, in effect, that it was a legal discretion, which must be reasonably and not arbitrarily exercised, and that its exercise was subject to review in the appellate tribunal. DEWEY, J., in Ritter v. Ritter (supra) said: "That power, ample as it is, is not entirely without limits. The statute requires a cause of divorce, on which the discretion of the court is to be exercised. The conclusion of the judgment that such cause is reasonable, and such a one as forfeits the marriage contract on the part of the wrong doer, or otherwise, is not an act of legislation. * * * Like all discretionary power in courts, it must be exercised in a sound and legal manner; it must not be governed by caprice, or prejudice, or wild and visionary notions with regard to the marriage institution, but must be so directed as to conduce to domestic harmony, and the peace and morality of society."

In the recent case of Curry v. Curry, determined in the general term of the superior court of Indianapolis, and which will be found in the reports of that court, vol. 1, p. 236, it was held that hopeless and incurable insanity on the part of the wife, unaccompanied by any misconduct on her part, was no ground of divorce under the "seventh clause." The petition alleged "that during the year 1857 said Sarah lost her reasoning faculties, and became insane; that plaintiff immediately and promptly resorted to the use and procurement of every and all means and remedies known to the most eminent physicians of the age and country, for the purpose of restoring the mind and health of said Sarah, but without success; that since that time to the present he has continued his efforts for her restoration, and has had her placed under treatment at the Indiana Hospital for the Insane, where she has been kept and treated for about half the time; that the balance of the time she has been kept and cared for in the family of said plaintiff; all of which has occasioned him great expense, and which efforts and medical treatment have availed nothing towards the restoring of said Sarah; that she has been pronounced incurable, and is hopelessly insane; that by reason of her misfortune she has become troublesome, disagreeable and repulsive to her own children, having lost every attribute of humanity; that plaintiff has been impoverished, and himself and his family made utterly and indescribably miserable, by reason of the continued insanity of said defendant; that her presence in the family, and the knowledge of his relations to her, make his life almost a burden, and that his and her children desire that he may be divorced from said Sarah."

Digitized by Google

NEWCOMB, J., said: "It is not charged that the malady of the wife resulted from any misconduct on her part, or that she did any act in violation of her marital duties while sane. She, therefore, has committed no wrong against her husband. The statute places a limitation upon the power of courts in divorce cases, which, in our judgment, is fatal to the present suit. There is no authority conferred to grant a divorce except "upon the application of the injured party." Where no wrong has been committed by one party to the marriage contract, it is impossible that there can be, in a legal sense, an injured party. Where no wrong has been done by the party against whom the divorce is sought, a divorce cannot be granted. (Gullett v. Gullett, 25 Ind. 517. It is a great and irreparable injury to a husband for his wife to lose her reason, but he is not an injured party within the meaning of the statute, because the sufferer is not a wrong doer. The injury may be classed among those other accidents or calamities, that are in law deemed the acts of God, for the consequences of which no legal right of action accrues. Actus Dei nemini facit injuriam. We hold, therefore, that the state of Indiana has not conferred authority upon her courts to decree a divorce to a husband on the sole ground that the wife has become hopelessly insane; at least, when such insanity has not been superinduced by a vicious or reckless cause of conduct on her part."

Federal Court Practice—Power of a Justice of the Supreme Court to sit in a Circuit to which he is not assigned—The Louisville & Portland Canal Company: The Rights therein of the Bondholders, the Government, and the general Public declared.

THE UNITED STATES v. THE LOUISVILLE & PORTLAND CANAL COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court, District of Kentucky.

Before Mr. Justice MILLER.

1. Federal Court Practice—Power of Supreme Court Justice to sit out of his circuit.—Where the judge of the district court for a district where a bill in equity is brought, and the circuit judge for the circuit, and the judge of the supreme court allotted to that circuit are all absent from the district and circuit, another justice of the supreme court has jurisdiction at any place in the United States to hear an application for an injunction, notwithstanding the act of congress of June 1, 1872.

2. The Louisville & Portland Canal.—The legislative history of the Louisville & Portland Canal Company when first incorporated by Kentucky, in 1825, down to the present, and its relation to the government of the United States, given by Mr. Justice MILLER, who holds that the corporation is still in existence and has the right to use and control the canal and its revenues so far as may be necessary for the purposes contemplated by the act of the legislature of Kentucky and the joint resolution of the two houses of congress of May 24, 1860.

3. ——. Rights of Bondholders, Government and Public.—The United States is the only stockholder in the company, and its directors are naked trustees without an interest; and under the state and federal legislation concerning the canal and the bonds issued to raise money to enlarge and improve it, secured by a mortgage of the revenues and tolls of the canal company, there are three parties interested in the trust and the manner in which its duties shall be discharged by the company: 1st. The bondholders of the company. 2d. The government of the United States, sole stockholder, and which has expended $1,000,000 upon the canal; and 3d, the general public.

4. ——. Act of June 10, 1872—Power of Congress—Vested Rights of Bondholders.—The appropriation act of congress of June 10, 1872, in relation to the canal, construed so as not to impair the rights of the bondholders, and the opinion expressed that congress could not abolish or so limit the tolls as to injuriously affect them, "for the plain reason that it would be a legislative attempt to destroy vested rights, and a taking of private property for public use without due compensation."

5. ——. Prosecution of the Work by Government Officers.—Under the circumstances of the case the president and directors of the canal company were enjoined, at the suit of the United States, from interfering with its engineer, officers and contractors in the prosecution of the work of repairing and improving the canal.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Justice MILLER:—Upon a bill in chancery directed to the judges of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, an application is made to me at Long Branch, in the state of New Jersey, to enjoin the Louisville & Portland Canal Co. from interfering with the engineer officers of the United States, and the person with whom they have contracted for the work of making certain repairs and improvements in said canal, under authority of an act of congress appropriating money for that purpose, approved June 10, 1872. An affidavit of the attorneys of the United States accompanies the application, which shows that the judge of the district court for that district, the judge of the circuit court of that circuit, and the judge of the supreme court allotted to that circuit are all absent from and without the district and circuit. I am of opinion, therefore, that notwithstanding the provisions of the similar section of the act to further the administration of justice, approved June 1, 1872, I have jurisdiction to hear the motion, and that it is my duty to do so.

The language of the act under which the agents of the government are proceeding is important. It is found in the act "making appropriations for the repair, preservation and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes," and is verbatim as follows: "For the continuing the work on the canal at the Falls of the Ohio river, three hundred thousand dollars. And the secretary of war is hereby directed to report to congress, at its next session, or sooner if practicable, the condition of said canal, and the provisions necessary to relieve the same from encumbrance, with a view to such legislation as will render the same free to commerce at the earliest practicable period, subject only to such tolls as may be necessary for the superintendence and repair thereof, which shall not, after the passage of this act, exceed five cents per ton."

A brief reference to the history of this canal, and its relation to the government of the United States, is essential to an understanding of the matter now presented for consideration.

By an act of the Kentucky legislature of January 12, 1825, a corporation was chartered by the name of the Louisville & Portland Canal company, to construct a canal around the falls of the Ohio river, with a capital stock of six hundred thousand dollars divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, with the right to levy tolls on vessels passing through the canal. By subsequent statutes the capital was increased to ten thousand shares, and the United States, under acts of congress, became the owner of twenty-nine hundred and ten of said shares. The canal was constructed and has ever since been in successful and profitable operation; and the tolls collected under the limit of the charter granted by the state yielded such a revenue beyond what was necessary to keep the canal in repair, that by the joint legislation of the state and the United States, and by the consent of the individual corporators, a plan was adopted and entered upon to make the canal free to the uses of commerce, except so far as might be necessary to keep it in repair. This plan was inaugurated by an act of the Kentucky legislature, passed in 1842, the provisions of which were accepted by the stockholders, including the United States. Its essential features were, that the surplus revenues of the corporation should be used to buy up all the stock held by others than the United States, and that when this should be accomplished, the canal should be transferred to the control of the government for the use of the public, subject only to such tolls as might be necessary for its superintendence and repair. This plan was so far carried out that in the year 1855 all the shares other than those held by the United States had been purchased in, except five shares left purposely in the hands of as many individuals to qualify them to hold office as directors of the corporation.

Digitized by Google

But while this process of extinguishing the individual shares had been going on, it became clear that the demands of commerce required an enlargement of the canal and a change in its place of lower outlet, which could only be made by an additional or branch canal. The successful use of the tolls in buying in the shares of private stockholders, pointed at once to the means of making this increase in the capacity of the canal without burdening either the state or federal government; and by statute of the Kentucky legislature of 1857, and joint resolution of the two houses of congress of 1860, the canal company was authorized to do this work and to borrow money for that purpose, and pledge the faith of the company and its tolls or revenues on the money so borrowed. The corporation accordingly issued its bonds for one million six hundred thousand dollars, secured by a mortgage on the canal, its franchises, and its tolls and revenues; and proceeded to expend the sum realized on these bonds, in the enlargement and improvement of the canal. It was proved, however, that when this money was all expended, the canal was still unfinished; and the congress of the United States in the year 1868 commenced a series of appropriations for the purpose of completing the work, which has been continued to the present time. Over nine hundred thousand dollars have thus been appropriated and expended under the control and direction of the officers of the government, and the appropriation of 1872, already referred to, was in continuation of this work.

During this time the president and directors of Portland Canal company and the officers of the United States seem to have acted in harmony, the corporation collecting the tolls, and paying for and superintending the temporary repairs. They have also paid the interest on the debt, and redeemed or bought in about half a million in amount of the bonds. This harmony would probably have continued, but for the clause in the present act of appropriation, that "after the passage of this act the tolls should not exceed five cents per ton." It is the first time that congress has attempted to regulate or limit the tolls to be collected on vessels using the canal. The rate thus limited would not produce enough to make the ordinary and necessary repairs, and pay for the superintendence of the canal. It would leave the interest on the bonds unpaid, and largely impair if not destroy the security of the bondholders for the payment of the principal.

The president and directors of the company construe the act as appropriating the money on the condition that the tolls shall be limited to five cents per ton, and they say that an acceptance of the appropriation would be an implied consent to this limitation. They, therefore, notified the officer in charge that they refused to accept the appropriation.

That officer, however, proceeded to let the work and commence operations, and the corporation interfered by physical force to prevent it, and I am now asked by the bill before me, filed in behalf of the United States, to enjoin the corporation from this interference.

The officers of the canal company maintain: 1st. That the corporation is the legal owner of the canal, and that neither the government of the United States nor any one else has the right to assume such control of its property, as the action of the engineer officers seeks to do, without the consent of the directors of the company; and 2d. That a due regard to their duty to the bondholders and other creditors of the corporation forbids them from giving either express consent, or such consent as inaction would imply, to the assumption of the United States, to reduce the tolls found in the appropriation act.

The United States, by its counsel, on the other hand, maintain that since the year 1855 the corporation has had no existence as such, or if it has any existence, it is merely a nominal one, as the agent of the government for whose sole use it is kept alive; and that as the government owns practically all the stock, it has, and should have, the right to control the use, and direct the changes and improvements in the canal. This view is supposed to receive additional force from the powers and duties of the national government in regard to the navigable waters of the United States.

The first, and perhaps the most important question, to be determined is the relation of the corporation and its officers to the possession and control of the canal.

The proposition of the government counsel is based upon the idea that when, under the act of 1842, all the private stock had been bought, the government became, without other action, the owner, and entitled to the possession and control of the canal; and that both by operation of that statute and the necessity of the case, the corporation ceased to have an existence, or at least to have any right or title to the canal; and this argument is made stronger, in the opinion of counsel, by the circumstance that at that time, to-wit, on the 31st day of January, 1855, by a report to the secretary of the treasury, the directors advised him of the purchase of private stock, and the readiness of the corporation to transfer the custody of the canal to the United States so soon as the department was prepared to receive it. But it does not appear that the department was ready to receive the transfer. Certainly no formal act either of congress or of the department, accepting this transfer or acknowledging the obligation on which alone it was to be so transferred, namely, to hold it for the use of the public free of tolls except so much as might be necessary for its superintendence and repair, is shown or claimed. On the contrary, in reply to the notification of the company, the secretary requested them to continue their organization by retaining a share of stock for each director to maintain his eligibility as such, and to manage the affairs of the canal as heretofore.

But whatever doubt may exist as to the precise relations of these officers to the work at that time, is removed by the subsequent act of 1857, of the state legislature, and the joint resolution of congress of 1860. These have already been referred to as authorizing the company to extend and enlarge the canal, and to contract a debt for that purpose; but as the language of the joint resolution of congress, approved May 24, 1860, seems to me to be conclusive of the continued existence of the corporation, I will give its precise terms. It was resolved, "That the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal company be, and they are hereby, authorized, with the revenues and credits of the company, to enlarge the said canal, and to construct a branch canal from a suitable point on the south side of the present canal, to a point in the Ohio river opposite Sand Island, sufficient to pass the largest class of vessels navigating the Ohio river." The resolution had two provisos, one protecting the United States from liability for the debt so incurred, and the other declaring that when the work was completed, and paid for, no more tolls should afterwards be collected than was necessary to keep it in repair and pay for its superintendence and management.

Digitized by Google

This resolution, beyond all controversy, clearly recognizes three facts of important bearing on the matter in hand: 1st. The existence of the corporation called the Louisville & Portland Canal Compahy; 2d. That it had revenues and credits which might be sufficient to enable it to raise means for this large and expensive work; 3d. That it had the right, or it was then given so far as the United States could give it, to use these credits and revenues for that purpose.

It is inconceivable that this company had any other revenue than the tolls from the canal, or any other credit than that which arose from the right to these tolls, and the ownership or control of the canal. To me it seems that this is conclusive of existence of the corporation and of its right to use and control the canal and its revenues so far as was necessary for the purpose contemplated by the act of the Kentucky legislature and the joint resolution of the two houses of congress.

But while these considerations prove the continued existence of the corporation, the validity of the contract by which they pledged the canal and its revenues for the money borrowed for its extension, and its duty to secure and protect this revenue and to do all that lawfully may be done to prevent its destruction, or diversion from that purpose, it is still true that the directors of this corporation occupy a very peculiar position, and one widely different from the directors of railroads, insurance companies and other corporations for private gain. The United States is the only stockholder of this corporation. The directors have really no personal interest in the corporation or its property. They are to all purposes what equity calls trustees without an interest, the depositaries of a naked trust. For whom do they hold this trust, and for whose benefit must they exercise it? This enquiry, though lying at the foundation of the question to be solved here, is fortunately not a difficult one. There are three parties interested deeply in this trust and in the manner in which its duties shall be discharged, which I review in the order of the superiority of their claims rather than their importance.

1st. The holders of the bonds, secured by the mortgage, authorized and placed under a two-fold legislative sanction by the legislature of Kentucky and the congress of the United States. 2d. The United States, the holder of all the stock in the corporation, expending a million of dollars beside for the benefit of the canal; and, 3d. The public, the community, to whose use, free of all charges but those necessary to keep it in operation, it has been solemnly dedicated by the legislature of Kentucky, by the congress of the United States, and by the action of the corporation itself, as well as by all the acts of all these parties from 1842 to the present time, so soon as the enlargement is completed and the debt thereby created discharged.

As regards the first of these, I have no hesitation in expressing my entire conviction that the bondholders have a lien upon the revenues of the canal and a right to insist that the corporation shall protect these revenues, to the extent necessary to make entirely safe the payment of their debt and its accruing interest; and that until that debt is paid, or the mortgage satisfied or otherwise discharged with the consent of these bondholders, this right of theirs remains, with the corresponding duty of the directors of the corporation. But the right of these creditors is limited to this, and so long as their security is unimpaired it is the duty of directors to advance the other interests I have mentioned, for which they are trustees. The interests of the United States and of the public are, for present purposes, identical. The government has, in all its actions, shown its desire and its intent, that at the earliest moment the public use of the canal should be freed from all burdens save those necessary for its repair and management, and her very act which has given rise to the present opposition of the president and directors is wholly in the interest of the public, and designed to hasten the end long contemplated by all parties.

Now, if the act of the United States in completing the enlargement of the canal is an act for the benefit of all these parties, the bondholders inclusive, the resistance of the president and directors is an act in detriment of their trust, injurious to all the interests confided to them, and a mere arbitrary exercise of power which should be restrained. If, on the other hand, any one of those interests would be seriously prejudiced, they should not be disturbed in the exercise of a reasonable discretion in the protection of that interest.

That the work itself which is being done by the government is a useful and a necessary work for the public good, and for that of the United States, as a stockholder and as the representative of the public, is undeniable. That it also adds to the value of the security of the bondholder, and is to that extent in his interest, is equally clear.

But in regard to the latter, if, as alleged by defendant, the work is being constructed in a manner which so far obstructs the use of the canal as will endanger the revenue from which this interest is to be paid, or if, as the trustees seem to believe, the work when completed under the present act of congress, will extinguish the right of the corporation to collect sufficient toll to pay both principal and interest of their debt, then the work should not be done, for these rights are paramount.

In regard to the manner of doing the work, the affidavits submitted satisfy me that no such serious obstruction to the use of the canal, or to the repairs which the directors wish to make, will result from the work as that claimed by the defendant; none which should be set up for a moment in comparison with the great value to all parties of the vigorous prosecution and early completion of the work of extension and enlargement.

But I am satisfied that the president and directors are honest in their belief that an acquiescence on their part in the expenditure of this appropriation on the canal, would bind them legally as an acknowledgment of the government limitation of the toll—an acknowledgment which would be a violation of their official duty. Of this result they will be rid if their action is controlled by a competent court against their protest. To refrain from disturbing the contractors and engineers in expending this money, when their hands are tied by an injunction, raises no presumption of acquiescence in the claim of the government to reduce the toll to a minimum.

Should the court so restrain? or, if they are right in their construction of the statute, should they be permitted to resist congressional interference in this matter?

This leads me to a remark or two on the construction of the appropriation act. The first sentence is a distinct and clear appropriation of $300,000 for the continuance of the work in which the government had for several years been engaged, and in which it had spent, aside from its stock, near a million of dollars. The subsequent sentence directs the secretary of war to report to congress what legislation is necessary to relieve the canal of encumbrance, so that it may be free from all other toll than what is required for its management and repair; and this sentence declares that such toll after the passage of this act shall not exceed five cents per ton.

That the appropriation is absolute and independent of the clause concerning toll, I have no doubt. It might as well be argued that it was dependent on the report of the secretary of war. Whether, therefore, the toll be reduced or not, the appropriation remains and should be carried into effect.

When we consider that the next sentence recognizes the encumbrance on the canal, no doubt meaning the one in favor of the bondholders, so often mentioned in this opinion, and directs an enquiry as to what action by congress is necessary to remove it, I can hardly believe that in the same sentence it was intended to destroy the essential thing on which that encumbrance rested, namely, the tolls. The argument is, therefore, not without force, that congress meant, when they said such tolls should not exceed five cents per ton after the passage of this act—such act as they contemplated in future to pass—to satisfy or remove that encumbrance.

Digitized by Google

It must be confessed that the language is not apt for this construction; that in their caution, the directors might well have supposed that congress intended to limit the tolls at once to five cents per ton.

If this construction of the statute be correct, then I have no hesitation in saying that that part of it which so limits the tolls is void, for the plain reason that it is a legislative attempt to destroy vested rights, and a taking of private property for public use without due compensation.

I think I have shown that the prosecution of this work is for the benefit and advantage of all concerned; that it does not seriously interfere with the ordinary use of the canal, and that the accomplishment of the work will neither confer on congress the right to regulate the toll, nor validate the attempt already made to do so, if congress really intended to make such an attempt.

Under these circumstances I have no hesitation in controlling the president and directors of the canal company in the exercise of the great trust committed to them, so far as may be necessary to permit this work to go on, and in exercising this control, I feel satisfied that I am relieving them from an embarrassment and responsibility which they will gladly rest on the shoulders of the court. The injunction will be granted.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—A noticeable feature in the foregoing opinion is the favorable light in which it regards the rights of the bondholders of the corporation: the learned justice declaring with emphasis that even congress could not limit the tolls of the canal pledged for their benefit so as to impair their rights. In England parliament would possess this power, as shown by the case of Brown v. Mayor, etc., of London, 9 Com. B. (N. S.) 726, 1861. There a statute discharged the liability of the city of London on bonds payable out of tolls and duties levied on vessels navigating the Thames; and it was held that no action would thereafter lie against the corporation thereon, on the principle that where the performance of an obligation has been rendered impossible by act of the law, the obligation is discharged. See, also, St. Louis v. Shields, 52 Mo. 351; Dillon on Munic. Corp. Sec. 41 et seq. (2d ed.), note.

As to the right of the United States to bring an injunction bill in the proper circuit court to protect improvements which she is making under the authority of congress, in navigable waters, from injury which will be caused by acts done by state authority, see United States v. Duluth (city of), 1 Dillon C. C. R. 469; sequel to same case, 2 Ib. 406.

Contracts by Banks for Interest in Excess of Charter Rates—Accommodation Paper—Usury.

JOHN K. TIFFANY, SURVIVING TRUSTEE OF JOHN F. DARBY, BANKRUPT, APPELLANT, v. THE BOATMEN'S SAVING INSTITUTION.

APPEAL FROM THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE DISTRICT OF MISSOURI.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 179; October Term, 1873.

1. Usury—Missouri Statutes—Whether the usury statutet of Missouri apply to banking corporations therein, quære.

2. —— Bank Loans—Charter Rate of Interest—On the principle that a contract to do an act forbidden by law is void, if a bank in making a loan exceeds the charter rate, it cannot recover on the note, although the statute does not declare the note void, and is silent as to the effect of taking more than the prescribed rate of interest: following U. S. v. Owens, 2 Pet 575.

3. ——. —— ——. Where Contract is executed.—But this principle does not apply to cases where the contract is executed and the money has been paid; in such case the borrower, or his assignee in bankruptcy, can only recover back the excess beyond the charter rate.

4. ——. ——. ——. Accommodation Paper—The same principle applied to purchases of accommodation paper with knowledge or good grounds of knowledge of its character, and that it was being sold for the benefit of the maker.

5. ——. Bona fide Holders.—Whether a bona fide purchaser of accommodation paper without knowldege of its origin, and that it was not created in the regular course of business, is affected by usury statutes, discussed and cases cited and course of decision referred to by Mr. Justice DAVIS.

The facts of the case appear in the opinion. A full report of the cause in the court below is given in 1 Dillon C. C. R. 141. The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Knox for the complainant; Mr. Gantt for the defendant.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill in equity, seeking to recover from the defendant certain large sums of money which, it is alleged, were loaned to Darby at usurious rates of interest, in violation and fraud of the bankrupt act. The bill does not ask for a decree for the excess of interest reserved over the legal rates, but proceeds for the recovery of all the money loaned to Darby and repaid by him, on the theory that the contracts between the parties were illegal and void, and that this illegality affected all the notes, and that if equity will not enable Darby to recover back what he voluntarily paid, it will his representative, on the ground that the rights of the trustee are greater than those of the bankrupt. There are two transactions which are sought to be impeached. The first relates to a loan of $135,000, at the rate of ten per cent., made on the 4th day of October, 1868, on the security of certain jail bonds of the city of St. Louis. The other is predicated on the purchase by the defendant, at usurious rates, of certain notes given by Darby, and endorsed for his accommodation.

The circuit court did not consider, under the evidence, the last transaction unlawful, and decided that the complainant could only recover the amount of interest paid upon the note of $135,000 in excess of 8 per cent. per annum.

This decision, and the exclusion of certain evidence offered by the complainant, are the errors which are the object of this appeal. The general statute of Missouri concerning usury (chapter 89 of General Statutes of Missouri, 1865, p. 401) allows an individual to receive 10 per cent. per annum interest for the loan of money; but, if more be taken and suit is brought to enforce the contract, and the plea of usury be interposed, the whole interest is forfeited to the proper county for the use of schools. The debtor is not released from his obligation to pay, but the interest is diverted from the parties and appropriated for school purposes. If, however, the borrower suffers judgment to go against him without pleading usury, or if, without suit, he pays the usurious interest, he cannot, either at law or in equity, maintain an action for its repayment. This was settled in Ransom v. Hays (39 Mo. 448), and reaffirmed in Rutherford v. Williams (42 Mo. 35); and these decisions would be conclusive of this controversy, unless it is affected by the bankrupt law, if the legislature intended the general provisions of the interest act to apply to loans by artificial as well as natural persons, although the former might be restricted to a less rate of interest than the latter. It is contended by the defendant that this act was meant to apply to corporations, and that if a bank, discounting a note in the course of business, commit usury, it is subject to precisely the same consequences with an individual. On the other hand, the complainant insists that the legislature did not intend in this matter to place corporations on the same footing with natural persons, and cites in support of this position The Bank of Louisville v. Young (37 Mo. 406). But the facts of that case did not involve the construction of a contract made by a corporation created by an act of the legislature of Missouri. The point decided there was, that a note given to secure a loan made in foreign bank notes by a foreign corporation, doing business by an agent in St. Louis, contrary to the provisions of an act to prevent illegal banking, was void.

We have been cited to no case in the courts of Missouri, nor are we aware of any, in which the question has been directly presented whether the general law relating to usury applies to, and has the same effect upon, a contract made in violation of its charter by a bank as upon a contract made by an individual. The question is one of great importance to the business interests of that state, and may be far-reaching in its consequences, and as it is not necessary to decide it in order to dispose of this case in accordance with the principle on which the circuit court placed its decree, we prefer to leave its decision to the state tribunals. Assuming, then, that this defendant is not within the purview of the general usury statute of the state, what are the consequences that must attach to it for taking excessive interest from Darby? The bill proceeds on the idea that the provision of the charter being violated, all the loans to Darby were ultra vires and void, and as they were made to him within four and six months of his adjudication as a bankrupt, with the knowledge of the defendant during the whole course of its dealing with him that he was insolvent, the complainant has, in his character of trustee, the right to recover for the use of his trust all the sums of money paid to defendant by Darby, because paid in fraud of the bankrupt act.

Digitized by Google

The defendant is, by its charter, authorized to lend money on interest, but is forbidden to exact more than eight per cent. for the loan. No penalty is prescribed for transgressing the law, nor does the charter declare what effect shall be given to the usurious contract. This effect must, therefore, be determined by the general rules of law. The modern decisions in this country are not uniform on the question whether, if the bank takes more than the rate prescribed, the contract shall be avoided or not on these general rules; nor is this a matter of surprise, if we consider the growing inclination to construe statutes against usury so as not to destroy the contract. It is, however, unnecessary to review these cases, or the earlier ones in England and this country, which uniformly hold that the contract is avoided; because this court has, in the case of the Bank of the United States v. Owens, reported in 2 Peters, decided the question.

The bank in that case brought suit upon a promissory note that was discounted at a higher rate of interest than six per cent., which was the limit allowed by its charter upon its loans or discounts. The charter, like that of the Boatmen's Institution, did not declare void any contract transcending the permitted limits, nor affix any penalty for the violation of the law. It was contended in that case, as it has been in this, that a mere prohibition to take more than a given per cent does not avoid a contract reserving a greater rate, and that when a contract is avoided, it is always in consequence of an express provision of law to that effect. But the court held otherwise, and decided that such contracts are void in law upon general principles; "that there can be no civil right where there is no legal remedy, and there can be no legal remedy for that which is illegal." Chief Justice TANEY, in the Maryland circuit, as late as 1854, in a similar case, held similar views, and supported them by the decision in this case. (Dill v. Ellicott, Taney's Circuit Court Decisions, p. 233.) It must, therefore, be accepted as the doctrine of this court, that a contract to do an act forbidden by law is void, and cannot be enforced in a court of justice.

But it does not follow in cases of usury, if the contract be executed, that a court of chancery, on application of the debtor, will assist him to recover back both principle and interest. To do this would be to aid one party to an illegal transaction, and to deny redress to the other. Courts of equity have a discretion on this subject, and have prescribed the terms on which their powers can be brought into activity. They will give no relief to the borrower if the contract be executory, except on the condition that he pay to the lender the money loaned, with legal interest; nor, if the contract be executed, will they enable him to recover any more than the excess he has paid over the legal interest. (Story's Eq. Jur., 1 vol., 10th edition, by Redfield, sections 300, 301, 302.) In recognition of this doctrine the court below rendered a decree for the excess of interest over eight per cent. per annum exacted of Darby on the note for $135,000, and dismissed the bill as to all other claims. The six accommodation notes, which defendant claims to have been purchased from note brokers, were really taken on loans to Darby, and the illegal interest received above eight per cent. on them should, on the principle of that decree, be refunded, as much as that upon the larger note. It is true that usury is only predicable of an actual loan of money, and equally true that a negotiable promissory note, if a real transaction between the parties to it, can be sold in the market like any other commodity. The real test of the salability of such paper is whether the payee could sue the maker upon it when due. He could do this if it was a valid contract when made, otherwise not. Mere accommodation paper can have no effective or legal existence until it is transferred to a bona fide holder. It follows, then, that the discounting by a bank at a higher rate of interest than the law allows of paper of this character, made and given to the holder for the purpose of raising money upon it, and its origin only a nominal contract, on which no action could be maintained by any of the parties to it if it had not been discounted, is usurious, and not defensible as a purchase. The point was decided in New York at an early day (15 Johnson. 55), and this decision recognized and approved by this court in Nichols v. Fearson, 7 Peters, 103, and the general current of decision is in the same direction. (Munn v. Commission Co., 15 Johns. 55; Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. 176; Wheaton v. Hibbard, 20 Johns. 289; Powell v. Waters, 8 Cowan, 669; Corcoran & Riggs v. Powers, 6 Ohio State, 37; 3 Parsons on Contracts, 6th edition, p. 144, and cases cited in note s.)

There are cases which hold that the purchaser of such paper is protected if he took it in good faith of the holder, without knowledge of its origin, and in the belief that it was created in the regular course of business. (3 Parsons on Contracts, p. 145, and cases cited in the note on that page.) Whether this limitation of the rule be correct or not, it is not important to enquire, as the decision of the question under consideration does not rest upon it.

The six notes which are the basis of the transaction complained of, were executed by Darby, solely for the purpose of raising money upon them, endorsed by Brotherton & Knox, for his accommodation, and delivered by him to Stagg and other street brokers, to be negotiated. This negotiation was effected with the Boatmen's Institution, and it is perfectly manifest that the cashier, in purchasing the paper, did not suppose that he was advancing the money for the benefit of the brokers who held them, or of Brotherton & Knox, who endorsed them. They were doubtless purchased because the security was deemed sufficient, but it is impossible to conceive that the cashier did not know the paper to be of that class called accommodation, as it is conceded that Brotherton & Knox were gentlemen of large pecuniary ability, and had no occasion to go upon the street to get paper held by them bona fide, against Darby or any one else, discounted. Indeed, Stagg says the notes were negotiated for Darby's benefit, and explains, in some instances, how it was done. Darby would apply to him for money on his paper, and he would go to the Boatmen's Bank to see if the cashier would take it, and if the reply was in the affirmative, the paper would be made, taken to the bank, and the money obtained on it. Can any rational person suppose, in the absence of any direct evidence, that the cashier in dealing with Stagg thought he was dealing with the owner of the notes? The presumption is that street brokers act for others, not themselves, and that the cashier was well acquainted with this course of business. If so, he knew, or ought to have known, that Darby wanted the money, and that the paper was made to enable him to get it. and for no other purpose.

This being the case, the transaction can be viewed in no other light than as a loan of money directly to Darby, and as he paid more than 8 per cent. for its use, the circuit court erred in not ordering the excess to be refunded.

The remaining question to be considered is, whether, in this case, the rights of the trustee are greater than those of Darby.

[Upon this point the court held that the assignee could claim

Digitized by Google

nothing which Darby could not have claimed had he been a party to the suit. If Darby were suing, he could only recover the excessive interest paid to the bank]

The opinion closes as follows:

The case will have to go back for the purpose of enabling the circuit court to ascertain, in some proper way, the excess of interest over the charter rate paid on the six accommodation notes, and to enlarge the decree so as to recover that sum. In all other respects the disposition of this case by the circuit court was correct.

Injunction to Restrain Issue of Bonds by Public Corporations.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. LINCOLN COUNTY.

Circuit Court of the United States, District of Nebraska, November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON and DUNDY, JJ.

1. Public Corporations—Bonds—Injunction—Upon proper application the issue of negotiable bonds by a public corporation will be enjoined, when the statute authorizing their issue only upon certain terms has not been complied with in matters of substance.

2. Statute authorizing must be followed.—An act of the legislature of Nebraska in respect to the issue of such bonds construed, and it is held, where the statute required such bonds to be paid in ten years, that a vote authorizing bonds to run twenty years was such a material departure from the statute that the court would enjoin the issue of the bonds.

This is a bill by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, as a large property owner and tax-payer in the county of Lincoln, in behalf of itself and other tax-payers similarly situated, to restrain the proposed issue of $30,000 of the bonds of the county, to borrow money to aid it in erecting public buildings therein. The county commissioners ordered an election to be held at the different voting precincts in the county, on the 25th day of May, 1872, to vote on the proposition to issue $30,000 in the bonds of the county to bear ten per cent. interest and maturing in twenty years, and also to levy annually a tax sufficient to pay the interest of said bonds and the principal at maturity, for the purpose of building a court house and jail. The proposition carried, and the bill is brought to restrain the issue of the bonds. The bonds proposed to be issued are negotiable in form, with interest coupons attached, for $500 each, payable August 1st, 1892, or at the option of the county, at any time after 1880. Each bond contains a recital that it is authorized by sections 19 and 26, and section 28 of chapter 9, of the Revised Statutes of the State, in pursuance of the vote of the 25th day of May, 1873.

O. P. Mason, T. F. Gantt, for the county; A. J. Poppleton, E. Wakely and John D. Howe, for the plaintiff.

DILLON, Circuit Judge:—Upon consideration, we hold:

I. That the act of the legislature of the state of Nebraska, of February 15, 1869, and the amendatory act of March 3, 1870, which authorize "any county or city to issue bonds to aid in the construction of any railroad, or other work of internal improvement," have no application to the issue of bonds by a county for the erection of public buildings therein; and, therefore, the legality of the proposed issue of bonds by the county in the case at bar can derive no support from these enactments.

II. That the only authority for the issue of such bonds in this state is that which is recited in the bonds here proposed to be issued, viz: Sections 19 to 28 of chapter 9 of the revised statutes of the state.

III. Section 19 gives the county commissioners "power to submit to the people of the county, at any regular or special election, the question whether the county will borrow money to aid in the construction of public buildings." The mode of submitting is prescribed in section 21, and section 22 provides as follows "When the question submitted involves the borrowing of money, the proposition of the question must be accompanied by a provision to levy a tax for the payment thereof in addition to the usual taxes, and no vote adopting the question proposed shall be valid unless it likewise adopts the amount of tax to be levied to meet the liability incurred." "Sec. 23. The rate of tax levied shall in no case exceed three mills on the dollar on the county valuation in one year. When the object is to borrow money to aid in the erection of public buildings, the rate shall be such as to pay the debt in ten years."

It is our judgment that the legislative intention here is to require the debt created to borrow money to erect public buildings to be paid in ten years, and the requirement expressly is that a rate of tax shall be voted and levied sufficient to pay the debt within that period. This provision is defeated if the county may vote to create a debt payable in twenty years, and to levy an annual tax during that period, and such was the proposition which was, in this instance, submitted to, and adopted by, the voters. If the tax is raised in ten years sufficient to pay the debt, the debt ought to be such an one as that the tax may be applied to its payment, for the tax is "specially appropriated and constituted a fund distinct from all others" for this purpose. A construction of this legislation is not admissible by which money to pay the debt may be raised years before the debt itself is payable.

As this is decisive against the right of the county commissioners to submit, or the people to adopt, the proposition for the issue of bonds to run twenty years, it is not necessary to notice the other grounds for the injunction presented in the bill. It may be that if these bonds were issued and in the hands of bona fide holders for value, they could be enforced against the county; but the issue of such bonds will be enjoined upon proper application, when the statute in matters of substance has not been complied with. An order will be entered denying the motion to dissolve the injunction heretofore allowed, and continuing it in force.

DUNDY, J., concurs. ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

NOTE.—In the case of the same plaintiff, at the same term to restrain Merrick county from issuing railway aid bonds, under the act of February 15, 1869, the court, on demurrer to the bill, held, under section 21 of the revised statutes of 1866, even where the notice of the question submitted to the voters of the county was published in a newspaper, that it was essential to the validity of the vote that "a copy of the question submitted should be posted up at the places of voting." In this case, it was alleged that the notice was not thus posted at the place of voting, in a town, the vote in which controlled the result in favor of the proposition.

Federal Court Practice—Mode of Entitling Bills and Affidavits—Service of Copies.

CHARLES V. STERRICK v. JAMES W. PUGSLEY ET AL.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Michigan, January 26, 1874.

Before LONGYEAR, District Judge.

1. The Address of a Bill to the "circuit court, etc., in chancery sitting," is sufficient.

2. Entitling Bill in the Cause.—A bill ought not to be entitled in the cause, because when it is filed there is no cause pending; but such an entitling may be rejected as surplusage.

3. Affidavits Venue, how Stated.—In affidavits taken before a United States circuit court commissioner, the venue should be stated thus: "United States of America, District of ——," and not "State of ——, County of."

4. Entitling Affidavits.—Affidavits made to be used in a suit not yet commenced should not be entitled as of any court or cause; and such an entitling is good cause for their rejection.

5. Service of copies of Affidavits.—The proper practice in regard to the service of copies of affidavits on the opposing counsel stated.

United States circuit court, eastern district of Michigan. In equity. Charles W. Sterrick v. James W. Pugsley and Arthur D. Smith. Opinion delivered January 26th, 1874. On the motion of complainant for a preliminary injunction to restrain defendants from using a deed of assignment of a patent by complainant to defendant Pugsley, and from claiming or exercising any rights thereunder.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Breese, for complainant; Mr. H. H. Brown, for defendants.

LONGYEAR, J.—Some preliminary objections will be first noticed. The defendants' counsel objected to the bill of complaint being read on the grounds:

1. That the entitling of the court is not "in equity," but of the "circuit court," etc., merely.

2. That it is entitled in the cause.

The address of the bill is to the "circuit court," etc., "in chancery sitting." This is sufficient, and if the entitling of the court were of any consequence the court would direct it to be amended by adding the words "in equity."

The bill is entitled in the cause. This is irregular, because until the bill is filed there is no cause pending. The bill, however, is complete without it, and the entitling as to the parties is rejected as surplusage.

The objections to the bill are, therefore, overruled.

Counsel for defendants also objected to the reception and reading of the affidavits annexed to the bill of complaint in support of the motion for injunction on the grounds:

1. That they have no proper venue.

2. That they are not entitled in any cause "in equity."

The affidavits are sworn to before United States circuit court commissioners, some of them before a commissioner for the eastern district, and some before a commissioner for the western district of Michigan. The venue of each is, "State of Michigan, County of Calhoun," or, "County of Kalamazoo," according, I suppose, to the county in which the oath happened to be administered. This was irregular. The proper venue of an affidavit taken before a United States commissioner is "United States of America, District of ——," naming the district and state for which the commissioner is such. In this case it should have been "Eastern District of Michigan," or "Western District of Michigan," as the case was. In the view taken by the court, however, upon the merits of the motion, admitting all the affidavits, it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to decide what is the effect of the irregularity in the venue.

The objection to the entitling of the court is not tenable upon the ground stated. The affidavits were all made before the suit was commenced. Such affidavits should in no case be entitled in any court or cause. When they are so entitled it is a good cause for their rejection. Rex v. Jones, 1 Str. 704; Rex v. Pierson, Andr. 313; Rex v. Harrison, 6 T. R. 60; King v. Cole, 6 T. R. 640; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 891; Humphrey v. Cande, 2 Cow. 509; Haight v. Turner, 2 J. R. 370; Bronson v. Mitchill, 12 J. R. 460; Milliken v. Selye, 3 Denio, 54; Hawley v. Donnelly, 8 Paige, 415; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 600. See, also, the decision of this court made in the present term in The Blake Crusher Company v. Ward et al. But it was said at the argument, if there is no entitling how can it be known for what purpose the affidavit was made? This objection, if it be one, can be very easily obviated by stating the purpose for which it is intended in the affidavit itself.

The bill and affidavits having been read, defendants' counsel offered to read a sworn answer and accompanying affidavits in opposition to the motion. To this the complainant's counsel objected, on the ground that he had not been served with copies. Affidavits to be used in support of, or in opposition to, special motions, ought always to be served on the opposite counsel a reasonable time before the motion is brought on. Where this is not done the court may reject the affidavits, or, in its discretion, allow the same to be read, giving the opposite party the option to proceed with the hearing or to take time for the perusal and examination of the affidavits, and production of affidavits in reply where that is competent. The latter course was pursued in the present case. * * *

Effect of Express Company's Receipt limiting Liability where Value is not inserted.

The supreme court of Illinois has recently determined a point of interest to carriers and shippers, in the case of Oppenheimer v. United States Express Company, published in the Chicago Times of the 5th instant. The question presented was as to the validity of a clause in the express company's receipt, restricting their liability to $50, unless the value of the package was stated. The goods lost were claimed to be of the value of $3,800. But instead of inserting the value in the blank space left in the receipt for that purpose, the agent of the consignor had inserted a mark inexpressive of any value. It was held as a preliminary question that the consignors being merchants, and having dealt for several years with the company, using their printed books of receipts, in which the clause in question was inserted, must be presumed to have known of its existence. It was urged, however, that it was incumbent on the company to show, not only that the consignors had notice of the condition, but also that they assented to it and consented to be bound thereby. But the court thought otherwise. SHELDON, J., said:

"A distinction exists between the effect of those notices by a carrier, which seek to discharge him from duties which the law has annexed to his employment, and those, like the one in question, designed simply to ensure good faith and fair dealing on the part of his employer; in the former case, notice alone not being effectual without an assent to the attempted restriction, while in the latter case notice alone, if brought home to the knowledge of the owner of the property delivered for carriage, will be sufficient. The rule in this case is thus laid down by the supreme court of New York: 'If he (the carrier) has given general notice that he will not be liable over a certain amount, unless the value is made known to him at the time of delivery, and a premium for insurance paid, such notice, if brought home to the knowledge of the owner (and courts and juries are liberal in inferring such knowledge from the publication of the notice), is as effectual in qualifying the acceptance of the goods as a special agreement, and the owner at his peril must disclose the value and pay the premium. The carrier in such case is not bound to make the enquiry, and if the owner omits to make known the value, and does not therefore pay the premium at the time of delivery, it is considered as dealing unfairly with the carrier, and he is liable only to the amount mentioned in his notice, or not at all, according to the terms of his notice.' (Orange County Bank v. Brown, 9 Wend., 115. See, also, 2 Greenleaf Ev., p. 215; Ang. on Carriers, p. 245; Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank v. Champlain Trans. Co., 23 Vt. 186; Moses v. Boston and M. Railroad, 24 N. H. 85.) The distinction above adverted to has been recognized by this court. (Western Transfer Co. v. Newhall et al., 24 Ill. 466.) The common carrier is liable, as we find it frequently laid down, in respect to his reward, and the compensation should be in proportion to the risk. As the carrier incurs a heavy responsibility, he has a right to demand from the employer such information as will enable him to decide on the proper amount of compensation for the services and risk, and the degree of care which he ought to bestow in discharging his trust. (Hollister v. Nowlen, 19 Wend. 244.) And such a limitation of the carrier's liability as the one in question is held to be reasonable and consistent with public policy.

"But independent of the qualifying provision contained in the receipt, we should be inclined to sustain the defendant's claim of exemption from liability on the ground of a want of good faith in not disclosing the value of the goods. These consignors knew that there was a recognized distinction on the part of the company between valuable packages and ordinary freight; that they had their separate collectors of the two kinds, and the consignors were provided with signs to hang out to denote which one of the collectors they had goods for. They must have displayed the sign indicating that they had ordinary merchandise to be carried, as the box in question was delivered to that collector. In the blank receipts which they were so frequently filling out, there was a blank space after a dollar mark for filling in the amount the goods were valued at; this was a virtual request on the part of the company to state the value. There was an actual attempt here by the agent of the shippers to fill in this blank space, but instead of inserting $3,800 (the value) a mark or character was inserted in-expressive of any value. This shows that there was a designed suppression of the value of the goods. That was unfair conduct on the part of the shippers of the goods. The effect of such conduct to relieve the carrier from his liability as insurer, is asserted in the cases of the Chicago and Aurora Railroad Company v. Thompson, 19 Ill. 578, and American Express Company v. Perkins, 42 Ill. 459. Had the true value of the goods been disclosed there would have been an extra charge of $8.50, but increased precautions would have been taken for the safety of the goods, and, as the evidence shows, they would have been saved. The court below was justified in coming to the conclusion that the consignors elected to take the risk of the loss, rather than subject the plaintiffs to the enhanced charges that would have been made, had the value of the package been disclosed.

Digitized by Google

"It is unnecessary to consider the effect of that provision in the receipt which has been urged upon our attention by appellant's counsel, that the company are not to be held liable for any loss or damage except as forwarders only; as that provision and the one in question are distinct and severable, and one might be held to be obligatory upon a party where the other would not be. We are urged on behalf of the appellants to put this construction upon the receipt: that the limitation of liability to $50 in case of loss relates only to the duty of the company while acting as carrier. We do not regard the instrument as reasonably susceptible of any such interpretation. The plain reading as well as meaning of the limitation in question is that the company are not to be held liable for any loss or damage of any package for over $50 unless its value be stated. And the limitation is not liable to the objection urged by appellant's counsel, that it is invalid because the effect of it would be to relieve the company from all liability even in loss occasioned by its own negligence. The established legal construction of such condition is otherwise. They are not to be read as providing against losses or injuries occasioned by actual negligence. (Story on Bailm. § 570, 571; Sager v. Ports. S. & P. & E. R. R. Co., 31 Maine, 228). Numerous are the decisions where the validity of such provisions has been recognized and affirmed."

Judgment was rendered below for the defendants, and this the supreme court affirmed.

Notes and Queries.

GLASGOW, KY., February 12th, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In your paper of the 5th inst., you publish the case of Townsend, Assignee, etc., v. Leonard, Sheriff, etc., in the United States circuit court, district of Kansas, November term, 1873, before Judge DILLON, in which it was decided that property in the hands of a sheriff, under execution of fi. fa. from the state courts, before proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, cannot, at the instance of the assignee in bankruptcy, be taken out of the possession of the sheriff by the federal court; that such sheriff has the right to satisfy the execution in his hands, and will only be required to surrender the residue of property, or money, after this has been done.

In a case like that of Townsend, Assignee etc. v. Leonard, etc., when the sheriff, under attachments from state courts, has seized property before the proceedings in bankruptcy have been commenced, will he (that is, the sheriff) be compelled by the federal court to surrender the property to an after-appointed assignee? or, will the state court, having obtained jurisdiction of the case, be permitted to go on, and, through its ministerial officers, dispose of the attached property and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the debts of the attaching creditors?

Please answer under "Notes and Queries," and give authorities.

Respectfully, L. M.

ANSWER.—The federal court will not disturb the possession of the state court or its officer. One remedy of the assignee if he claims the property, is to apply to the state court and set up his rights and there litigate them; and possibly he may bring in the federal court actions to test his rights, which do not look to the possession of the property. See Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wall. 551; Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 40; also, cases cited in Townsend v. Leonard, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 69; Johnson v. Bishop, 1 Woolw. 324; Cragin v. Thompson, 2 Dillon C. C. 513.

KANSAS CITY, February 13, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—On January 1, 1869, A. conveyed lot 1 to B. in trust for the benefit of C., to secure him in the payment of a promissory note. C., on July 1st, 1869, after the maturity of his note, for full value, assigned it to F., and shortly thereafter entered upon the margin of the record full satisfaction for the trust deed. On September 1, 1869, A., by deed of general warranty, conveyed said lot, for a valuable consideration, to H., who in every sense became a bona fide purchaser, and is now in possession of the lot. On January 1st, 1870, at the request of F., who was still the legal holder of the note, B. sold the lot under the trust deed and F. became the purchaser.

1. Had C., under Wagner's Statutes, p. 956, §. 14, legal capacity to enter satisfaction of the trust deed?

2. Can F. recover in ejectment?

3. Has F. in equity any ground for setting aside the entry of satisfaction as against H.? ——. ——.

ANSWER.—As a rule we must decline to answer questions depending upon local statutes, and which may be in actual litigation. We have not the benefit of arguments which are necessary to the formation of intelligent opinions. The questions put by our correspondent might depend upon whether it was the duty of F. to take and record an assignment of the mortgage or deed of trust, and this might be affected by the local registry laws. As to the general rules of law applicable to deeds of trust and sales and titles thereunder, see 2 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 641, 705; Ibid, 449.

As to the necessity of registration of assignments of mortgages, see the cases cited and stated by Mr. Hilliard in the fourth edition of his valuable work on mortgages, pp. 537, 579, 580, 581 and notes. As to release and discharge of mortgages, see Ib. ch. 17, pp. 473—529.

Book Notices.

A TREATISE ON THE CRIMINAL LAW OF THE UNITED STATES. By FRANCIS WHARTON, LL.D., author of "Conflict of Laws," etc. Seventh and Revised Edition. Phila.: Kay & Bro. 1874; 3 vols. §§ 3542. Sold by Soule, Thomas & Wentworth, St. Louis.

In 1846, James Kay & Brother published, in one comparatively small volume, the first edition of Wharton's American Criminal Law. The house of Kay & Brother have just published the seventh edition of the same work in three large and handsome volumes, revised by its learned author. To publisher and author alike, the proofs of the great and deserved popularity of the work cannot be other than exceedingly gratifying. More than three-and-twenty years ago we became practically familiar with the first edition, and have noted since then the gradual expansion and constant improvement of the work under the skilful and pains-taking care of its author. It is not probable that its structure will be hereafter changed; and when we consider that it has not been excogitated at once, but has been gradually thought out and constructed by its author during a period of over a quarter of a century, and that it embraces the entire domain of Criminal Jurisprudence, it may confidently be affirmed that it is destined to remain as one of the principal works upon the subject of which it treats.

The first volume of this edition is devoted to Principles, Pleading, and Evidence. The second volume treats of Specific Crimes, and the matter of the second and third volumes of prior editions is here compressed into one. This makes room for a third volume, which is substantially new, and is appropriated to Criminal Practice. Upon each of these departments the work constitutes a complete treatise. While Mr. Wharton's work does not supersede other useful treatises, English and American, upon Criminal Law and Procedure, yet it is at the same time true that there is no complete substitute for it.

It is useless to refer at length to a work so well known and in such universal use. We must content ourselves with a brief glance at what is peculiar to the present edition. The new arrangement of the work we have already indicated. In every part of this edition the careful presence of the author is observable. While the work retains its former character of practical usefulness, this edition is distinguished by its copious reference to the criminal jurisprudence of other countries, ancient and modern, and in this important respect the work has been so enriched by the researches and learning of the author, that it will hereafter rank as one of the legal classics in American law, and will be consulted, not only by the busy lawyer and judge in the press of trials, but by the philosophical student, who aspires beyond mere precedent, and wishes to attain those enlarged views which can come only from comparative jurisprudence, or an examination of those systems and principles of law which have prevailed among enlightened nations in successive periods of the world's history.

Digitized by Google

Recent Reports.

REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF INDIANAPOLIS. By O. M. WILSON, official reporter. Judges: Hon. SOLOMON BLAIR, Hon. HORATIO C. NEWCOMB, Hon. FREDERICK RAND. Single copy, quarterly, $1; Vol. 1, four parts, with fifth part, making index, etc., $4.

The superior court of Indianapolis is organized on a plan similar to the supreme court of New York. The judges sit separately at nisi prius, or at "Special Term," and then meet in "General Term," and review causes appealed from "Special Term." These Reports, therefore, possess a value similar to Barbour's New York Reports. They will be of some value to the practitioner in Indiana; and outside of that state we suppose the cases contained in them will stand on their intrinsic merits, and will not possess less persuasive force because they are not decisions of the court of last resort. The reporter has annotated each case with a diligence which is commendable, and for which we fear he will never be adequately paid.

We notice the following cases as possessing general interest:

Assault and Battery—Aiding and Abetting.—Liability for assault, extends not only to persons committing the act, but as well to those who are present and encourage either its commission, or its continuance. Baldwin v. Biersdorfer, 1.

———. ———. Presence at the commission of an offence, and encouragement, either by words, signs, or gestures, or being sufficiently near, in pursuance of an agreement to assist, is aiding and abetting in the commission of the wrongful act. Ibid.

———. ———. Conspiracy.—Where the evidence discloses the presence of others in a situation to render aid, the jury may determine whether such persons were not there for the purpose connected with the assault, and from such circumstances and facts they may properly infer the formation of a conspiracy for its commission. Ibid.

Assignment of Debt—Collateral Security.—An assignment of a debt carries with it all collaterals given to secure its payment. Kemp v. Dickson, 42.

———. ———. An assignment of a note, "without recourse," will not release the collateral given to secure the payment of the note, unless so stipulated at the time of assignment, and without such agreement, the security passes with the note. Ibid.

———. ———. A person holding collaterals to secure the paymen of a debt, holds them simply as a special trustee. Ibid.

———. ———. Admission of Agent.—Where a statement is made by the assignor to the agent of the assignee, pending the negotiation for the note, that he held a certificate as collateral for the security of the payment of the note—held, that such an admission is competent evidence to show notice to the assignee of such security, when he purchased the note. Ibid.

Contracts—Presumption—Parol.—Where the complaint does not aver that a contract is in writing, the presumption is that it was by parol. Smith v. Indianapolis, Peru & Chicago Railway Co., 88.

False Imprisonment—Arrest of Insane Person.—If there is probable cause to believe that a person is insane, and is about to commit any mischief, which, if committed by a sane person, would constitute a criminal offence, an officer may detain the offender until it may reasonably be presumed that he has changed his purpose. Pætz v. Dain, 150.

———. Parties acting at the instance of any one assuming the duties of a ministerial office, are bound to know whether he is in fact such officer, and whether he in fact bears that authority. Thus, persons who, in obedience to the orders of one who claimed to be a "special constable," had imprisoned the plaintiff, were held liable in damages for a false imprisonment, it not appearing that the constable's appointment had been recorded on the justice's docket, as required by the statute. Schaw v. Dietricks, 153.

Innkeeper—Liability of, for Property Stolen from Guests.—The "rules" of a hotel requiring "money, jewelry, and other valuables" to be deposited in the safe of the office, do not apply to a watch which a guest has on his person, and keeps for his personal use, and which is essential to his personal comfort and convenience. Milford v. Wesley, 119.

———. ———. Where a guest is told by the innkeeper, or his servant, "not to lock the door; for other parties had to come into the room, to go to bed, and the door should be left unlocked for them;" or, "that he could either lock the door, and get up and let them in when they come"—held, that a lack of ordinary care can not be imputed to a guest, acting in obedience to such instruction—in leaving the door unlocked—and the innkeeper will be responsible for property stolen from such guest.

Mechanics' Lien—Conversion.—A mechanic may waive his lien by delivering the goods before payment, or accepting security for their price. His refusal to deliver on demand in the latter case, will not work a conversion of the goods manufactured, if such refusal was, by reason of his ignorance as to whether or not the debt was secured; nor can the person in such case making the demand, recover the price of the goods because of such refusal. Farman v. Ratcliff, 145.

———. ———. On a demand for goods, the payment of which has been secured at a distant day, the manufacturer, when he is not in a condition to know, will be entitled to a reasonable time to ascertain the character of such security, before delivering the goods. Ibid.

Municipal Corporation—Common Council.—The common council, so far as their administrative or ministerial duties extend, are agents of the city, and as such may contract, among other things, for street improvements. Sylvester v. Macauley, 19.

———. Jurisdiction of.—The jurisdiction of a common council is confined to that territory only which is within the boundaries of the city. Ibid.

———. ———. Improvements beyond City Limits.—The city council has no power to contract for improvements beyond the city limits, and no assessment will lie, therefore, against property-holders abutting such improvements. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. A person contracting for a street improvement has a right to presume that the council had used the proper diligence to acquaint themselves with the city boundaries. Ibid.

———. Liability of Members of Common Council for Exceeding their Authority.—Public agents exceeding, negligently using, or abusing their authority, are liable to the injured party, and members of the common council, as such, in carelessly authorizing improvements beyond their jurisdiction, become personally liable for the value of the work done in obedience to their authority and direction. It is not sufficient to show that they acted bona fide and in ignorance of the true city boundary. They are bound to the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence in acquainting themselves with the territorial limits of the city, and are supposed to know the limit of their power. Ibid.

———. Liability of Mayor.—But an affirmative participation in such unauthorized action of the council is necessary to attach responsibility for its acts. And therefore, the mayor of a city, under the laws of this state, who is ex officio president of the common council, and as such is required by law to attend their proceedings, and in case of an equal division, gives the casting vote, but in no other sense is he a part of the council; is not liable for the consequences of proceedings of the council in excess of its jurisdiction, simply because he signed the ordinance. Ibid.

———. Improvement of Streets.—The members of the common council of a city, in acting upon a petition for the improvement of a street, have a right to assume that the petition is made in good faith by the owners of real estate, who are willing to pay their share of the burden, and who desire the improvement, and that all the petitioners are uninfluenced by any combination by which a few, who are anxious for the improvement to be made, have agreed to pay a consideration, either directly or indirectly, to procure the signature of others to the petition. Maguire v. Smock, 92.

———. ———. Good Faith.—Good faith toward the owners of real estate, who are in the minority, and who are opposed to the improvement, and to having the burden imposed upon themselves, requires that the petitioners should all be willing to assume their due portion of the tax, and that they should not be paid a consideration for signing the petition. Ibid.

———. ———. An agreement by which a sum of money is guaranteed to be paid to certain persons, provided they will petition the common council of a city for the improvement of a street, is void, as against public policy, and cannot be enforced. Ibid.

———. ———. Pleading.—Where specific facts are set out in an answer, from which a legal inference arises that the agreement sued on is corrupt and void, as against public policy, it is not error to sustain a demurrer to a reply stating, in general terms, that the contract sued on was accepted, and the acts of the plaintiff in compliance with the agreement were done in good faith, without any desire or design to exercise a corrupt or fraudulent influence. Ibid.

Digitized by Google

———. Liability for Injuries Caused by Defects in Sidewalks.—All persons, in using the streets and sidewalks, have the right to assume that they are in a good and safe condition, and to regulate their conduct upon that assumption. Kenyon v. Indianapolis, 129.

———. ———. If a city permits the construction of a vault under a sidewalk, she must use due care and diligence to see that the vault is properly constructed, and the opening thereto securely and safely covered; and if constructed in a sidewalk, over which the city has exclusive control, the court will infer, in the absence of any allegations to the contrary, that it was constructed under a license from the city authorities. Ibid.

———. ———. Negligence.—Proof of the mere existence of a latent defect in a sidewalk in a city is not enough to charge the corporation with negligence; the corporation must in some way be in fault in connection with the defect; and if the defect does not originate in the construction, express notice of the defect, or negligence of duty in not ascertaining and remedying it, must be shown, else the city will not be liable to repair. Hence, it is not enough to entitle the plaintiff to recover, to prove that the covering was insecurely fastened at the time of the accident, and that, by reason thereof, and without fault on her part, she was injured. Ibid.

———. ———. ———. A liability only attaches to a municipal corporation where there has been a failure to remedy such defects as may be detected and removed by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence. Mere knowledge on the part of a few private citizens of a latent defect in a sidewalk, is not sufficient to charge the city with notice. Ibid.

Promissory Note—Release of Surety.—Defendant answered that plaintiff, without his knowledge, extended the time of payment for a consideration, and by so doing released him from further liability as surety. The plaintiff, in reply, declared: (1.) That no consideration was given for the extension; (2.) That defendant had received security from A. to indemnify him against loss on this note, and that he still held such security; (3.) That defendant, after extension of payment, consented to, ratified, approved, and confirmed such extension.

Held, on demurrer to these several issues—

(1.) That if the agreement to extend the time for payment was made without any valid consideration, it did not release the surety; (2.) That where the surety is fully secured by property in his hands, he is estopped from objecting to any extension of time made between creditor and principal; such security being, in effect, an appropriation by the surety of that portion of the effects of the principal to the payment of the debt. Bohring v. Root, 29.

———. Same Persons Joint Obligors and Obligees.—The firm of J. B. Randall & Co., which was composed of Randall, Lawyer and Hall, made their note to the order of the firm of Lawyer & Hall; said firm endorsed it to the First National Bank of Shelbyville, which bank was at the time aware of the relations the makers and endorsers have to each other. Said bank afterward sued Lawyer & Hall as endorsers, and recovered a judgment against them as such. Afterward, for a valuable consideration, said bank assigned said note to plaintiff, who instituted this suit against Randall, Lawyer and Hall, as makers. Held, That Lawyer & Hall could not maintain a suit at law on the note against Randall as maker, because the same persons cannot occupy the positions of both obligor and obligee: but they can endorse it to a third party, who can maintain such action against all the makers. [See 11 Metc. (Mass.) 398; 17 Pickering, 361; 18 Ohio, 305; 5 Cowen, 688.] Merchants' National Bank v. Randall, 166.

———. ———. Merger.—The doctrine of merger does not apply to such a case; the judgment in favor of the bank against Lawyer & Hall as endorsees did not merge the note so that suit cannot be maintained against Randall as maker.

Railways—Negligence.—Where a person approaches a line of railroad that for some distance is to be seen from, and in direction of, a highway which he is traveling, and the railroad crosses, and such person fails to use all reasonable means to ascertain whether a train is near, or that it would be safe to cross the track without stopping to look and investigate the probabilities of danger, and goes upon the track, and is injured by a passing train, he is guilty of negligence, and cannot recover damages. Stout v. Indianapolis & Saint Louis R. R. Co., 80.

———. Contracts of.—Where parties living adjacent to a railroad track made the grade, and furnished the cross-ties for a switch for neighborhood convenience, under a contract with the railroad company that the switch should remain permanently, etc., held: That after the road and franchises of the contracting company had been sold under a decree of foreclosure, the corporation purchasing the same might remove the switch, unless it assumed the original contract under sec. 3 of the railroad act of March 3, 1865. Smith v. Indianapolis, Peru & Chicago Railway Co., 88.

Taxation—Municipal Purposes.—A special school tax levied pursuant to section 12 of the school law of March 6, 1865, does not exempt bank stock by virtue of section 9 of the bank tax act, approved March 15, 1867, which provides that "Nothing in this or any other act shall be so construed as to authorize the taxation of stock in the Bank of the State of Indiana, or in any national bank, for municipal purposes." The term "municipal purposes," as used in that act, has no application to township taxes, nor to special school taxes levied by trustees of townships, or by school trustees of incorporated cities, as special school taxes, under the authority conferred by section 12, supra, of the act of 1865. Such taxes are levied pursuant to the general law of the state, and for purposes connected with the general internal administration of the state, or to carry out the general common school system, and do not come within the definition of municipal taxes. Root v. Erdelmeyer, 99.

Trade Mark.—A party purchasing part of a trade mark, and adopting the rest, will be protected in his title to the former as well as the latter. Sohl v. Geisendorf, 60.

———. The use of some word, letter or character of a trade mark, by different parties, without hindrance, will not work an abandonment by him in whom its right of use and title is vested. Ibid.

———. A trade mark composed of such devices as denote simply quality of an article, will be protected, especially if it is once established. Ibid.

———. It is an infringement of a trade mark, even though the imitation and original, when placed side by side, would not mislead, if the similarity is such that a difference would not be noticed when seen at different times or places. Ibid.

Trespass upon Realty—Adverse Possession.—Where no adverse possession is shown, a plaintiff in an action for trespass upon realty, may recover without showing previous possession. Carter v. Augusta Gravel Road Company, 14.

———. ———. Complaint.—A complaint in trespass, simply declaring for damages by adverse possession, and for removal of buildings, does not raise the question of title to the real estate. Ibid.

———. ———. Justification—Pleading.—Where the defendant in an action of trespass justifies by reason of some title or easement, which gives him a legal right to do the act which is the subject of the action, he must set forth the title or right to enjoy the easement specially. Ibid.

Adverse Entry—Presumption.—An adverse entry is not to be presumed, but must be proven. Ibid.

Witnesses—Competency—Husband and Wife.—A husband who acted as an agent for his wife, in the transaction of her business, is not a competent witness in a suit brought by the wife, to prove the transactions of such agency. Kemp v. Dickson, 42.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE house judiciary committee, through Mr. Butler, has reported adversely on the memorial asking for an acknowledgment of Almighty God and the christian religion in the constitution of the United States.

—THE Washington Chronicle contains a long "opinion" of Hon. Caleb Cushing, dated December 16, 1872, upon the obligations of the United States in the matter of public improvements in the City of Washington. Now let us get some western lawyer to write an opinion upon the obligation of the government to improve the navigation of the Mississippi river and its tributaries.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MARCH 5, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

Bankrupt Act — Fraudulent Preference—Action of the San Francisco Merchants.

Soon after the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Wilson v City Bank, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 40, Judge HOFFMAN, of the federal district court for California, sitting in bankruptcy, rendered a decision holding in accordance therewith, that the simple fact that a debtor's property is attached by a creditor, is not sufficient ground for forcing the debtor into bankruptcy. We have not seen the decision itself, but the Alta California newspaper speaks of it as follows:

"It has been a recognized rule of law, that a debtor who allowed his goods to be attached, committed an act of bankruptcy. To prevent undue preference to any creditor, under that interpretation of the law, the San Francisco Commercial Association was formed. When a debtor was attached, he was put into bankruptcy by the Association, in which case all creditors shared alike, each receiving an equal share of the assets. This course often led to settlements, which proved alike beneficial to the debtor and creditors. It spoiled any attempt at collusion between an individual creditor and the debtor, by which the former would have a preference over the other creditors. But it sometimes happened that debtors were attached on disputed claims, and at the time of such attachment were solvent. In such a case it would be a great grievance to compel them to go into bankruptcy. There are other circumstances which may prompt the attachment of a debtor, and in any case, under the old law or rulings of courts, he was thrown into the bankrupt court, with the certainty of coming out bankrupt, even if solvent when the proceedings were commenced. The recent decision by which Judge HOFFMAN was governed in giving judgment in a case of bankruptcy is to the effect that a bona fide attachment—one in which there is no collusion between debtor and creditor—is not sufficient to obtain an order of adjudication in bankruptcy against the debtor. This view of the law is said to have been long entertained by Judge HOFFMAN, but he followed the opinion of the Supreme Court until that tribunal changed its views on the question.

The effect of this ruling appears to have been to reverse a course of practice which had obtained in that court for six years, according to which the levying of an attachment upon the goods of a debtor was almost universally followed by an adjudication in bankruptcy, in which all the creditors shared alike. It seems that this decision was the first intimation which the business men of San Francisco had had of the conclusion of the federal supreme court in Wilson v. City Bank, and as soon as it became known, it created a very general consternation among them. The secretary of their Commercial Association called a meeting of that body to take action in reference to the matter, at which much discussion took place, mostly of a temperate character, all the speakers agreeing that unless the decision could be obviated in some way, it would work great injury to the mercantile community. Several plans were proposed for this purpose, the chief one being that the merchants should agree to give credit only where the purchaser would give his note for the amount of the bill, payable one day after date. It was said that if this were done, and the debtor's goods should be attached by another creditor, demand could at once be made upon the note, and in case of non-payment the creditor would be able to commence proceedings in bankruptcy within fourteen days thereafter under the present law. This plan, as well as several others, was submitted to a committee, who at a subsequent meeting reported adversely upon them all. The final result of the deliberations of the merchants was to appoint a committee to employ counsel and memorialize the legislature of the state to so modify the attachment law, that upon one creditor's attaching the goods of a debtor, all other creditors may attach, and share pro rata in the distribution of the money realized from the sale of his assets.

The North Carolina Special Tax Bonds.

The telegraph states that suits were instituted on the 7th ult. in the supreme court of Wake county, North Carolina, by August Belmont & Co., bankers, of New York city, as plaintiffs, to compel the state auditor to collect the special tax bonds for the payment of interest for the years 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873 and 1874. The 20th day of February was set by Judge WATTS for hearing at chambers, in Raleigh, the motion for a peremptory mandamus. Hon. Reverdy Johnson, Walter J. Budd, and R. C. Badger were to have appeared for the plaintiffs. Should the state courts decide adversely to the plaintiffs, it is the intention of counsel to carry the case to the Supreme Court of the United States.

A correspondent of the New York Evening Post describes these securities as follows:

"The 'Special tax' bonds, of which there are outstanding $11,400,000, were issued during the years 1868 and 1869 to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and special taxes (hence their name) were imposed on all the taxable property in the state, by the several acts of the general assembly creating them to meet the interest as it accrued, and to create a sinking fund to provide for the payment of the principal at maturity. This feature of a special tax is peculiar to this class of bonds of the state, and was required to be embodied in the acts authorizing them by the constitution. A subsequent legislature repealed the special tax clauses, and directed the public treasurer to apply the money then in his hands, that had been collected to pay the coupons due the first year of their issue, to general governmental expenses."

The same correspondent states that "the suits of Self v. The Public Treasurer, argued at the November, 1873, term of the United States circuit court, held in Raleigh, were instituted to compel the defendant to replace to the credit of the special tax fund these moneys. Although the injunction prayed was refused, because it was not shown that any irreparable injury was likely to occur by reason of any proposed action of defendant, yet the counsel for the bondholders are confident of obtaining the replacement of this money at the final hearing. The question of the constitutionality of the bonds, involved in these suits, was raised and passed upon by the court. They were declared valid issues, and the repealing acts void, because obnoxious to that clause of the constitution of the United States which forbids a state to pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract."

Digitized by Google

It is scarcely probable that the judge could have "passed upon" the validity of these bonds on the hearing of an application for a preliminary injunction for the purpose above stated—at least without granting the injunction. The decision of the supreme court of North Carolina in the case of The University Railroad Co. v. Holden, 63 N. C. 410 (1869), is understood by some as affirming the validity of this series of bonds. That case was an application for a mandamus to compel the auditor of the state to issue $300,000 in bonds of the state to the directors of the railroad company, who had been created a corporate body for the purpose of building the railroad for the state. The application was refused, principally upon two grounds: (1) that the company was not in esse at the time of the legislative grant, and that consequently there was no grantee capable of receiving the donation; and (2) because the constitution of the state does not empower the legislature, without the sanction of a vote of the people, to authorize the issuance of the bonds of the state for the purpose of building new railroads, but only to aid in completing railroads already commenced. The five judges delivered separate opinions, in which they discuss at length the effect of the restrictions imposed by the new constitution of the state upon the exercise of the taxing power by the legislature. Whether this decision can be quoted as sustaining the validity of the series of bonds known as the "special tax bonds" would seem to depend upon the purposes for which the bonds were issued. If they were issued to aid in the completion of railroads which had been commenced at the time of the adoption of the present constitution of North Carolina (1868), the reasoning of a majority of the judges supports their validity. But if they were issued in aid of new railroad projects, where the question has not been submitted to a vote of the people, the reverse would seem to be true.

It had been previously decided in the case of Galloway v. Jenkins, 63 N. C. 147, by PEARSON, Ch. J., and RODMAN and DICK, JJ., but against the views of READE and SETTLE, JJ., that the legislature had no power, without the sanction of a vote of the people, to contract a debt to aid in the construction of a new railroad owned by private individuals. The University Railroad case (supra) goes further, and holds (the judges being divided in opinion in the same manner) that the legislature cannot contract a debt for the purpose of building a new railroad to be owned by the state. Judge SETTLE, however, states that although he dissented from the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in Galloway v. Jenkins, yet he regards that decision as res judicata, and does not seek to disturb it.

The questions involved in the causes pending in the federal and state tribunals, as above stated, possess peculiar interest, not only because of the great amount at stake, but also because of the fact that they involve what seems to be an attempt to coerce a sovereign state into the payment of its supposed obligations. We shall endeavor to acquaint our readers with the result at the earliest period.

Master and Servant — Fellow-servants — Negligence—Liability of Master to Servant.

We publish elsewhere in this number the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States on the general subjects indicated in the title, which was recently given in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad v. Fort, and in a note thereto the opinion of the same court in the case of the Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. McCue. Both opinions were prepared by Mr. Justice DAVIS, and they will be read with great interest by the profession, who will not fail to approve the sound, salutary and liberal doctrine so clearly declared in Fort's case.

We avail ourselves of the occasion to make some editorial observations on the more important aspects of the general subject of the Liability of Masters to Servants. The courts of Great Britain and America have established the general doctrine of the non-liability of the employer for an injury to one servant caused by the negligence of another servant in the same common employment. In England this doctrine has been affirmed time and time again by every court in Westminster Hall, and finally by the house of lords after full argument by able counsel and upon the most deliberate consideration. Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, 3 Macqueen App. Cas. 266. The first case was Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1. In Holmes v. Clarke (itself an important case on this subject), 7 Hurl. & N. 937, 947, 1862, Mr. Justice BYLES remarks: "The case of Priestley v. Fowler introduced a new chapter into the law, but that case has since been recognized by all the courts, including the court of error and the house of lords. So that the doctrine there laid down, with all the consequences fairly deducible from it, are part of the law of the land."

In a very recent case this rule is said to be "conclusively settled." Feltham v. England, Law Rep. 2 Queen's Bench, 33, 1866. In this case MELLOR, J., says that "this rule is not altered by the fact that the servant to whom the negligence is imputed was a servant of superior authority, whose lawful directions the plaintiff was bound to obey."

In another case it is said: "A foreman is a servant as much as the other servants whose work he superintends." Per WILLES, J., in Gallagher v. Piper, 111 Eng. C. L. 669, 1864. Further, as to who are "fellow-servants" within the rule, see Wigmore v. Jay, 5 Wellsby, Hurl. & Gord. 354, 1850; Skipp v. Eastern Counties Railway Co., 9 ib. 221; Wiggett v. Fox, 11 ib. 832; Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266; Waller v. South, etc., Railway Co., 2 H. & C. 102; Gallagher v. Piper, 111 Eng. C. L. 669; Morgan v. Vale, etc., Railway Co., 5 B. &. S. 570, 736; Tunney v. Midland, etc., Railway Co., Law Rep. 1 C. P. 291; Lovegrove v. London, etc., Railway Co., 16 C. B. N. S. 669. See Murphy v. Smith, 19 C. B. N. S. 361, as to servant being considered as the master's representative in the establishment. On this last point see, also, remarks of Mr. Justice DAVIS in Fort's case to the effect that Collett, who had been entrusted by the railroad company with the care and management of dangerous machinery, was the representative of the company, which was liable "either upon the maxim of respondeat superior or upon the obligations arising out of the contract of service" for Collett's wrongful order to the plaintiff—that order relating to a duty within the scope of Collett's employment and outside the scope of the plaintiff's engagement, and wholly disconnected with it.

Digitized by Google

In this country the general rule is recognized as the law by the courts of, perhaps, every state which has passed upon the question, except where it is changed by statute. The only dispute is as to the extent of the rule, or rather as to the cases to which it is justly applicable. It is not necessary to cite the American cases; they will be found mostly collected in the Treatise of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence. We do not recollect any case in the Supreme Court of the United States, either directly sustaining or rejecting the general doctrine. It is noticeable, however, that in the case of the Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. McCue, decided at the present term, Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, remarks: "It is insisted on the part of the plaintiff in error, that a master is not responsible to a servant for injuries caused by the negligence or misconduct of a fellow-servant in the same general business;" but "whether this general proposition be true or not, it is not necessary to determine in the state of this record." And in Fort's case the same learned justice observes: "It was assumed on behalf of the plaintiff in error, on the argument of this cause, that the master is not liable to one of his servants for injuries resulting from the carelessness of another, when both are engaged in a common service, although the injured person was under the control and direction of the servant who caused the injury. Whether this proposition, as stated, be true or not, we do not propose to consider, because, if true, it has no application to this case."

This language would lead to the inference that the Supreme Court may entertain doubts as to the soundness of the rule under discussion. But as the general doctrine is so firmly rooted by judicial decision in Great Britain and in the different state courts of this country, as it is one which pertains to general jurisprudence, and involves no question of federal law, it would seem that it is no more open to re-agitation in a federal court than in any other court of common law powers.

We next mention some exceptions to the rule, or cases which are not considered as falling within its reasons, and to which, therefore, it does not apply. We consider it to be settled, both in England and America, that the master is bound to use ordinary care to employ, or to retain in his employment, none but competent servants, and to use like care to furnish and maintain suitable and safe machinery and structures. Bartonshill Coal Co. v. Reid, supra; Tarrant v. Webb, 18 C. B. 797; Weems v. Mathieson, 4 Macqueen 215; Clarke v. Holmes, supra; and see cases next cited. We also consider that view to be correct, and regard it as quite conclusively settled by the courts, that this duty of the master is so far personal and inalienable that responsibility for injuries directly caused by the negligent discharge of it exists, although the master may for his own convenience act through other servants. On this subject see the following very recent cases in addition to those last cited: Brothers v. Cartter, 52 Mo. 372, 1873, and cases cited by WAGNER, J.; Gilman v. Eastern Railroad Co., 10 Allen, 233; S. C. 13 Allen 433, and cases cited by GRAY, J.; Laning v. N. Y. Central R. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 521, 1872. And the reason is that this duty of the master is direct and personal, and must be discharged in person or by others for him, for whose negligent acts and omissions he is responsible where these are the immediate cause of injury to his servants.

On this point we call attention to the following observations of Mr. Justice DAVIS in Fort's case: "It is apparent, from these findings, if the rule of the master's exemption from liability for the negligent conduct of a co-employee in the same service be as broad as is contended for by the plaintiff in error, that it does not apply to such a case as this. This rule proceeds on the theory that the employee, in entering the service of the principal, is presumed to take upon himself the risks incident to the undertaking, among which are to be counted the negligence of fellow-servants in the same employment, and that considerations of public policy require the enforcement of the rule. But this presumption cannot arise where the risk is not within the contract of service, and the servant had no reason to believe he would have to encounter it. If it were otherwise, principals would be released from all obligations to make reparation to an employee in a subordinate position for any injury caused by the wrongful conduct of the person placed over him, whether they were fellow-servants in the same common service or not. Such a doctrine would be subversive of all just ideas of the obligations arising out of the contract of service, and withdraw all protection from the subordinate employees of railroad corporations. These corporations, instead of being required to conduct their business so as not to endanger life, would, so far as this class of persons were concerned, be relieved of all pecuniary responsibility in case they failed to do it. A doctrine that leads to such results is unsupported by reason and cannot receive our sanction."

In this connection an important practical question may be adverted to, and that is, as to the effect of knowledge on the part of the servant injured that the master had not discharged his duty in providing competent fellow-servants or fit and safe materials or machinery. The following are the more important cases on this point: Watling v. Oastler, Law Rep. 6 Excheq. 73, 1871; Senior v. Ward, 1 El. & El. 385 (102 Eng. C. L. 384); Dynen v. Leach, 26 L. J. 221; S. C. 40 Eng. L. and Eq. 491; Assop v. Yates, 2 H. & N. 768; Griffiths v. Gidlow, 3 H. & N. 648; Smith v. Dowell, 3 F. & F. 238; Laning v. N. Y. Central R. R., 49 N. Y. 521, 1872 (full discussion); Frazier v. Penn. R. R. Co., 38 Penn. St. 104; Davis v. Detroit, etc., R. R. Co., 20 Mich. 105, 127, 1870, where the cases are referred to and the subject fully examined by COOLEY, J.; Hayden v. Manufacturing Co. 29 Conn. 548, 1861; Buzzell v. Manufacturing Co., 48 Maine, 113; Jones v. Yeager, 2 Dillon C. C. 65, 68. They authorize the deduction of the general rule that if the plaintiff voluntarily continue in the master's service with full knowledge of the incompetency of the co-servant, or of the unfit and defective machinery, and of the danger thereby occasioned, this will be considered such "contributory negligence" on his part as to defeat his right to recover unless upon some special ground, as in Holmes v. Clark, (6 Hurl. and N. 349, affirmed 7 ib. 937), where the servant made complaint, and the master thereupon promised that the grounds of it should be removed. This rule, that knowedge by the servant injured of the danger will disentitle him to recover if he voluntarily remains in the service without complaint, clearly applies to a case where it is the duty of the servant himself to inform the master or superior of the co-servant's unfitness, or the unfitness of the materials or structures. The reason for this exemption of the master from responsibility, would not seem to apply where the servant injured could not reasonably be held to know the danger to which the master's neglect of duty exposed him. It seems to us that some of the cases have asserted rather too rigid a rule against the servant, arising out of his knowledge of the neglect of the personal duty of the master as respects co-servants and materials, and his supposed acquiescence in it; and there are aspects of this subject that need to be further discussed and decided before the law can be regarded as settled.

Digitized by Google

Execution Sales—Publication in Attachment Suits—Conclusive Effect of Attachment Proceedings—Sheriff's Deed—Opinions of Supreme Court—Obiter Dicta—Ejectment—Practice with reference to Dower and Quarantine where Defendant dies pending Suit.

KANE v. McCOWN, et al.

Supreme Court of Missouri, January Term, 1874.

Hon. WASH ADAMS,
" DAVID WAGNER,
" W. B. NAPTON,
" H. M. VORIES,
" A. T. SHERWOOD, } Judges.

1. Execution Sales—Court House.—Where the regular court house cannot be used and another building at the county seat is procured, in which the circuit court holds its session, execution sales made at such building are valid, and would be invalid if made at the deserted court house.

2. ——. By Sheriff after Expiration of Term of Office.—Where a sheriff who has made a levy of an execution goes out of office by reason of the expiration of his term, he has the power to retain the execution and proceed to advertise, sell and make a deed to the property levied upon, or he may turn the same over to his successor; and a sale made by either officer is valid.

3. ——. If Court not held at Return Term.—Where a sale is not made at the return term of an execution which has been duly levied, by reason of no term of court being held, the execution does not become functus officio, and the sale may be made at any subsequent term of court without any writ of venditioni exponas.

4.—Attachment Suits—Publication.—The statute (Revised Statutes 1855, page 246, section 23; Session Laws 1859-60, page 4) authorizes the clerk, in vacation, after the return term, to make an order for publication in suits by attachment where the court should have made such order in term time, but has omitted to do so.

5. ——. ——. Failure to Designate Paper.—The newspaper selected by the court, judge or clerk making an order of publication, in which to publish the same, need not be designated in the order, and a failure to designate such paper will not render the judgment void.

6. ——. Validity of Judgments.—In attachment suits against non-residents the court acquires jurisdiction by the seizure of the property under a valid writ. There is then a case in court, and if every point arising subsequently is erroneously decided, the judgment is nevertheless valid, and can only be questioned in a direct proceeding. (Freeman v Thompson, July Term, 1873, reviewed and affirmed.)

7.—Sheriff's Deed—Amendment of.—Where a sheriff's deed erroneously recites the date of a judgment the error may be corrected in open court, and in such case no new acknowledgment of the deed is necessary.

8. ——. Delivery Presumed.—Where a sheriff's deed is duly executed and acknowledged, and the title of the purchaser in such deed is vested in a third party by decree of a court of equity, a delivery by the sheriff to the purchaser will be presumed, and no formal delivery is necessary.

9.—Supreme Court Opinions—Obiter Dicta.—Although the decision by this court of a single point may be decisive of the whole case, still an opinion upon other questions presented by the record is not an obiter dictum; and this is the more satisfactory practice, as it tends to prevent repeated resort to the appellate court.

10.—Ejectment—Practice upon Death of Defendant—Dower—Quarantine. Where in an action of ejectment against a party whose title has been vested in the plaintiff by an execution sale, such party dies during the pendency of the action, and his widow, who is entitled to dower and quarantine, is made a party defendant, the suit may proceed to judgment for plaintiff, and the rights of the widow will be secured by ordering a stay of execution until dower is assigned.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Johnson & Botsford, for Kane; Russell Hicks, for McCown, et al.

NAPTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action of ejectment. The defendants are the widow and heirs of James McCown. The suit was originally against McCown, but, on his death, proceeded against his widow and children. It was revived against the widow as administratrix, and against the minor children, who filed answers by their guardian ad litem.

The defendant, Caroline McCown, set up her dower rights, and her right to remain in the mansion house of her husband until dower was assigned. There was a replication to the answer denying that McCown died seized of the premises, and also averring that his mansion house and the messuage and plantation adjoining embraced only a portion of the land sued for.

The title of the plaintiff is based upon two deeds made by the sheriff under sales made under six special judgments in attachment and executions thereon. One of the deeds is directly to plaintiff; the other is to one Calhoun, and is accompanied with a decree of the circuit court of Johnson county, vesting the title of Calhoun in plaintiff. The deed to the plaintiff recited a judgment in a suit by attachment in favor of H. C. Grove, rendered April 21, 1864, upon which a special execution was ordered and was issued Sept. 4, 1865; and a judgment in a suit by attachment in favor of Sarah Colburn, rendered April 21, 1864, upon which a special execution was ordered and issued Sept. 4, 1865; and a judgment in attachment in favor of one Marr, rendered April 21, 1864, and an execution ordered and issued as in the other cases; and a judgment in favor of Calhoun of the same date, and the execution dated as above.

These four executions, it is recited in the deed, were delivered to the sheriff on the 12th of September, 1865, and that after advertising the land levied on, said lands were sold to plaintiff on October 17, 1865, and that the sale took place before the court house door and while the circuit court was in session.

Objections were made to this deed on the ground that the sale took place at the door of a church or meeting house in the town of Warrensburg, where the circuit court was held, such building being then used as a court house, and the fact that the sale did so take place was proved.

It seems that the court house was occupied by federal troops, and was otherwise unfitted for holding court, and the court was held in a building distant some hundred yards or more from the court house.

The second deed offered by plaintiff was to Calhoun. It recited a judgment in an attachment suit in favor of one St. John, rendered April 21, 1864, upon which an execution issued September 15, 1864, and made returnable at the October term; and no October term being held, the execution was delivered to the sheriff on February 9, 1865; and a judgment in an attachment suit in favor of Colburn, rendered April 21, 1865, on which a special execution issued September 16, 1864, made returnable to the October term, 1864, and this term not being held, this execution was delivered to the sheriff February 9, 1865; and a judgment in a proceeding by attachment in favor of Sarah Colburn, rendered April 21, 1864, on which a special execution was issued September 16, 1864, returnable to the October term 1864, and as no such term was held, the writ was delivered to the sheriff Feb. 9, 1865; and a judgment in attachment in favor of John Marr, rendered April 21, 1864, upon which a special execution issued February 8, 1865, returnable to the April term, 1865; and a judgment in favor of William Calhoun, rendered April 21, 1864, upon which a special execution issued February 8, 1865, returnable April term, 1865. This deed further recites the levy, advertisement and sale, and purchase by plaintiff.

The principal objections to this second deed are that the executions on the judgments in favor of St. John and Colburn were issued in September, 1864, and were returnable to the October term, and not having been executed, were handed over to the successor of the sheriff to whom they were directed, and executed by said successor. The first officer had levied on land under the writs. It is claimed that these executions were dead in February, 1865. It is further objected to this deed that the deed had never been delivered to Calhoun. To sustain this objection, Calhoun was examined and stated that he knew nothing of the deed. To obviate this objection the plaintiff read the record of a proceeding in the common pleas court of Johnson county, in which the present plaintiff Kane was plaintiff and William Calhoun defendant, which resulted in a decree to transfer Calhoun's title to the said plaintiff.

Digitized by Google

The orders of publication in this case were made by the clerk in vacation, and are as follows:

H. C. Grove, plaintiff,
v.
James McCown, def't.

In the Circuit Court of Johnson County. In vacation, January 23, 1864.

Now, on this 28th day of July, 1862, comes the plaintiff in the above entitled cause, before the undersigned, clerk of the circuit court for the county of Johnson, in the state of Missouri, in vacation, and filed his petition and affidavit, stating among other things, that said defendant, James McCown, had absented himself from his usual place of abode in this state, so that the ordinary process of law could not be served on him, and that said defendant, W. H. Hart, is not a resident of this state.

It is therefore ordered by the said clerk, in vacation, that publication be made, notifying said defendants that an action has been commenced against them, by petition and attachment, in the circuit court of said county of Johnson, founded on a promissory note for the sum of seventy-five dollars, dated on the 10th day of November, 1860, and due sixty days after date, and made and delivered by said defendant to said plaintiff, and that the property of said McCown has been attached, and unless he be and appear at the next term of said court to be held at the court house in the town of Warrensburg on the 10th day of April, 1864, and on or before the 3d day of the term, if the term shall so long continue, if not, then before the end of the term, and plead to said petition, judgment will be rendered against him and his property sold to satisfy the same.

It is further ordered that a copy hereof be published in some newspaper printed in this state for four weeks successively, the last insertion to be at least four weeks before the commencement of the next term of this court.

S. P. WILLIAMS, Clerk.

The court, at the instance of plaintiff, declared the law to be as stated in the three following instructions:

1. If the court, sitting as a jury, finds from the evidence, that on the 21st day of April, 1864, certain special judgments were rendered in the circuit court of Johnson county, one of which judgments was in favor of H. C. Grove and against James McCown, one in favor of Sarah Colburn and against James McCown, one in favor of John Marr and against James McCown, and one in favor of William Calhoun and against said James McCown; and that the same were duly returned unsatisfied, either in whole or in part, and that afterwards alias special executions were issued upon the judgments aforesaid on the 4th day of September, 1865, and the same were duly delivered to the sheriff of Johnson county; and that in pursuance of the commands of said executions, the sheriff of Johnson county, after giving twenty days' notice of the time and place at which said real estate would be sold, afterwards, on the 17th day of October, 1865, exposed the same to sale at public auction, at the door of the building in which the circuit court of said county was then in session, and which building was then used and occupied as a court house in said county, and that at said sale the plaintiff, George Kane, became the purchaser of the land, to-wit (here the land is described): and that he has received a sheriff's deed to said land, duly executed and as read in evidence, then said sale and the deed so executed was sufficient to vest the legal title to said land in said Kane, and judgment for the possession of the real estate aforesaid should be found for the plaintiff.

2. If the court finds the executions recited in the sheriff's deed to William Calhoun, read in evidence on the part of the plaintiff, were issued as follows, to-wit: The one in favor of W. H. and G. W. Colburn, on September 16, 1864; the one in favor of Arthur St. John, September 15, 1864; and the one in favor of Sarah Colburn, in September, 1864; that the same were all made returnable to the October term of said court, 1864, and that the same were delivered to A. M. Christian, then sheriff of said county, and that he, on the day of September, 1864, levied the same on the real estate described in said deed, by endorsing his levy on the back thereof, and that for any cause said lands were not sold at the said October term of said court; and that afterwards, on the 9th day of February, 1865, said A. M. Christian delivered said executions to T. W. Williams, his successor in office, then said executions were sufficient authority for him to sell said land, at the time and in the manner stated in said deed, to said Calhoun.

3. If the court finds from the record in the case that this suit was brought against James McCown in his life-time, and that the said James McCown appeared and filed his answer herein; and that he, the said James McCown, afterwards departed this life, leaving Caroline F. McCown, his widow, and the other defendants herein, his heirs-at-law, and this suit was afterwards revived against the said Caroline F. McCown, as the administratrix of the said James McCown, and against the said other defendants as his heirs-at-law, then plaintiff is entitled to the like judgment for the possession of the premises as he would have been if the original defendant, James McCown, had not departed this life during the pendency of this action.

Defendants asked the court to make the following declarations of law, of which the 2d and 5th were given:

1. If the court finds from the evidence that the petitions and affidavits upon which the said several judgments recited in the said sheriff's deeds were rendered, were filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of said county in vacation, to-wit: In the case of W. H. and G. W. Colburn, June 14, 1862; in the case of St. John, June 20, 1862; in the case of Grove, June 28, 1862; in the case of Sarah Colburn, June 27, 1862; in the case of Calhoun, July 14, 1862; in the case of John Marr, July 14, 1862; and further find that a term of said court was held in October, 1862, at which time said papers were returned into said court; and that the only notices or orders of publication ever made or given in said cases to defendant, McCown, were made and issued by the clerk of said court in vacation, to-wit: In the case of Colburn, on January 22, 1864; in the case of St. John, on the same day; in case of said Grove, January 23, 1864; in case of Sarah Colburn, January 26, 1864; in case of said Calhoun, January 23, 1864; and in case of Marr, January 29, 1864, after said term of said court in October, 1862, then the clerk of said court had no authority to issue such orders of publication, and defendant was not legally notified of the pendency of said actions, or either of them; and the said several judgments afterwards rendered in said cases against said McCown, upon the proof of the publication of such notices, were and are null and void, and all subsequent proceeding were and are null and void; and the court should find the issues for the defendants.

2. If the court finds that said executions recited in the said sheriff's deed to Calhoun read in evidence, to-wit: That in favor of the Colburns was issued on the 16th of September, 1864; that in favor of St. John, September 15, 1864; that in favor of Sarah Colburn, September 16, 1864; and were all made returnable to the October term, 1864; that the same came into the hands of Sheriff T. W. Williams, on the 9th day of February, 1865, unexecuted by A. M. Christian, the former sheriff of said county, then said executions, and each of them, conferred no authority on Sheriff Williams to sell said land; and if the court so finds, then the executions in favor of said Colburn and Marr were the only ones that conferred any authority on the sheriff to sell the said land. And if the court finds that said sheriff sold said lands in the order of time in his said amended return specified, and that the sale of said southeast quarter of section 26, township 46, range 26, sold to said Union Bank for the sum of $680, the same was sufficient to satisfy and pay off said executions in favor of said Calhoun and Marr; and said sum so bid by the Union Bank and paid to said sheriff, was sufficient to pay said executions in favor of said Calhoun and Marr, as well as the judgments upon which they were issued; and all sales made by said sheriff after said executions were so satisfied, were and are null and void; and the sheriff's deed to Calhoun, for lands so sold after said executions were so satisfied, conferred no title on said Calhoun.

Digitized by Google

3. If the court finds from the evidence that the lands in controversy were sold by the sheriff of said county under executions, and that the said sales were made by the sheriff at the door of the church, some eighty yards or more distant from the court house, and that plaintiff claims title under such sales, then such sales were null and void, and the deeds made in pursuance thereof conveyed no title whatever.

4. If the court finds from the evidence and pleadings in this case, that said James McCown died possessed of the lands in controversy, and that the different tracts thereof were all contiguous to each other, and constituted the farm or plantation on which was situated the mansion house in which the said McCown some time before and at the time of his death, and in which Caroline F. McCown, one of the defendants, resided with him at the time of his death, as his wife, and where she since and now resides as his widow, and that her dower has never been assigned to her as the widow of said McCown, then the defendant Caroline is entitled to the possession of the lands in controversy, as against the claim of the said plaintiff Kane; and the court must find the issues for the defendant.

5. The court in this case declares the law to be, that according to the present condition of the pleadings it stands admitted herein, that the defendant, Caroline F. McCown, is the widow of James McCown, and that he departed this life about the 6th day of July, 1867; that at the time of his death the said McCown and his family, including the defendant, Caroline F. McCown, were, and for a long time had been, residing in the mansion house situate on the land in controversy; that the said defendant, Caroline, at the time of her said husband's death, resided with him at said mansion house; that the said Caroline, at the time of the death of the said James McCown, became, ever since has been, and now is, entitled to dower in the lands in controversy, and that dower never has been assigned or admeasured to her therein, or any part thereof.

6. The court declares the law to be, that if it finds from the evidence that the sheriff's deed, executed by Thos. W. Williams, sheriff of Johnson county, to the plaintiff, George Kane, purporting to convey part of the land in controversy, was by the said sheriff acknowledged in open court on the 20th day of April, 1866, and was thereafter delivered by said sheriff to said Kane, and was by him received on the 3d day of October, 1866, and was by him duly filed for record in the office of the recorder for Johnson county, and therein recorded; that afterwards said Thos. W. Williams, on the 17th day of October, 1871, at the instance and special request of said plaintiff, Kane, interpolated said deed by inserting over the ninth line of the third page of said deed, over and between the word "court" and the words "for the year 1864," so as to interpolate the year in which a judgment therein recited was rendered, which judgment was one under which said plaintiff claims title, and that said Thomas W. Williams, on the 17th day of October, 1871, at the instance and request of said plaintiff, Kane, interpolated said deed, by writing over the 21st line of the 6th page of said deed, over and between the word "court" and the words "for the year 1864," so as to interpolate the year in which a judgment recited in said deed was rendered in favor of William Calhoun, and under which judgment the plaintiff claims title; and that after said deed was so interpolated, the same was not thereafter acknowledged, then said interpolations were illegally made, and are a nullity, and the said deed is a nullity, and cannot convey any title to the lands n controversy, or any part thereof, to the said plaintiff.

7. The court declares the law to be, that if it finds from the evidence that the sheriff's deed, purporting to have been made by Thomas W. Williams, to William Calhoun, and under which the plaintiff claims title to a part of the land in controversy, was never ordered to be drawn or executed by the said Calhoun; that it was never delivered to said Calhoun; that it was never placed on record by the said Calhoun; then the deed cannot convey any title whatever to the lands in controversy, or any part thereof, to the said plaintiff, Kane.

The discussion in this case has embraced a variety of points, but they mainly depend on the following enquiries: 1st, whether the clerk had any power to order the publication which he did in January, 1864; 2d, whether the failure to designate the newspaper in the order rendered it void; 3d, whether the executions recited in the deed to Calhoun had expired before the sale, and if not, whether Williams, the successor of the sheriff, to whom they were directed, had power to make the sale; 4th, whether the sales at the door of the church, where the circuit court was being held at the time, were valid; 5th, whether the decree, in the case of Kane v. Calhoun, transferred Calhoun's title to plaintiff.

There were other points made and discussed, but they are minor and subordinate ones.

It will be seen that the order of publication in this case was made in January, 1864, upon a petition and affidavit filed in 1862, and it is insisted that under the 23d section of the attachment law of 1855, the power of the clerk to make an order in vacation ceased at the first session of the court after the issuance of the writ. This 23d section provides that if the plaintiff, or some one for him, files with his petition an additional affidavit, stating that all or a part of the defendants are non-residents or have abandoned, etc., the clerk, in vacation, shall order a publication. It further provides that when the defendant is not summoned, and the return of the sheriff shows that he cannot be, the court must order a publication. This section is very obscure and couched in terms scarcely intelligible; but the above is substantially its meaning, and it is insisted that after the term of the court which succeeds the filing of the petition, the authority of the clerk ceases.

It might be a question whether it did or not under this 23d section of the act of 1855, but in 1860, the legislature provided as follows: "If an attachment be obtained on either of the grounds specified in the first, third or fourth subdivisions of section 1 of the act to provide for suits by attachment, approved December 8, 1855, or if, after an attachment issued, an additional affidavit be filed alleging any fact embraced in these subdivisions, the clerk shall order a publication to be made as required in section 23 of article 1 of said act, and he may, in like manner, order publication, in any case in which, by said section, it is required to be ordered by the court."

Now this provision presents the anomaly of requiring a clerk to discharge the duties neglected by the court, and the clerk is to determine whether the court ought to have issued an order of publication or not. But the legislature clearly invests the clerk with the power to make orders of publication in all cases where the court should, in term, have made them, and this power is not limited to the vacation which precedes the first session after the filing of the petition. Whether the clerk, in this case, decided rightly or otherwise is of no importance, since he was invested with the power to decide, and did issue the order of publication.

A further objection to this order of publication is that the order does not designate the newspaper in which it was to be printed. The practice act of 1855 directed (Rev. Code of 1855, p. 1225) that "every order against non-resident, absent or unknown defendants, shall be published in some newspaper published in this state, which the court, judge or clerk, making the order, may designate as most likely to give notice to the person to be notified."

It is very clear that a designation by the court, clerk, or judge is required. But it is not clear that the designation must appear in the order of publication. If the court, or judge, or clerk should select a newspaper, manifestly designed to avoid giving notice to the party interested, or clearly proved to have been made with such a design, the order of publication would have no efficacy. In this case there was no proof as to the paper selected by the clerk, and although the order is objected to as not in itself specifying the newspaper, it is not attempted to be shown that the newspaper actually selected was not published within the state, or that it was not likely and most likely to give notice to the parties interested. In a collateral proceeding to nullify the judgment, and execution on it, presumptions are all in favor of the validity of the judgments and sales. The omission of the clerk to designate the particular newspaper was undoubtedly an error which may or may not have been fatal to the case in direct proceedings to review it, but cannot destroy the judgment in a collateral proceeding.

Digitized by Google

It is contended that the executions under which these sales were made had expired before they were executed. All the judgments were rendered in April, 1864, and the executions on them were returnable to the October term, 1864. No October term was held, the executions were levied, and as no sales could have been made in October, 1864, new executions, or writs venditioni exponas, were issued in February, 1865, returnable to the April term, 1865, or the writs were handed over to the sheriff elected and acting in 1865, to be completed after levy.

These objections have already been considered and decided in the cases of Stewart v. Severance, 43 Mo. 322, and Buchanan v. Tracy, 45 Mo. 437. The act of March 23, 1863, is considered as authorizing such sales after the return day of the writs.

The proper construction of the various sections of our execution law, which are substantially the same in the revised code of 1855, and that of 1865, from section 59 to section 63, is not entirely clear; but upon the whole we think the intention of the law was to require executions not completely executed to be handed over to and completed by the sheriff in office at the time of the sales. The 59th section does not prohibit this in the case of levies by a previous sheriff, although the 62d section undoubtedly authorizes the sheriff who levies the writ to go on and complete the various acts required under the original process. He is not required to do so, and the practice has been otherwise. This section is merely designed to give validity to, or rather to recognize the validity of, a title acquired in this way. The power of the officer, who makes the levy, to proceed with the advertisement, sale and deed is recognized. But the 59th section does not say that if the original officer who levies the writ hands it over to his successor, who proceeds to make advertisement and sale, and deed, such sale and deed are void.

Admitting that this section does not require the sheriff, who makes the levy, to hand over the writ to his successor, simply because his term of office has expired, and that the words, "not executed," have no application to a case where there has been a levy, still it does not prohibit the officer from so handing over to his successor writs which have been only partially executed; and in either event the sale is valid and the deed valid. The successor may adopt the levy of his predecessor and proceed with the advertisement, sale and deed; and so, if the original sheriff, who makes the levy, instead of handing over to his successor the writ, chooses to proceed under the 62d section, and make advertisement, sale, and execute a deed, it is also valid. And this seems to be the opinion of this court in Duncan v. Matney, 29 Mo. 368, and Merchants' Bank v. Harrison, 39 Mo. 438.

The clerical error made in the deeds in which the judgment in favor of Colburn was recited, as rendered April 21, 1865, was corrected. It was manifestly a mere clerical error, since the sales were made before the date of this recited judgment, and all the other judgments were recited as occurring on April 21, 1864. This correction was made by allowing the sheriff to amend his return, and by then correcting the error in dates in open court. It is insisted, however, that the corrected deed was never acknowledged; but as the correction was made in open court, there would seem to be no necessity for a formal acknowledgment of the deed thus corrected. It had already been once acknowledged and the record of the acknowledgment made.

But it is urged that all these sales having been made at the door of a church or meeting house, in which the circuit court at the time held its sessions, in the town of Warrensburg, were therefore void. The evidence established clearly that the sales were at the door of a building not usually used as a court-house, but at the time was so used, because the building regularly appropriated to these purposes was occupied by troops of soldiers, and was otherwise not in a condition to be used as a court-house. It is plain that a sale at the door of the deserted court-house, where no court was in session, would have been utterly against the spirit and meaning of the law. Whether the county court had failed to provide a suitable building for holding court, or whether the circuit court had selected the building for its sessions, is not material. It could not be maintained that the proceedings of the circuit court would be invalid, although its sittings were not in a building designated by the county court.

Both buildings were at the county seat of the county. And the obvious meaning of the execution law is to require sales at the door of the building occupied and used as a court-house.

Another objection to the plaintiff's title is that the sheriff's deed to Calhoun was not delivered. Calhoun had transferred his rights under his purchase to the plaintiff, and in a proceeding on the part of the plaintiff, against Calhoun, the court had decreed a transfer of Calhoun's title to plaintiff. The deed to Calhoun was executed, acknowledged and recorded, and this was equivalent to a delivery.

No formal delivery was necessary, as the law presumes a delivery under such circumstances.

The decree transferred Calhoun's title to plaintiff. Although the decree was rendered between parties other than those in the present suit, and was not, therefore, binding against persons not parties to it, the decree is simply offered to establish the title of plaintiff to whatever title Calhoun had. It was a fact in his chain of title, and it was competent evidence against all the world on this point, as much as a deed from Calhoun to the plaintiff would have been.

The decree simply transferred the legal title to the owner of the equitable title, and it was only used to show this.

The point that an order of publication, and publication, were essential to the jurisdiction of the court, in attachment cases, has been extensively discussed in this case. As the record recites that there was an order of publication, and an actual publication, according to law, it is obvious that no such question is presented by this case. In my opinion, the question is a mere abstraction.

The question was presented and discussed in the case of Freeman v. Thompson, decided July term, 1873, and the opinion of the court, or a majority of the court, was expressed on it. The question was, in that case, presented by the instructions, and though its decision might have been avoided, the opinion was not, therefore, an obiter dictum.

It frequently happens that the decision of a single point in a case will determine the affirmance or reversal of the judgment in that case, but it does not follow that the court may not proceed to examine and decide other points which the record presents; and indeed the latter course is most satisfactory to all parties concerned, and saves the necessity of again resorting to the appellate court.

That opinion had the unqualified approbation of three of the judges, and any view which I might entertain would be superfluous. Besides, it is difficult to see how this question has any practical importance. The statute requires an order of publication, and a publication, and prohibits the circuit court from entering a judgment until these prerequisites have been performed. It can hardly happen—I doubt if it has ever happened—that the courts have ever attempted to enter judgment unless, in their opinion and finding, an order of publication had been made, and a publication made in pursuance of such order; and further that the order and its compliance substantially conformed to the requisites of the statute.

Digitized by Google

The order of publication may be defective, and the mode of the publication made may not conform to the provisions of the statute; but whether the order or the publication is so defective that the court should not proceed to judgment, is a point decided by the court which tries the case, and its decision one way or the other is merely a matter for review in a direct proceeding to set aside the judgment.

There can be no doubt that the court has jurisdiction to decide such questions, when jurisdiction has already been acquired by service of the writ of attachment, which, of course, must be a valid writ, conforming essentially and substantially to the requirements of the act, and issued by the clerk in conformity with the power vested in him. There is then a case in court, and if every point arising subsequently is erroneously decided, still the purchaser, under a judgment, is not affected by such errors. This general principle is essential to the security of hundreds of titles, and though doubtless in many instances, probably in this, the property of the defendant is ruinously sacrificed by the sale under the execution, it must also be borne in mind that frequently the bona fide purchaser, at a fair price, may equally be subjected to the risks of future accessions of value to the property sold, which form so common a temptation for heirs to wish to set aside sales, years after they are made, upon merely technical grounds.

It is said, however, that where there is no publication, such as is required by law, the court has no jurisdiction over the persons of the non-resident, and can, therefore, pass no judgment on him, even so far as the property attached is concerned.

The judgment in such cases, it will be observed, can only affect the property attached; and when the record shows a finding of the court that there has been a legal order of publication, and a publication made in pursuance of such order, it is not apparent how this finding or determination of fact can be attacked collaterally any more than any other conclusion of the court in the course of its proceeding to final judgment. Its opinion on the sufficiency of the order of publication may be entirely wrong, reversible on review, but the error does not vitiate the title acquired under the udgment. In the language of Mr. Justice MILLER, in Cooper v. Reynolds (10 Wall. 321), to hold such judgments, sales and deeds void "would be to overturn the uniform course of decision in this court, to unsettle titles to vast amounts of property long held in reliance on those decisions, and to sacrifice sound principles to barren technicalities."

This judgment must be reversed, since it is conceded that Mrs. McCown was entitled to dower in the land, and there was no right of immediate possession; and it is therefore reversed, with instructions to enter the judgment with a stay of execution until the widow's dower is assigned.

The other judges concur.

JUDGMENT REVERSED.

Liability of Master for Injuries Inflicted upon One Servant through the Negligence of Another Servant.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. JESSE L. FORT.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 99; October Term, 1873.

Negligence—Servants in Common Employment.—A railroad company is liable for the negligent act of a foreman having charge of dangerous machinery, who, in the course and within the scope of his duties, orders an infant employee under him, upon a service hazardous to life or limb, and which was not within the scope of the ordinary or proper duties of the servant thus commanded to perform it. In such a case, the rule which exempts the emp oyee from liability to one servant for the negligence of a fellow-servant in the same common service, has no application.

Error to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Minnesota. The facts of the case and the special verdict will be found in 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 259.

Redick & Briggs, for the plaintiff (Fort); Poppleton & Wakely, for the railroad company.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

It was assumed on behalf of the plaintiff in error, on the argument of this cause, that the master is not liable to one of his servants for injuries resulting from the carelessness of another, when both are engaged in a common service, although the injured person was under the control and direction of the servant who caused the injury. Whether this proposition as stated be true or not, we do not propose to consider, because, if true, it has no application to this case.

The action was brought by the defendant in error to recover damages for an injury to his minor son, resulting in the loss of an arm, while in the employment of the railroad company. The boy was employed in the machine shop of the company as a workman or helper, under the superintendence and control of one Collett, and had been chiefly engaged in receiving and putting away mouldings as they came from a moulding machine. After the service had been continued for a few months, the boy, by the order of Collett, ascended a ladder to a great height from the floor, among rapidly revolving and dangerous machinery, for the purpose of adjusting a belt by which a portion of the machinery was moved, and while engaged in the endeavor to execute the order the accident happened. The jury, by a special verdict, find that the boy was engaged to serve under Collett as a workman or helper, and was required to obey his orders; that the order by Collett to the boy (in carrying out which he lost his arm) was not within the scope of his duty and employment, but was within that of Collett's; that the order was not a reasonable one; that its execution was attended with hazard to life or limb, and that a prudent man would not have ordered the boy to execute it.

It is apparent, from these findings, if the rule of the master's exemption from liability for the negligent conduct of a co-employee in the same service be as broad as is contended for by the plaintiff in error, that it does not apply to such a case as this. This rule proceeds on the theory that the employee, in entering the service of the principal, is presumed to take upon himself the risks incident to the undertaking, among which are to be counted the negligence of fellow-servants in the same employment, and that considerations of public policy require the enforcement of the rule. But this presumption can not arise where the risk is not within the contract of service, and the servant had no reason to believe he would have to encounter it. If it were otherwise, principals would be released from all obligations to make reparation to an employee in a subordinate position for any injury caused by the wrongful conduct of the person placed over him, whether they were fellow-servants in the same common service or not. Such a doctrine would be subversive of all just ideas of the obligations arising out of the contract of service, and withdraw all protection from the subordinate employees of railroad corporations. These corporations, instead of being required to conduct their business so as not to endanger life, would, so far as this class of persons were concerned, be relieved of all pecuniary responsibility in case they failed to do it. A doctrine that leads to such results is unsupported by reason and can not receive our sanction.

The injury in this case did not occur while the boy was doing what his father engaged he should do. On the contrary, he was at the time employed in a service outside the contract and wholly disconnected with it. To work as a helper at a moulding machine, or a common work-hand on the floor of the shop, is a very different thing from ascending a ladder resting on a shaft, to adjust displaced machinery, when the shaft was revolving at the rate of 175

Digitized by Google

to 200 revolutions per minute. The father had the right to presume, when he made the contract of service, that the company would not expose his son to such a peril. Indeed, it is not possible to conceive that the contract would have been made at all if the father had supposed that his son would have been ordered to do so hazardous a thing. If the order had been given to a person of mature years, who had not engaged to do such work, although enjoined to obey the directions of his superior, it might with some plausibility be argued that he should have disobeyed it, as he must have known that its execution was attended with danger; or, at any rate, if he chose to obey, that he took upon himself the risks incident to the service But this boy occupied a very different position. How could he be expected to know the peril of the undertaking? He was a mere youth, without experience, and not familiar with machinery. Not being able to judge for himself, he had a right to rely on the judgment of Collett, and doubtless entered upon the execution of the order without apprehension of danger. Be this as it may, it was a wrongful act on the part of Collett to order a boy, of his age and inexperience, to do a thing which in its very nature was perilous, and which any man of ordinary sagacity would know to be so. Indeed, it is very difficult to reconcile the conduct of Collett with that of a prudent man, having proper regard to the responsibilities of his own position and the rights of others. It is charitable to suppose that he did not appreciate the danger, and acted without due deliberation and caution. For the consequences of this hasty action the company are liable, either upon the maxim of respondeat superior, or upon the obligations arising out of the contract of service. The order of Collett was their order. They can not escape responsibility on the plea that he should not have given it. Having entrusted to him the care and management of the machinery, and in so doing made it his rightful duty to adjust it when displaced, and having placed the boy under him with directions to obey him, they must pay the penalty for the tortious act he committed in the course of the employment. If they are not insurers of the lives and limbs of their employees, they do impliedly engage that they will not expose them to the hazard of losing their lives, or suffering great bodily harm, when it is neither reasonable nor necessary to do so. The very able judge who tried the case, instructed the jury on the point at issue in conformity with these views, and we see no error in the record. (2 Dillon, C. C. R. 259.)

The judgment is affirmed.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissented.

NOTE.—Practically viewed, the foregoing case is one of unusual interest, and elsewhere in this number we make some observations respecting it, and upon the general subject of the Liability of Masters to Servants.

The Supreme Court recently decided another case upon the same general subject, which we print herewith in the form of a note. We refer to the case of the N. W. Union Packet Co., plaintiff in error, v. Mary McCue, Adm'x of Patrick McCue, deceased—from the eastern district of Wisconsin. The following is the opinion of Mr. Justice DAVIS:

"This suit was brought by Mary McCue, administratrix of her husband, Patrick McCue, deceased, to recover damages for injuries sustained by him on the 11th of July, 1868, through the negligence of the servants of the plaintiff in error, and which resulted in his death a few days thereafter. There can be no doubt from the evidence that McCue was without fault, and that the injuries which caused his death were owing to the improper conduct and reckless carelessness of the employees of the packet company; and the only question for determination is, whether the company is, under the circumstances of the case, responsible for the acts of its servants.

"The case is substantially this: Patrick McCue was a common laboring man, living in Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, and employed in the railroad warehouse in that place. On the evening of the 11th of July, 1868, the steamer War Eagle, owned by the plaintiff in error, arrived at the landing in Prairie du Chien for the purpose of taking freight from the warehouse. Being short of hands, the officers of the boat employed McCue and four or five other persons to assist in carrying freight from the warehouse and putting it on board the boat. This employment continued about two hours and a half, at the end of which time McCue and the rest were requested to go to the office of the boat and receive their pay. They proceeded there accordingly, were paid, and then started to go ashore. The men on board the boat pulled in the gang-plank while McCue was on it, who was thus thrown down and injured, from which injury he died.

"It is insisted on the part of the plaintiff in error that a master is not responsible to a servant for injuries caused by the negligence or misconduct of a fellow servant engaged in the same general business. Whether this general proposition be true or not, it is not necessary to determine in the state of this record. It is conceded if the employment of McCue by the company terminated before the injury complained of was suffered, that the company is liable, and this the jury have found to be the fact. But it is said it was the province of the court, and not the jury, to determine the point of time at which the service was ended; that as the facts were undisputed, it was a question of law, and the court should have told the jury the relation of master and servant subsisted when the accident happened. We do not think so. One of the theories on which the suit was prosecuted was that McCue's special employment had ceased when he was injured. This theory was resisted by the defense, and the court, not taking upon itself to determine as an absolute proposition when the employment terminated, left it to the jury to find how the fact was. This ruling, in our opinion, was correct. It was for the jury to say, from the nature of the employment, the manner of engaging the hands, the usual mode of transacting such a business, and the other circumstances of the case, whether the service had or had not ceased at the time of the accident. The point was submitted fairly to the jury, with no more comments than the evidence justified. It was argued by the plaintiff in error that the employment of necessity terminated on the land, because it was there McCue was engaged to do the work, and he had the right to be provided with the proper means of reaching it from the boat. On the contrary, the defendant in error contended the special service ceased when McCue had finished his work and was paid off; that after this he was not subject to the control or direction of the officers of the boat, but at liberty to stay on the boat or go off as he pleased. The jury took this latter view of the relation of the parties, and we cannot say that they did not decide correctly. At any rate, their decision on a question of fact is not subject to review in this court. The defense, at the best, was a narrow one, and, in our opinion, more technical than just.

"The judgment is affirmed."

We take pleasure in referring the reader to a very carefully prepared and valuable editorial article upon the "Liability of Master to Servant, for injuries sustained in the course of the employment," in 9 Albany Law Journal, 69, (January 31, 1874,) where the American exceptions to the general rule are clearly stated.

Taxation by Municipal Corporation — Vehicles — Drays.

CITY OF MEMPHIS v. BATTAILE & CO.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Jackson, Special November Term, 1873.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY, }
" ROBERT MCFARLAND, }
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" JOHN L. T. SNEED, }
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN, }

1. Municipal Corporation—Subjects of Taxation. — It is competent for the legislature to authorize a municipal corporation to impose a tax upon occupations and privileges not taxed by the general law.

2. Municipal Tax—Dray—Vehicle.—A city ordinance imposing a tax upon "every owner of a wagon or other vehicle, kept or used for free delivery of goods to customers or others in the city," authorizes the imposing of tax on the privilege of using a dray within the city.

3. ——. ——. The fact that the dray is employed in doing the work of a rolling mill, which is situated outside the corporate limits, and the further fact that the owners reside outside the corporate limits, and that the drays and the animals which draw them are kept outside of the city, except when plying their avocation within it, do not make them any the less subject to such tax.

Opinion by SNEED, J.—The defendants were operating a "rolling mill" for the manufacture of bar iron, near Memphis, but outside the corporate limits of the city. They owned some drays, which were kept at the mill, but which were used in the free delivery of iron manufactured at the mill, to their customers and merchants within the corporate limits. The defendants themselves lived at or near the mill and without the corporate limits. They used their drays also in gathering up and transporting to the mill such scrap iron as they could from time to time obtain in different parts of the city. A license tax upon the privilege of thus using the drays was demanded of them by the city, which they finally paid under protest, and under an agreement that the question of their liability should be determined by the courts, and if determined in their favor, the amount should be refunded to them.

Digitized by Google

An agreed case was thereupon submitted to the judge of the 2d circuit court at Memphis, and judgment rendered in favor of defendants. The city appealed. The city claims the right to demand the license tax in question, under an ordinance in the words following: "Every owner of a wagon or other vehicle kept or used for free delivery of goods to customers or others in the city—for each vehicle per annum $10 00." The ordinance was adopted by the city council under the authority of the amended charter of the city, passed on the first of December, 1869, which gives the city the power to license and regulate drays, carts, hackney coaches and other vehicles used in the city." It is insisted that the words "other vehicles" used in the ordinance do not embrace drays; and in support of this view an argument is presented based upon the peculiar phraseology of certain preceding sections of the same ordinance upon the same subject. Thus, it is provided in one section that every owner of a cart, wagon or dray drawn by one horse, and not including carriers of passengers or baggage, running for hire, is required to pay a license tax of ten dollars a year. Another, and the section next following the above, imposes upon a two-horse vehicle, as mentioned in the last section, a license tax of twenty dollars per annum; the next, a license tax of thirty dollars a year upon a three-horse vehicle. The next provides that every owner of an omnibus, hack, carriage or other vehicle seeking custom upon the streets, or visiting the railroad depots or steamboat landing or other public places for the purpose of procuring custom, shall pay a license tax of twenty dollars for each vehicle; and the next, that every carriage or other vehicle kept exclusively for use at funerals, for hire, shall pay a license tax of ten dollars a year for each vehicle. Then comes the 25th section, now in judgment, providing that every owner of a wagon or other vehicle kept or used for free delivery of goods to customers or others in the city—for each vehicle ten dollars per annum. It is urged that the peculiar phraseology of these preceding sections show, by fair construction, that it was not the purpose of the council in adopting this ordinance to include drays in the words "other vehicles," and in support of this view the case of McGrath v. Logue, 6 Cold. 340, is cited. But that case, in our judgment, may be distinguished from this. It involved the construction of the revenue act of 1867–8, which imposed a privilege tax upon all hacks, carriages or vehicles running for hire; and it was held that the words in that section "or vehicles running for hire," did not include drays. But the decision in that case is rested expressly upon the ground that the statute undertakes in a subsequent clause to classify the particular vehicles intended to be taxed, and fixes the specific tax upon each by name, including drays. We think the case in judgment may be rested on other grounds without positive conflict with that case. When that case was determined, there was no law expressly authorizing the imposition of a privilege tax upon drays, and in a matter of state and county taxation it was held that in the absence of any positive statute, no such tax could be imposed. In the case before us, the amended charter authorizes the city to impose a privilege tax upon drays, and under this authority the tax in question was imposed.

It must first be considered, then, whether it be competent for the legislature to authorize a municipal corporation to impose a privilege tax upon any occupation or privilege not taxed by the general law. It was held in the case of Nashville v. Thomas, 5 Cold. 600, in regard to the taxation of bank stocks, that a municipal corporation could not levy taxation upon properties or privileges other than such as are taxable under the statutory law of the State. In that case the city of Nashville had adopted an ordinance taxing the stock in national banks, and this ordinance was adopted under the general taxing power of the municipal government, and not under any special charter privilege to tax that particular character of stock. In the case before us, the special power to tax drays used in the city is conferred by the amended charter; and we think the legislature, in the absence of any constitutional inhibition, clearly had the right to delegate this power to the city government. A city government is a peculiar polity. It is an imperium in imperio. Its necessities and its wants are distinguishable from those of the general public, and it has its sources of revenue, which, in the nature of things, do not belong to all the state alike. Its burthens also are different from those which rest upon the general public, and these burthens create the absolute necessity for the peculiar prerogatives which have always attached to municipal governments. It has never been questioned, therefore, that the chartered privileges of a city corporation, which distinguish it from the general law, are valid and constitutional, where they merely recognize or make effectual the police powers essential to maintain itself within itself. And among its first duties and burthens is to establish and maintain safe and agreeable streets and highways for the public, and they are answerable to the general law if they do not. It would seem, therefore, that the use by the owners of vehicles of the streets and highways thus established, would be a privilege upon which a tax might be most properly imposed; and especially that the employment as an occupation of any vehicle upon the streets, calculated to injure and wear them away, would be a legitimate subject of privilege taxation; and conceding that such taxation is not authorized by the general law as applicable to the whole state alike, yet if it be not forbidden, we can see no valid objection to the exercise of the power in a city government. Thus it has been said by this court that "the ordinances and modes of administration of municipal corporations are not invalid as partial laws, for the reason that they are applicable only to persons residing or being within the limits of the municipality." 6 Cold. 390. The constitution authorizes the legislature to create municipal corporations, and to confer upon them such powers as are appropriate to them. We hold there is nothing in the amended charter authorizing this tax which is objectionable.

We are next to consider whether the words "other vehicles" used in the ordinance include the vehicle commonly called a dray. It seems to us that the common sense of the proposition must be the law of it; and without further discussion, we hold that a dray being a vehicle other than the vehicle named in the ordinance, is necessarily embraced within its provisions and meaning, and that there is nothing in the section in question, or in the phraseology of the other sections referred to, which forbids this reasonable and natural construction of unambiguous words.

But the defendants insist that they are not living within the corporate limits, and that their drays and the animals that draw them are kept outside of the city, except when plying their avocation within it, and therefore they are not liable. We can not yield to this argument. The privilege is exercised within the city and along its streets, and this is the daily business of the draymen and their drays. The privilege tax is the use of the drays in the city, and it can certainly make no difference where the beneficiary of the privilege resides.

Reverse the judgment.

REVERSED.

—A BILL has passed the house of representatives providing that no person shall be prosecuted, tried or punished in any United States court for any offence not capital, or for any fine or forfeiture under a penal statute, unless indicted, or information shall be found or instituted within five years from the date of the crime or act, except in the case of persons fleeing from justice.

Digitized by Google

A Bankrupt Cannot be Examined after he has Obtained his Discharge.

Judge WOODRUFF, of the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York, has decided an important point of practice, or rather of jurisdiction, in the case of Nathaniel Dole, recently adjudged a bankrupt. The New York Herald states the decision as follows:

"On the 25th of June, 1867, Dole filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and on the 27th of the same month was adjudicated a bankrupt. Isaac M. Andruss was elected assignee on the 12th of October, 1867, and thereupon an assignment of the bankrupt's estate was made to him. Dole obtained his discharge, which was filed on the 9th of January, 1868. On the 27th of November, 1872, on the petition of the assignee and the affidavits of G. W. Lockwood, the district court made an order requiring Dole to appear before John Fitch, register in bankruptcy, on the 9th of December, 1872, for the purpose of submitting, under section 26 of the act, to an examination in regard to the bankruptcy proceedings had against him. Dole put in specific objections to the proposed examination, and on a certificate having been made to the court, Judge BLATCHFORD overruled most of the objections, and the proceedings were continued before the register. An appeal having been taken to the circuit court, Judge WOODRUFF considered the matter, and yesterday filed a long and elaborate written opinion. The substance of the opinion is this:—He says it seems extraordinary if congress intended that a debtor should continue subject to the power of the court after his discharge was granted and his liability for his debts had ceased. The latitude said to be given to the power of summary examination would tend to great abuse, against which it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the court sufficiently to guard, and the abuse of the proceeding, to great personal inconvenience, oppression, and even to extortion. This would be a very great evil. The judge comes to the conclusion that the order for the examination of Dole was improvidently made and was without jurisdiction, and that the proceedings must be dismissed."

Photographs of Papers in Existence not Admissible in Evidence.

In the case of the United States v. Louis Messman, formerly first lieutenant of a New York volunteer regiment, which has been on trial before Judge BLATCHFORD in the district court of the United States at New York city, an interesting point of evidence was decided. According to the Herald's report of the case, the action was brought to recover $253.79 on the following charge:—Mr. Messman, on the 20th of July, 1864, presented his pay-rolls for the months of January and February, 1864, and upon the presentation of that paper received $253.79. It is charged by the government that on March 18, 1864, he had received his pay for those months, and the inference raised by the government was that he had obtained double pay. Messrs. Yard and Furlong, counsel for the defence, set up that one of the pay-rolls was a forgery. The government had sent on photographic copies of those pay-rolls purporting to have been signed by Mr. Messman. Mr. Simons, United States assistant district attorney, offered to put those photographic copies in evidence, but Judge BLATCHFORD declined to accede to the offer, saying that as the defence was that one of these pay-rolls was a forgery, counsel for the government must put in the originals. Mr. Simons replied that the court of common pleas, in a case of this kind, had decided that where it was set up that a paper was forgery, a photographic copy of it could be received in evidence. Judge BLATCHFORD—I am not bound by the decision of the court of common pleas, and I shall not concur in its decision. To admit in evidence a photographic copy of a pay-roll would be acting contrary to well established rules of evidence—in fact, it would be monstrous. Upon the application of Mr. Simons, the trial was postponed until he could procure the original pay-rolls from Washington.

Book Notices.

REPORTS OF CASES ARISING UNDER LETTERS PATENT FOR INVENTIONS, DETERMINED IN THE COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES. By SAMUEL S. FISHER, Counsellor at Law. Vol. 5. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co., 1874.

To that part of the profession which gives attention to patent cases Mr. Fisher's series of Reports are simply indispensable. It is useless to offer any remarks touching their well known general merits in this special department of the law. We scarcely know which most to admire, the superior paper and typographical excellence of the volumes, or the conspicuous skill and care with which the Reporter does his work. In the Life of TANEY by Mr. Tyler, the chief justice is stated to have made the observation that none but a good lawyer can make a good Reporter. It is true. The profession are, therefore, to be congratulated that one of the very foremost patent lawyers in the country feels sufficient interest in the studies and work, to which he gives his busy life, to furnish them with the excellent series of Reports known as "Fisher's Patent Cases." The present volume is perhaps superior to any of the preceding and is, as it should be, freely illustrated by engravings and diagrams. This feature of the work is expensive, and we cannot too highly commend the Reporter or Publishers (whichever may be entitled to the credit) for the enterprise and liberality to which it owes its origin.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF JUDICIAL AND EXECUTION SALES. By DAVID RORER, of the Iowa Bar. Chicago: Callaghan & Co., 1873.

Of the importance of the subject treated by Judge Rorer there can be no question. In this country, where so great a proportion of titles depend upon judicial sales, it seems to be remarkable that no work upon this subject has hitherto appeared. It has long been known to his friends that the present author was collecting data for a work of this character, and they are glad to welcome its appearance. The author is an able and experienced member of the Burlington bar, and he presents the profession with the result of his labors in a compact volume of 412 pages, which is printed with clear type, on excellent paper. We can well credit the author's statement that it has required additional labor to condense his materials so as to present the topics treated in the smallest practicable space. This is a merit well deserving praise. The work is not an exhaustive one in the sense of collecting all the cases upon the subjects considered, but the selection from the cases is judiciously made, and the work will tend to bring the subjects treated of into more harmony, by directing attention to existing differences of judicial views, and will be of great aid to the professional enquirer in lessening his labors and in guiding his investigations. We are glad to know that it has met with a warm reception; and we can safely recommend it as a useful volume.

It is dedicated to the author's friend—Mr. Justice MILLER—"as an expression of that respect and regard which are so eminently due to his great personal worth and legal learning."

THE NEW YORK SUPREME COURT REPORTS. Cases determined in the Supreme Court of New York, from June to November, 1873. Edited by ISAAC GRANT THOMPSON and ROBLEY D. COOK. Albany: John D. Parsons, Jr., 1874. Price $5.

We have already had occasion to notice (ante, p. 49) the coming of this new series of reports. The profession will not, we presume, regret the discontinuation of the series of Barbour, nor of that of Lansing, which this series supplants. What was bad in Barbour was made worse by the advent of Lansing as the official reporter of the same court; after which time we had the spectacle of one court—or one series of courts—with two reporters, the one a private, and the other the official reporter. According to a report of a committee of the New York Bar Association, appointed to investigate the abuses of law reporting in that state, it appeared that some of the judges were in the habit of giving their opinions to Mr. Barbour, while others gave theirs to Mr. Lansing. The result was that the opinions of different judges in the same case were sometimes distributed between the two reporters, and each reporter published the share which fell to him as the full report of the case. It sometimes happened from this cause, that dissenting opinions were published as the opinion of the court.

This state of things is remedied by the new series. It purports to give all the decisions of the supreme court of that state in its various departments sitting in general term. Concerning the plan of reporting all the decisions, the professional judgment will differ. Inside the state of New York the verdict will be in its favor, while outside of that state the reverse will probably be true. The evil of this plan is, however, in a great degree obviated by the method of giving only an abstract of the unimportant cases in an addenda.

At the same time there are those who believe, and never tire of asserting, that the decisions of a court not of last resort ought not to be reported at all. Whatever force this consideration may have with the bench and bar of the state of New York when applied to this series of reports, it is thought that it will not weigh much with the profession at large. Outside of that state, the opinions of its courts, whether highest or lowest, unless interpreting local laws, have only persuasive force; and every decision must stand or fall according to the strength of its reasoning and the apparent soundness of its conclusions.

Digitized by Google

We have examined this volume with considerable care; and whether we consider the work of the editors or of the publisher, we have found in it nothing that does not deserve commendation. We shall notice some of the decisions next week.

Notes and Queries.

SAVANNAH, GA., February 19, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A few days since I saw one of your papers, No. 4, and on page 48, under the head of "Notes and Queries," read a question from J. M. M., which you, being unable to answer from any decision at hand, requested any of your readers to do so. In our Georgia supreme court, held in September last, a question quite similar to J. M. M.'s came up for decision, and I have enclosed the brief of the report to you, which you may use, possibly, for the benefit of your querist. I think the position of the county court in the case I send you is exactly the same as that of the one in the question before referred to.

Very respectfully, J. G. R.

The following is the decision referred to, and for which we thank our correspondent:

COLQUITT AND BAGGS, et al., v. P. H. OLIVER.

Motion to distribute money, from Sumter.

WARNER, C. J.—On the 20th of July, 1868, a verdict was rendered in the county court of Sumter in favor of Oliver against Adams. On the 24th of July, 1868, an appeal was taken by Adams, who executed his appeal bond before the county judge, with Foster as his security, which was entered on the record book of said court, and the case was transmitted to the superior court, in which a trial was had, and a verdict was rendered against Adams on the appeal trial, upon which judgment was entered against Adams and Foster as his security on the appeal. The property of Foster having been sold by the sheriff, and the money arising from the sale thereof being in the sheriff's hands, and on a motion to distribute the same, Colquitt and Baggs and others, being junior judgment creditors of Foster to Oliver's judgment, moved the court to set aside Oliver's judgment against Foster as security on the appeal for Adams, on the ground that the judgment was void to them inasmuch as the appeal from the verdict in the county court was taken and the appeal bond executed before the county judge after the county court was abolished by the adoption of the constitution of 1868, on the 21st day of July of that year. The court refused the motion, and ordered the money in the hands of the sheriff to be paid to Oliver's execution, which was the oldest. Whereupon the other judgment creditors of Foster excepted. The verdict against Adams was rendered before the county court was abolished by the constitution of 1868, and he then had the legal right to appeal therefrom within four days, by paying costs and giving security, which was done, and the case transmitted to the superior court, as provided by law. The taking the bond and security by the county judge on the records of that court was a mere ministerial, and not a judicial act—it was nothing more than a transmission of the unfinished business of the county court to the superior court, and in our judgment the appeal was not void, nor was the judgment rendered thereon in the superior court against the security on the appeal void, under the provisions of the constitution of 1868.

Let the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

W. B. Guerry, Hawkins, Guerry & Hollis, for plaintiffs in error; G. T. Goode and N. A. Smith, for defendant.

Legal News and Notes.

—A BILL to authorize the husband, wife or next of kin of a deceased person to draw from a savings bank any sum not exceeding $500, has passed the legislature of California.

—THE attorney general has decided that ale forfeited to a state, and taken before the United States tax is paid, from the manufacturer by the process of a state court seeking to enforce the forfeiture, cannot be seized by the United States officers for the non-payment of said tax while it remains in the custody of the state officers.

—HE has also decided that the phrase "state banking association" in section 6 of the act of March 3, 1865, providing for a tax of ten per cent. upon state circulation, includes all associations for banking by private agreement of parties as well as an association organized by a special act of the state legislature.

—HE has also decided that the secretary of the treasury may withhold from a railroad company compensation for transportation services when such company has received from the United States, to aid in the construction of its roads, bonds upon which it has not paid the interest, though the services were rendered upon another of its roads to which no government aid had been given.

—MR. FRYE, of Maine, from the house judiciary committee, has reported a bill providing that any person who shall be convicted of the crime of manslaughter in any United States court in any state or territory, or in the District of Columbia, shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding twenty years and fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000. After an amendment providing that the bill shall not affect any case now pending in any court, the bill was passed.

—THE telegraph tates that W. Page McCarty, recently convicted of involuntary manslaughter for killing his antagonist in a duel, who has been in jail under sentence of six months' imprisonment, imposed by the court, in addition to the fine of $500, has been pardoned by Governor Kemper. The pardon set forth that the sole ground upon which executive clemency is extended is that his physicians certify that further confinement would be fatal to McCarty, he having been very ill since his incarceration.

—THE house judiciary committee has reported a bill giving defendants in all criminal cases in the United States courts and before courts martial and courts of enquiry, the right to testify in their own behalf. The bill passed the house. It is supposed that its object is to give General Howard the benefit of its provisions when his case comes before the court of enquiry; but whether this be so or not, it is a measure of common justice which has been too long delayed.

—THE Supreme Court of the United States met on Monday, the 2d instant, after its recent vacation. All the day was consumed with the delivery of opinions, and it was thought that Tuesday and Wednesday would be, as there were thirty-five to read. Chief Justice WAITE will not take his seat until they are all read. The opinions read on Monday were not generally of public interest. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered an opinion in the Minot, Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad case, affirming the constitutionality of the tax imposed by the state of Delaware. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered an opinion in the case of the Dollar Savings Bank of the United States, in which the court held that all savings banks were obliged to pay internal revenue tax on their contingent fund, and that an action of debt would lie for the recovery of the tax, although the tax has never been assessed. Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissented.

—We take pleasure in publishing the following correction in the column where the mistake occurred:

"ATLANTA, GA., February 23, 1874.

"To the Editors of the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL—GENTLEMEN: In the JOURNAL of the 19th inst., you give a list of cases disposed of in the United States circuit and district courts for Georgia, at the last autumn terms of these courts. The list was first published in a Savannah newspaper, and is, I think correct. In your notice you remark that it is a 'list of cases disposed of by the Hon. JOHN ERSKINE.' This is correct as to the cases in the district courts and at chambers; but as to those determined in the circuit courts, it is due to the circuit judge—the Hon. W. B. WOODS—to state (and I know you will take pleasure in doing so) that he presided in the circuit courts during the greater portion of the Fall terms, and, with but few exceptions, prepared and delivered the decisions of the court.

"With sincere respect, I remain your obedient servant,

"JOHN ERSKINE."

We have been favored by Judge ERSKINE with several important opinions delivered by him, one of which we shall endeavor to lay before our readers next week,

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MARCH 12, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION:
$3 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

Cases in this Number.

We publish in this number an opinion of Hon. JOHN ERSKINE, sitting in the United States circuit court for the southern district of Georgia, expounding a statute of limitation enacted by the legislature of that state, designed to cut off suits where the cause of action accrued before the war. The cases, two of which are disposed of in this opinion, are known as the "bank cases," and have excited great interest in Georgia. We also print the outlines of an exhaustive opinion of Hon. H. H. EMMONS, United States circuit judge for the 6th circuit, delivered at Detroit, upon questions of equity procedure, the importance of which will at once suggest itself to the reader. The syllabus was furnished, together with the opinion as we print it, by Messrs. Meddaugh & Driggs of Detroit, who were of counsel for the defendants in the case.

Our readers will thank us for thus preserving valuable opinions delivered by federal judges in whose circuits there is no regular system of reporting. We shall, from time to time, publish other federal court decisions not elsewhere published or to be published, except by the local press, so far as our space will permit. We shall publish next week a valuable opinion of Hon. ROBERT A. HILL, sitting in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi on an important question of life insurance.

Death of Hon. Nathan K. Hall.

Hon. NATHAN K. HALL, United States district judge for the northern district of New York, died suddenly at Buffalo on the 3d instant. Judge HALL was born in Marcellus, Onondaga county, New York, in March, 1810. He studied law in the office of Millard Fillmore, and subsequently became his partner, the style of the firm being Fillmore, Hall & Haven. Upon the accession of Mr. Fillmore to the presidency, he became Post Master General. Both he and Mr. Haven were the trusted advisers of President Fillmore, and, it is said, supported him in the policy of replacing Seward whigs with Fillmore whigs in such of the federal offices as he could reach. Mr. Fillmore rewarded his friendship with a life estate in the office which he held at the time of his death. Mr. Haven died some years ago; and with the death of Mr. Fillmore on Sunday last, the country has witnessed the final dissolution of a firm of lawyers which has filled a conspicuous place in its history. Judge HALL was an able and upright judge and a pure man. His dockets were always crowded, his duties constant and pressing, and he literally died in the harness.

The Installation of the Chief Justice.

Hon. MORRISON R. WAITE, the newly appointed Chief Justice of the United States, took the oath of office and entered upon his duties on the 4th instant. The ceremony, or rather the lack of ceremony, was such as becomes our republican simplicity. There was no "counting in dower," nor was the Chief Justice asked whether he would "move anything," according to the ancient ceremony which is still whimsically kept up by the English.

At noon precisely the crier of the court announced, "The honorable, the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court!"—when all in the court-room arose. From the north door then came the Associate Justices in full robes, Mr. Justice CLIFFORD in the lead, and closely following the Associate Justices, Chief Justice WAITE. The Associate Justices passed to their seats at once, the Chief Justice halting at the desk of the clerk of the court. The court was then opened by the crier, as usual, when Justice CLIFFORD handed the commission of Chief Justice WAITE to the clerk, who read the same aloud. It is in the usual form of commissions of federal officers, civil and military.

The clerk then arose and read aloud the following oath, adding at its conclusion, "So help you God," in which latter the Chief Justice joined, and was thereupon sworn:

"I, MORRISON R. WAITE, do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon me as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution and laws of the United States."

After subscribing to the above oath, the Chief Justice passed to the rear of the bench, and entering the door, took the vacant chair in the center, the Associate Justices standing and bowing as he assumed his seat.

Municipal Debts — Mode of Collection — Personal Liability of Inhabitants.

Holders of municipal railway-aid bonds in Wisconsin have in many instances met with trouble in collecting them. It has not been difficult to obtain judgments, but almost impossible to realize the money on them where the town corporations, supported by the citizens, were resolved not to pay. Writs of mandamus are issued, but before they are served the officials must make the necessary levies for ordinary purposes, and then enough of them resign at once so as to leave no quorum authorized to do the act which the writ commands, and thus attachments for contempt cannot be had or made effectual. There seems to be no authority in that state, as in Supervisors v. Rogers, 7 Wall. 175, for the appointment of the marshal by the federal courts as a commissioner to levy the taxes.

Under these circumstances the creditor in Morgan v. Beloit filed some years since a bill in equity against the town in its corporate capacity and its inhabitants, asking a decree subjecting the taxable property of the town and its inhabitants to sale by the marshal to pay the judgment creditor. The circuit court dismissed the bill. The Supreme Court of the United States, on an appeal, ordered a re-argument on this question: "Whether or not it is competent for the circuit court of the United States, on a bill filed for the purpose, to appoint a master or commissioner to levy and collect a tax upon the taxable property of the town sufficient to pay the plaintiff's judgment, in case of the refusal of the supervisors of the town to levy the same after service of a peremptory writ of mandamus?" At the December term, 1869, the decree dismissing the bill was affirmed by an equal division of opinion among the eight judges then on the bench. The case is not reported. (See Dillon Munic. Corp., Sec. 693, note.)

Digitized by Google

Afterwards the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin, in Rees v. Watertown, June term, 1872, dismissed a similar bill to the preceding, and the decree has just been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. We have not yet seen the text of the opinion of the court, but it undoubtedly holds the doctrine that there is no personal liability on the part of citizens or corporators for the debts of the municipality or public corporation. The contrary doctrine in this country is exceptional and limited to the New England States. (Ib. Sec. 686, and cases cited; Cooley Const. Lim. 246, 247.)

We may remark that in the case of Hubbell v. Town of Waterloo, the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, in April, 1872 (present, DRUMMOND and MILLER, JJ.), in an application in a mandamus proceeding supplemental to a judgment against the town for the appointment of a commissioner to levy and collect the taxes, which the local officers evaded and refused (by successive resignations) to levy and collect, the judges were divided in opinion as to the power of the court to make the appointment, and the question was certified to the supreme court, where it is still pending. Since the decision in Rees v. Watertown, holding that equity would not give relief, the question of the right of the federal court to appoint commissioners of its own to levy and collect taxes to pay judgments thereon, on the refusal of the state officials to obey its mandate to that effect, becomes doubly important to the judgment creditor, and its decision in his favor seems to be his chief if not only reliance for effectual judicial compulsion of such corporations as are bent on not paying.

An Interesting Application of the Law of Fixtures.

The case of The United States v. A Certain Tract of Land in Monterey County, 6 Pacific Law Reporter, 62, furnishes an interesting application of the law of fixtures. The United States instituted the proceeding in 1870, in one of the state courts of California, to condemn a tract of land in Monterey county, for light-house purposes. It appeared that some time in the year 1854 the United States, by its agents, had entered, against the will of the owners of the rancho, upon the lands now sought to be condemned, and erected thereon a stone building, the foundations of which were set into the soil, and ever since then have occupied it and the surrounding premises, part of the rancho, against the will of the owners, for light-house purposes. At the trial the defendants claimed that this building having been tortiously erected upon, and thereby became part of their soil and freehold, its value rightfully formed an element to be considered in fixing the amount of damages to which they were entitled. They accordingly offered to prove its value, but the evidence offered upon this point was excluded, and the exception reserved upon this ruling of the court below was brought up for review by appeal.

The supreme court of California, however, took a different view of the question. WALLACE, J. (with whom CROCKETT and MCKINSTRY, JJ., concurred), said: "There can be no doubt that upon the general principles of law the defendants, as being owners of the fee, are also owners of the improvements and fixtures actually annexed to the soil, and these become part of it. If one erect buildings upon the land of another voluntarily and without any contract, he may not remove them. This is common learning. The law did not authorize the United States to take possession of these lands manu forti, and their agents in entering upon them and ejecting the defendants were mere tort feasors. This case is, in this important respect, wholly unlike that of the California Pacific Railroad v. Armstrong, decided here at the last April term. In that case the road track was constructed by the railroad company, while its possession of the land of the defendant was rightful, being held at the time in pursuance of pending proceedings for its condemnation; and these proceedings having been dismissed, after the construction of the track, we held that the owner of the land was not entitled to be paid the value of the track upon the subsequent renewal of proceedings of condemnation by the same company."

RHODES, J., said: "The principal facts on which the question in this case arises are substantially the same as those in California Pacific Railroad Company v. Armstrong, and I concur in the judgment in this case, because I am of the opinion that the doctrine on which it is based is opposed to and overthrows the doctrine of that case."

Liability of Railway Company for Breach of Contract to Carry a Passenger who is a Married Woman—Measure of Damages.

We find in 8 Irish Law Times Reports, 24, an interesting case determined in the Irish common pleas—Collier et ux. v. Dublin, Wicklow and Wexford Railway Co.—on the measure of damages to which a husband is entitled in case of the breach of a contract by a railway company to carry his wife from one station to another within a reasonable time; or rather, the damages to which a railway company is liable at the suit of the husband joined with the wife, where it sells a ticket to a married woman, and then does not delay its next train long enough to allow her to get aboard.

The plaintiffs, William H. Collier, and Mary Collier, his wife, complained, in the first count, that the defendants, the Dublin, Wicklow and Wexford Railway Company, being carriers of passengers, contracted with the plaintiff, William Collier, to carry his wife, the plaintiff, Mary Collier, from Booterstown to Lansdowne Road Station, within a reasonable time, but that they did not do so, whereby the plaintiff, Mary Collier, was obliged to remain during a whole night in a certain station of the defendants, without proper accommodation, and that by reason thereof she became seriously ill, and the plaintiff, William Collier, was deprived of her services. There were four other counts for assaulting and imprisoning the plaintiff, Mary Collier. The defendants pleaded, in addition to ordinary traverses, a special plea that the female plaintiff would not enter the carriage, whereby the defendants were unable to perform their part of the contract. The case came on for trial before MONAHAN, Ch. J., and a special jury, on the 19th of July. The facts appearing on his lordship's report were as follows:—The plaintiff, Mary Collier, took a second-class return-ticket from Dublin to Booterstown; she spent the day at her father's house at Booterstown; she returned to the station at Booterstown, with her daughter, about 11:30 p.m., in time to catch the last train. She and her daughter got into a carriage, but when they had done so they found it was a smoking compartment, and got out in order to enter another compartment. The porter opened the door for them to get in; the daughter got in, but the train went off before Mrs. Collier could get in. After the departure of the train she entered the station-house, and complained to Mahony, the deputy station-master, and asked to have a cab sent for. This was refused. She then sat down in the station. When Mahoney was about to lock up the place for the night and go home, he informed her of it. She nevertheless remained sitting. He turned out the lights, locked the door, and went away, leaving Mrs. Collier inside, where she was found next morning, when the station was again opened for the day. It was not alleged that she contracted any illness, or sustained any personal injury from what had happened, beyond the fact that she had to lie in bed for a time, in consequence of having sat so long upon a hard seat. No medical advice was applied for. The plaintiff, William Collier, was absent from home on the night in question, on his business as a commercial traveller, and did not know of what had happened till afterwards. The defendants contended that they were not liable for the acts of Mahoney. In this view his lordship concurred, and directed the jury to find for the defendants on all the counts, except the first. In charging the jury his lordship said that it appeared to him that the guard should not have signalled for starting the train till the lady was provided with a seat, and that, therefore, some damages for a breach of contract should be given. His lordship declined to direct nominal damages, but directed the jury only to give such damages as were sustained by the husband in his own capacity. The jury found for the plaintiff on the first count £50 damages.

Digitized by Google

A conditional order for a new trial having been obtained on the ground of misdirection, and also that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the damages were excessive, Purcell, Q. C., for the plaintiff, showed cause, and cited on the question of the measure of damages, Smeed v. Foord, 1 El. & El. 602, and Hamlin v. Great Northern Railway Company, 1 Hurl. & N. 408. Pierce White, Q. C. (with whom was Gibson, Q. C., and Seeds), for defendants, contra, cited, on the same question, Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, and Hamlin v. Great Northern Railway Company, supra.

KEOGH, J., thought that the jury should have given nominal damages only. The plaintiff did not take a cab or get a doctor; and no injury had been sustained on the first count. LAWSON, J., said, when he looked at the only allegation of damages to the plaintiff, William, he could not see that a deprivation of services had taken place. He not having been at home that night, was not entitled to damages for his wife being kept out of her house MONAHAN, Ch. J., was of opinion that the damages were excessive, but thought that the jury should have considered the circumstances attending the whole case; and that if the plaintiff was kept out of the train, she was entitled to more than nominal damages. A new trial was granted.

It has been held in the United States, in an action against a railway company for an injury to a married woman, that the husband and wife can only be joined where the object of the suit is to recover for the personal injury of the wife alone. If the suit is brought for the expenses of curing the wife, and for damages for the loss of her society and service, the husband must sue separately. Nor can an action for damages for personal injuries to the wife, and also for loss of her service, society, etc., be maintained jointly by the husband and wife, because these two grounds of action arise in different rights and are incompatible with each other. Fuller v. Naugatuck Railroad Co., 21 Conn. 557, 571. So it has been held in a case where a married woman sued separately for damages in consequence of a personal injury, that she could not recover the physician's and nurse's bills as items of damage, without proof of a separate estate that would be chargeable with such expenses. Moody v. Osgood, 50 Barb. 628.

In the case of Hamlin v. The Great Northern Railway, supra, a tradesman took a ticket to go from London to Hull. On arriving at Grimsby, he found no train ready to take him to Hull the same night, as it should have been, according to the published time-table. He slept at Grimsby, and in the morning paid 1*s.* 4*d.* fare to Hull. In consequence of his delay, he failed to keep appointments with his customers and was detained for many days. It was held that, although he would have been entitled to perform the contract at the expense of the railway company, yet, not having done so, he could not recover more than nominal damages in addition to the 1*s.* 4*d.*, and perhaps the cost of his bed, etc., at Grimsby. See also, upon the general subject of the liability of carriers for unreasonable delays in delivering goods or carrying passengers, the authorities collected in 1 Redf. on Railw., 5th ed., p. 199, note 4, and p. 200, note 7.

The Georgia "Bank Cases"—Computation of Time under the Statute of Limitations—Limitation in Favor of Administrators.

WILLIAM N. MARSH et al. v. BURROUGHS et al. AND THOMAS R. MILLS, JR., ADMINISTRATOR WITH THE WILL ANNEXED OF GEORGE HALL, DECEASED.—SUIT IN CHANCERY.

LEVI H. B. SCOTT v. SAME.—ACTION AT LAW.

United States Circuit Court, Southern District of Georgia—November Term, 1873.

Before Hon. JOHN ERSKINE, District Judge.

1. Statute of Limitations—Statute fixing Bar where Cause of Action has already accrued.—On the 16th day of March, 1869, the legislature of Georgia passed an act providing that all suits of whatever nature, in which the cause of action accrued prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, should be barred, unless brought by the 1st day of January, 1870. The period thus allowed for bringing suits was nine months and fifteen days. This is held to be a reasonable period in ordinary cases.

2. ——. Twelve Months' Exemption in Favor of Administrators.—By the Georgia Code, § 2548, an administrator is not liable to suit until one year from the date of his qualification. It is held that this exemption is not repealed by the act of March 16, 1869. If the latter act had such an effect, it would probably be in contravention of the constitution of the United States; but as it does not, it is a valid enactment.

3. ——. Computation of Time under the two Statutes.—In computing the time which will bar an action, with reference to these two statutes, it is held that the administrator is entitled, first, to the one year's exemption allowed by § 2548 of the Code, and then that the creditor of the estate is entitled to the nine months and fifteen days of the act of March 16, 1869, added thereto, in which to bring his suit; although the time within which suit may be brought may thereby be extended beyond the 1st day of January, 1870

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. W. Stone and A. T. Akerman, for plaintiffs; Messrs. Hartridge and Chisholm, for defendants.

Digitized by Google

ERSKINE, J.—The questions presented being similar, the cases were argued in connection with each other. These suits are two of the numerous cases which have, under various phases, been pending here for years, and known as the "bank cases." Many of these cases have, from time to time, been disposed of by decrees, judgments, or compromises. But the question now presented is quite different from any which has hitherto come before the court for determination. No special statement of the contents of the bill or the declaration is necessary to an understanding of the questions given for decision. Suffice it to say that the bill prays a decree for seventy-five thousand dollars against the estate of the deceased for unpaid subscription upon his stock in the Merchants and Planters' Bank; and in the common law action, the plaintiff demands one hundred thousand dollars as due to him as a holder of notes or bills of this bank—the estate of the deceased being, as is alleged, liable for the same.

All questions except the precise one presented for adjudication may be left out of view. Two pleas in bar are before me: one to the bill, and the other to the declaration. They are substantially alike, and are based upon the act of the general assembly of this state, approved March 16, 1869. The statute is entitled "an act in relation to the statute of limitations, and other purposes." The complainant (Marsh) filed exceptions to the plea put in to the bill, and Scott demurred to the plea in bar to his action. The pleas allege that the supposed causes of action accrued prior to the 1st of June, 1865, and that they did not accrue subsequently to that period; and this allegation is not controverted by Marsh or by Scott in their pleadings.

The third section of the act is as follows: "That all actions on bonds or other instruments under seal, and all suits for the enforcement of rights accruing to individuals or corporations, under the statutes or acts of incorporations, or in any way by operation of law, which have accrued prior to 1st of June, 1865, not now barred, shall be brought by the 1st of January, 1870, or the right of the party plaintiff or claimant, and all right of action for its enforcement, shall be forever barred."

Sec. 4. "That all actions on promissory notes, bills of exchange, or other simple contracts in writing, and all actions upon open accounts, or for breach of any contract, not under the hand of the party sought to be charged, or upon any implied assumpsit or undertaking, which accrued on a contract which was made prior to 1st June, 1865, not now barred, shall be brought by 1st January (1870) next after the passage of this act, or the right of the party, plaintiff or claimant, and all right of action for its enforcement, shall be forever barred."

Section five relates to all actions against administrators, trustees, etc., which accrued prior to 1st June, 1865, and enacts that they shall be brought by 1st January, 1870; and section six declares that there shall be no recovery on any liability whatsoever which accrued prior to 1st June, 1865, where the action is not brought by 1st January, 1870. Section nine repeals conflicting laws.

Turning to section 2530 of the code, there it is declared that "the administrator shall be allowed twelve months from the date of his qualification to ascertain the condition of the estate."

Section 2548 enacts that "No suit to recover a debt due by the decedent shall be commenced against the administrator until the expiration of twelve months from his qualification."

Hall, domiciled in Connecticut, died there in the autumn of 1868, testate, leaving real estate in Georgia disposed of by his will. There was no representation here until the 8th of April, 1869, when the defendant, Mills, was appointed temporary administrator, and he held this office until the 7th of June, 1869, when permanent letters were granted to him as administrator with the will annexed. The bill in equity referred to was filed by Marsh against one Burroughs and others, on the 24th of September, 1868, but Mills was not made a party to the bill until the 7th of August, 1871. On the 30th of December, 1870, Scott brought the action at law against Mills, as administrator, as aforesaid.

Adverting to the act of March 16, 1869, it will be seen that from its date to the 1st of January, 1870, the time prefixed by the statute for the closing of the limitation is nine months and fifteen days, and this court has (per ERSKINE, J.) ruled, on more than one occasion, that this is a reasonable period of time within which a creditor, whose right of action accrued anterior to the 1st of June, 1865, and which was current on the 16th of March, 1869, may institute his suit.

Whether the general rule, as laid down by this court, is attended with exceptions, I will endeavor to indicate. As just mentioned, Mills received his permanent appointment on the 7th of June, 1869, two months and twenty-one days after the passage of the limitation act, and, consequently, nearly seven months before the 1st of January, 1870; and it was not until the 7th of August, 1871, that he was brought before this court as a defendant in the equity suit. This was two years and two months subsequent to the granting of the permanent letters, and fourteen months subsequent to the expiration of the time of exemption from suit given to an administrator by section 2548 of the code.

It was insisted by defendant that the twelve months' protection from pursuit by action, allowed to an administrator, was repealed by the act of March 16, 1869, but if not so, still the cause of complaint alleged in the bill against Mills was nevertheless barred on the 7th of August, 1871, the date on which he was made a defendant. Because, as was contended, the twelve months saved to the administrator expired on the 7th of June, 1870, and allowing nine months and fifteen days to be added to the twelve months, that still the complainant was not within time, for he did not proceed against Mills until the 7th of August, 1871, some four or five months after the bar had attached.

For the complainant it was argued that the twelve months' exemption was not repealed by the act of March 16, 1869; but if repealed, such repeal is ineffectual to bar the suit of complainant, for this would impair the obligation of contracts. And it was correctly said that no state constitution or statute had authority to impair the obligation of antecedent contracts.

I will first direct my attention to the constitutional question made by the counsel for complainant. As already shown, Hall was deceased when the act of March 16, 1869, was passed, and no administration was taken out until nearly three months after the date of this enactment. It cannot, I apprehend, be safely contended that when a party has a subsisting right of action which will be barred by a certain time, that he is compellable to institute proceedings to recover its fruits before the last day of the limitation. Assuming the legal correctness of this, it follows that Marsh had, at least, to the last day of 1869 in which to bring his suit against Mills. Now, suppose Hall had not died until, say, the middle of December, 1869, and the twelve months' exemption stood repealed, Marsh would be environed with unsurmountable evils and difficulties which he could not have foreseen, and so avoided. As no administrator could have been qualified by the Ordinary intermediate the death of Hall and the period fixed for the bar, Marsh's dilemma would have been this: The statute says, sue by the 1st of January, 1870, and the only reply he could make, is, there is no one subject by law to answer the writ of subpœna. If the case under consideration was like the suppositive one, I should be inclined to hold a state statute that produced such a consequence violative of the constitution of the United States; for, by thus depriving a party of all remedy, it works a forfeiture of his rights, without fault on his part. But there was a legal representative of Hall in Mills, the administrator with the will annexed, and who had qualified as such seven months or a little less, anterior to the 1st of January, 1870; and if the twelve months' exemption from suit has been repealed by the act of March 16, 1869, he could have been sued before the right of action would have been barred. This fact, however, in its result, would be very much like class legislation, so far, at least, as Marsh would be affected; for, as there was no representative of the estate of Hall for nearly three months after the passage of the act of March 16, 1869, the nine months and fifteen days allowed to sue in would be diminished to less than seven. (Constitution Georgia, article 1, section XXVI.) Moreover, whether this would be reasonable time in which to bring civil suits or be barred, I am not called upon to determine. But has the twelve months exempted to an administrator by section 2548 of the code been repealed? This is the prime question. Mr. Justice McLEAN, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in McCluny v. Silliman, 3 Peters, 270, said: "Under this statute" (24th section of the judiciary act of 1789) "the acts of limitations of the several states, where no special provision has been made by Congress, form a rule of decision in the courts of the United States; and the same effect is given to them as is given in the state courts."

Digitized by Google

The rule of action is formed in the different states as it may have been adopted and modified by legislation or a course of judicial decisions. The rule of decision must be found in the local laws, written or unwritten.

If the act of March 16th, 1869, does not repeal the twelve months' exemption from suit, allowed to administrators, and after a careful consideration of the entire statute, I think it does not repeal the exemption given to administrators; therefore, I am of the opinion that it is a valid law, and in consonance with the constitution of the United States.

The following case—Moravian Seminary v. Atwood et al.—was recently decided by the supreme court of Georgia, TRIPP, J., pronouncing the opinion: "An account was contracted and due in September, 1862. Administration was granted on the estate of the debtor in September, 1869, it not appearing on the record when he died. Suit was instituted on the account in October, 1871. Held, that the plaintiff was barred by the statute of limitations of March 16, 1869. Even though the plaintiff may not have been entitled to have brought suit against the administrator by the 1st of January, 1870, which we do not determine, the spirit and equity of the statute required that it should have been commenced within a period after twelve months from the grant of administration, which was equal to the time allowed by the statute for bringing suits on such debts, to wit: from the date of the passage of the act to the 1st of January, 1870."

Mills not having been made a party defendant to the bill filed on the 24th September, 1868, by Marsh against Burroughs and others, until after the expiration of the nine months and fifteen days immediately following the twelve months' exemption from suit given an administrator by the code, I overrule the exceptions filed by the complainant, and decree the plea to be a full bar to the bill; and it is further ordered that the bill be dismissed as to Mills at cost of complainant.

The common law action having been instituted by Scott against Mills on the 30th of December, 1870, and within the nine months and fifteen days immediately following the twelve months' exemption from action allowed to an administrator by the code, it is ordered and adjudged that the demurrer to the plea in bar be sustained.

—MR. CORNELIUS has introduced a bill in the Missouri house of representatives, which provides that hereafter, when any civil cause shall be submitted to any circuit judge, either upon a question of law, or as the trier of the facts in said cause, or both, it shall be the duty of said judge to state in writing, as a part of his judgment or finding in said cause, the grounds or reasons of his judgment or finding. That the provisions of the foregoing section shall be applicable to the circuit judges of St. Louis county as well when sitting in general as in special term.

—THE attorney-general has decided that the act of 1871 providing that money paid into courts shall be deposited with the assistant treasurers of the United States, does not apply to moneys in bankrupt cases, but those moneys are to be deposited according to the provisions of the bankrupt act and the rules of the court made under it.

Chancery Practice—Foreclosure—Rights of Prior Encumbrancers—Possession of State Courts—Suits in State Courts by officer of Federal Courts, etc.

JOHN L. SUTHERLAND, TRUSTEE, v. THE LAKE SUPERIOR SHIP CANAL RAILROAD AND IRON COMPANY, et al.

THOMAS V. McCARTER, TRUSTEE, v. SAME COMPANY, et al.

LUCIEN BIRDSEYE, TRUSTEE, v. SAME COMPANY, et al.

In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. In Equity.

Before Hon. H. H. EMMONS, Circuit Judge.

1. Necessary Parties in Equity.—To a bill by a junior mortgagee against a mortgagor or his assignee in bankruptcy, prior encumbrancers are necessary parties, where there is substantial doubt as to the amounts which are due them or as to the property covered by their liens

2. Sales in Equity of Doubtful Interest.—A court of equity will in no instance expose for sale an interest capable of being reduced to a certainty, where any doubt exists as to its character and extent.

3. Chancery Practice—Foreclosure of Mortgage.—Where a subsequent encumbrancer is already impleaded by a prior one, a subsequent original bill, on his parts will not be sustained to foreclose his mortgage. Full relief may be granted in the first suit, either with or without a cross-bill, as exigencies exist.

4. ——. When Independent Suits will not be Permitted.—When property is in the hands of a receiver, no party having interest therein, and much less will active parties, be permitted, without leave of court, to seek an enforcement of their right, by an original suit Such leave will in no case be granted where the relief sought is competent in the pending litigation.

5. ——. ——. Separate Suit by Mortgage Trustee.—Where a subsequent mortgage trustee, who had appeared and submitted to a receiver of the estate resigned his trust, pendente lite, and his successor, without leave filed an original bill of foreclosure, it was held to be unnecessary and unwarranted. Such suit would be permanently stayed on summary application, or, upon answer and proofs, dismissed at the hearing The rights of such successor need not be noticed in the original suit, as he would be bound by the decree.

6. Sale of Mortgaged Premises.—A court of equity may sell mortgaged premises free from encumbrances, remitting the lien holders to the proceeds at the suit of subsequent encumbrancers or other parties having rights in the equity of redemption. The power in this regard, so frequently exercised in bankruptcy, is but an application there of this principle.

7. Practice of Federal Courts with Reference to Possession of State Courts—Power of Federal Court to order suit to be instituted in State Court—The late decision in Marshall v Knox, 16 Wall. 551, denying the power of the district court to invade the jurisdiction of a state tribunal, where property is in its actual custody, under proceedings commenced anterior to the bankruptcy, does not deny the power of the circuit court to order all matters pending therein to be adjudicated in an original suit, subsequently commenced in such court, by an assignee in bankruptcy. It is a mere question of practice and convenience. That the property is in the hands of the court and receiver constitutes no exception to the rule.

8. Assignee's Bill to sell Mortgaged Property. - The circuit court will entertain a bill by an assignee in bankruptcy against several mortgages and other lienholders to ascertain the amounts due, and sell the property free from encumbrances.

9. Chancery Pleading—Office of Cross-bill.—Where matters are germane to and connected with the subject of a suit, they may be introduced by cross-bill, although new and not mentioned in the original bill.

Alfred Russell for complainants; Meddaugh & Driggs and Ashley Pond, for the assignees in bankruptcy, defendants.

The following is the substance of the opinion of Judge EMMONS, much abbreviated. The opinion was prepared by him through the aid of an amanuensis, owing to his own defective eye-sight, which prevented any examination of books, except by such assistance. This abstract of his opinion has been put in form by a member of the bar and submitted to the Judge. It has his approval as substantially correct.

The property involved amounted to several millions of dollars, consisting of lands granted by congress to aid in the construction of a canal, and of the canal itself and a large quantity of personal property.

July 1, 1865, the company executed a mortgage, of which John L. Sutherland is trustee, upon part of the lands and all the personal property and the canal, to secure its bonds in the sum of $500,000.

Digitized by Google

July 1, 1868, it executed a mortgage, of which Lucien Birdseye is trustee, upon other lands and upon the canal and the personal property, to secure an additional issue of bonds in the sum of $500,000.

July 1, 1870, it executed a mortgage, of which Thomas N. McCarter is trustee, upon all the property covered by the two other mortgages, to secure a further issue of its bonds in the amount of $1,250,000.

May 1, 1871, it executed a mortgage to the Union Trust company of New York, upon the property covered by the several other mortgages, and some additional property.

May 25, 1872, a bill was filed in Sutherland's name, in this court, to foreclose his mortgage, to which the company, Birdseye and Frost (McCarter's predecessor in the trust) and the Union Trust company, were made parties defendant. The defendants all appeared and answered.

June 13, 1872, a receiver was appointed in the Sutherland case, of the entire property of the company, and authorized to create an indebtedness of $500,000, to be a first lien on all the property. This was by consent of some, and without opposition from any of the defendants.

July 3, 1872, a bill was filed in this court, in McCarter's name (he having been duly appointed Frost's successor), to foreclose his mortgage. The mortgagor and the Union Trust company of New York were made parties.

July 5, 1872, a bill was filed in this court, in Birdseye's name, to foreclose his mortgage. The mortgagor, McCarter, and the Union Trust company of New York were made parties.

August 27, 1872, the mortgagor was adjudicated bankrupt.

December 3, 1872, George Jerome and Fernando C. Beaman were duly appointed assignees, and by supplemental bills were made parties to said several foreclosure suits.

The entire property was then in the custody of the court, through its receiver in the Sutherland case, when the subsequent bills were filed, without leave of the court being asked or obtained.

Subsequently the Union Trust company of New York filed its bill to foreclose its mortgage in the bankruptcy court.

In reference to the amount due upon each of these successive securities, and more especially in reference to what the certificates of the receiver cover, whether all or a part only of the property of the corporation, the widest differences exist at the bar.

The assignees, after their appointment, appeared in the Sutherland, the Birdseye and the McCarter suits, without setting up in either the pendency of the others, though the pendency of the Sutherland suit is expressly set up in the bills of complaint in both the Birdseye and McCarter cases, and in each it is stated that the complainant therein is made defendant in the Sutherland case, and that a receiver of the property had been appointed.

In these circumstances it was insisted by the assignees that neither Birdseye nor McCarter (being subsequent encumbrancers and already impleaded in the Sutherland suit, they might have had their liens adjusted, and the property which they covered sold) had a right to file either of the subsequent bills without leave of court, and thus necessitate a triple litigation. They insist further that as doubts exist in reference to the amount of the prior liens, which was put in issue by the pleadings, and as to the property which the dominant one covered, it was impossible to make a proper decree under the Birdseye or McCarter bills. As the facts upon which these equities rested were not contained in the answers and could not be administered as the pleadings in the foreclosure cases then stood, an original bill was filed by the assignees in this court making Sutherland, Birdseye, McCarter and the Union Trust company parties, which had for its object a sale of the mortgaged premises free of liens and an ascertainment of the rights of the various parties interested in the proceeds, and their distribution accordingly. Upon this bill a motion was made to stay the proceedings in the foreclosure cases, which was granted. Whether this bill should be entertained, and the rights of all the parties interested in the several mortgages named should be administered in this suit, and in the meantime the foreclosure suits permanently stayed, or whether the equities should be worked out in the foreclosure suits—in one or all of them—was the general subject discussed upon the argument and submitted for decision of the court.

The motion for stay was originally made before the circuit judge, who then expressed a strong preference for the amendment of the pleadings in the Sutherland suit, in which he intimated an opinion that all the rights of the parties could be effectually secured.

Full reference was made by his honor to the written judgment delivered by him some months since, when the stay of proceedings was originally granted. That opinion announced fully all opinions expressed in this. It emphatically declared the gross impropriety of suffering Birdseye or McCarter to sell the equity of redemption while prior liens existed, the extent of which was disputed both in amount and as to the property which they covered. A strong preference was then expressed for continuing the entire working of these causes in the hands of the mortgagees, who seemed to have interests so much more extensive than any other parties upon the record. The high character of their equities and the obligation of great diligence to speed the cause on the part of the assignees, were therein fully recognized.

On the point of whether all the prior mortgagees might have been made parties to the McCarter bill, his honor said: "We deem it entirely clear that the prior encumbrancers, under the circumstances of this case, are necessary parties to the McCarter bill if it were proper, as it was not, to file it at all after the property which it seeks to sell was already in custodia legis."

To sustain the right to sell the equity of redemption without making prior lien holders parties and ascertaining their rights, the counsel for the mortgagees, he said, had referred to the following and numerous other cases: 2 Barb. Ch. Pr. 174; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 373; 2 Spence Eq. Jur. 605, 704; Ld. Langdale, 6 Bev. 557; Hobart v. Abott, 2 P. Wms. 643; Williamson v. Probasco, 4 Halst. Ch. 571; Gibson v. McCormick, 10 Gill & J. 65, 109. "We have," he said, "examined them all. They show only that subsequent encumbrancers must be parties. There is nowhere an intimation that prior ones may not and should not be impleaded whenever it is necessary to ascertain the amount which is due to them, or there is a substantial doubt as to the property covered by their liens. A mortgagor who insists that he has paid a prior encumbrance cannot be subjected to the injury of a sale while this question is in dispute."

In the 11 Wheaton, 304, Finley v. Bank of United States, MARSHALL, C. J., says: "It cannot be doubted that Coleman (the prior mortgagee) ought regularly to have been a party defendant, and, that had the existence of his mortgage been known to the court, no decrees ought to have been pronounced in the cause until he was introduced into it."

This was not understood as declaratory of a universal rule. It is correctly limited in 14 Howard, 29, Hagan v. Walker et al., where CURTIS, J., reviews the authorities, and lays down the doctrine as announced by this court some months since at the first hearing of the motion.

He says: "On the other hand, there are cases in which it has been declared that all encumbrancers are necessary parties. Many are collected in Story's Eq. Pl. 178. But we consider the true rule to be that, where it is the object of a bill to procure a sale of the land, and the prior encumbrancer holds the legal title and his debt is payable, it is proper to make him a party in order that a sale may be made of the whole title. In this sense and for this purpose he may be correctly said to be a necessary party, that is, necessary to such a decree. But it is in the power of the court to order a sale subject to the prior encumbrances—a power which it will exercise in fit cases. And when the prior encumbrancer is not subject to the jurisdiction of the court, or cannot be joined without defeating its jurisdiction, and the validity of the encumbrance is admitted, it is fit to dispense with his being made a party." The 11th of Wallace, 459, Galveston Railroad v. Cowdrey, fully authorizes every matter litigated here to be determined in either one of the pending suits. A bill was filed by bondholders in successive mortgages in behalf of themselves and all others, the court holding that holders under either of the securities might intervene by cross-bill to contest the priority of anterior mortgages.

Digitized by Google

To show the necessity in many cases of making prior mortgagees parties, he cited the following cases: Barbour's Ch. Pr. 174; Story's Eq. Pl. 8th ed., par. 193; Clark v. Prentiss, 3 Dana, 468. In McGown v. Yerks, 6 Johns. Ch. 450, Chancellor KENT refused a decree without making prior encumbrancers parties, in a case where the reason for bringing them in was far less than that presented by the facts in the case before us.

In Western Ins. Co. v. Eagle Ins. Co., 1 Paige, 284, the court, in overruling a demurrer interposed by a prior encumbrancer to a bill filed by a junior mortgagee, declined to decide the point whether in all cases the court would decree a sale of the property free from encumbrance against the consent of the prior lien holder, but overruled the demurrer, holding that the bill was clearly maintainable for the purpose of making a better title and ascertaining the amount due.

The judge observed that there was no such difficulty as this in the case now under consideration, as all the bills on file ask a sale for the full amount secured by their mortgages. They not only consent to, but are all demanding, decrees for immediate sale. The only question is, shall there be four lawsuits instead of one?

The counsel for the mortgagees cited Rose v. Page, 2 Sim. 471; Delabere v. Norwood, 3 Swanst. 144, and other cases, to the position that when a second mortgagee files a bill against a third mortgagee and the mortgagor, such case constitutes an exception to the rule that a prior mortgagee must be made a party, even where there is a doubt as to what the prior mortgage covers, or the amount due thereon. Respecting these cases his honor said, these two cases, together with the others referred to by counsel for complainants in this connection, are cited by Barbour on Parties, who on page 449 uses the language quoted in the counsel's brief in reference to this point, as does Mr. Justice STORY in his Equity Pleadings.

It is manifest, however, that neither of these authors mean, nor do the cases which they refer to justify the conclusion, that it constitutes an exception to the universal rule that a prior encumbrancer must be made a party when his lien is in contestation. None of the long list of books referred to by counsel, either English or American, has the slightest tendency to even qualify the rule that no sale should be suffered to take place in a court of equity where the extent and the amount of prior liens are disputed. Every elementary work referred to by counsel for mortgagees announces in the most explicit terms, rules of pleading and practice which forbid the anomalous decree he asks in the McCarter and Birdseye cases. Cases, too, have been cited and especially commented on, which incidentally say that the holder of a prior admitted mortgage need not be made a party. Every one of them undeniably negatives the doctrine sought to be deduced from them. They clearly show that what is meant by the word admitted includes what is due upon the lien and what it covers. There is nowhere in judgment or in elementary books the slightest warrant for the unjust and impolitic doctrine that Birdseye and McCarter in their respective suits can sell in mass some millions of property, capable of division into suitable parcels for more judicious sale, and subject to liens uncertain in amount and as to the property which they cover. Had the proofs disclosed such a case at the final hearing the court would, of its own motion, have ordered the pleadings to be amended and the proper parties brought in. It would be a gross fraud on the part of the assignees to consent to such a decree. In no other way could the court accomplish what was so well expressed by JOHNSON, J., in 4 Peters, 190 (9 Curtis, 49), Caldwell v. Taggart:

"It is not enough that a court of equity causes nothing but the interest of the proper party to change owners. Its decree should terminate and not instigate litigation. Its sales should tempt men to sober investments and not to wild speculations. Its process should act upon known and definite interests and not upon such as admit of no medium of estimation. It has the means of reducing every right to certainty and precision, and is therefore bound to employ those means in the exercise of its jurisdiction."

On the question of the propriety of commencing the Birdseye and McCarter suits, under the circumstances, his honor, among other things, said:

The bills by Birdseye and McCarter were not only defective for want of proper parties to enable the court to make such a decree as would expose the property for sale in such conditions as would authorize purchasers to bid, but they had both been unnecessarily and improvidently commenced pendente lite, without leave of court. Birdseye and Frost (who was the predecessor of McCarter) were both impleaded and actually appeared in the Sutherland suit and were bound by the receivership.

Similar action has been frequently discountenanced by courts of the highest respectability. In 3 Paige Ch. 509, Wendell v. Wendell et al., where the subsequent encumbrancer was made a party to a bill to foreclose a prior mortgage, and he without leave subsequently filed a bill to foreclose his own mortgage, Chancellor WALWORTH charged costs against the party thus proceeding, and this where the objection was not taken in the answer. He said the whole property might have been sold and all the rights adjusted in one suit, as all the parties were before the court. To this familiar truth, cases and elementary books are numerous. The doctrine is applicable to the case before us. It is true that in this case there is some property in the Birdseye mortgage not covered by that of Sutherland; but so long as all are a common lien upon the canal and its franchises, and all have alike consented to the receivership which creates a dominant lien over all the property, this can work no practical legal consequence. If there is any doubt as to the power of the court without cross-bills to sell the additional assets mentioned in the subsequent mortgages, such bill would be directed to be filed.

16 Wallace, 203, Davis v. Gray, elaborately reviews the doctrine in regard to receivers in courts of equity, and lays down the undoubted rule that no party having interest in the estate, whether impleaded or not, can properly commence an original suit without leave of court. Had such leave been asked in this instance, beyond all controversy it would not have been granted, from the fact that such suits are wholly unnecessary and can tend only to make costs. Indeed, it is not perceived how it is possible to make a complete decree in either the Birdseye or the McCarter suits, and to settle the amounts due upon the previous encumbrances in such circumstances as to give all parties proper review in the court of last resort, without making them parties in each suit where those facts are to be settled. At great length and with much earnestness counsel for the mortgagees has argued that there is no objection whatever to selling property so circumstanced, subject to the rights of Sutherland and the receiver. This position is directly answered in the very full opinion of NELSON, J., Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 Howard, 52. It is there stated in express terms that it is no answer to the objection that the sale is to be made subject to the rights of the receiver; that the court will not suffer a hostile claimant to be created, whose rights are to be subsequently settled in another tribunal. It is fallacy to argue that a receiver holds subject to the rights of the mortgagees only. He holds alike for all. He represents just as fully those of the assignees, of the shareholders, and the creditors as the prior lien holders; and if a sale should be ordered which was in hostility to and would dispose of the rights of those interested in the equity of redemption, this sale would be directly in hostility to the rights of the receiver who holds possession for them. To illustrate the completeness of the jurisdiction in the Sutherland suit, and how the rights of all parties might be adjusted therein, cases, 24 Howard, 450, Freeman v. Howe; 16 Wall. 203, Davis v. Gray; 10 Wall. 327, Jones v. Andrews, and others, were referred to and commented upon. They show that suits in reference to property in custodia legis are deemed auxiliary only to the principal cases.

Digitized by Google

His honor said it was wholly unnecessary for Sutherland in any way to notice the trustee, McCarter. He had become trustee pendente lite. It seemed extravagant to say that, while his predecessor, Frost, was impleaded in the Sutherland suit and bound by the order granting a receiver, his successor could file an original bill without leave of court to sell the equity of redemption without impleading the prior parties. Story's Eq. Pl. 156. "Generally speaking, an assignee pendente lite need not be made a party to a bill, or be brought before the court; for every person purchasing pendente lite is treated as a purchaser with notice, and is subject to all the equities of the persons under whom he claims in privity. And it would make no difference whether the assignee pendente lite be the claimant of a legal or of an equitable interest, or whether he be the assignee of the plaintiffs or the defendants. Still, however, it is often important to bring such assignee before the court as a party by a supplementary bill, in order to take away a cloud hanging over the title, or to compel the assignee to do some act, or to join in some conveyance. So that such assignee, although not a necessary party, may at the same time be a proper party at the election of the plaintiff. And an assignee after the bill was filed, but before subpœna was served, has been held to be a necessary party."

It is only in cases where the complainant parts with his interest and where defendant's rights are transferred by death or by operation of law, as by bankruptcy or the insolvent laws, that a transfer pendente lite need be noticed by litigants in court.

His honor said that among the positions taken by mortgagees' counsel which surprised him most, and to sustain which he had found the least learning, whether in judgments or elementary books, was that there exists no power in an American court of chancery to sell property covered by successive mortgages free from encumbrances, upon bills filed by junior mortgagees, by judgment creditors, or by the owner of the equity of redemption.

It had been argued that Sutherland and Birdseye were not proper parties to the suit by McCarter, because if they were brought in, there was no power on the part of the court to make any other decree than the mere one to sell this vast estate in mass, subject to prior liens which were uncertain in amount and extent. The broad ground had been taken that prior encumbrancers were not necessary parties, for the reason that there was no power to sell free from encumbrances. This power, he said, is fully conceded in Hancock v. Hancock, 22 N. Y., 568; in Gibson v. McCormick, 10 Gill & Johnson, 65. The latter quite fully asserts and justifies the rule. It cites Elliott v. Pell, 1 Paige, 263, and Chamley v. Lord Dunsaney et al., 2 Sch. & Lef., 710 and 718, as sustaining such right. The only doubt is where a prior mortgagee opposes the sale because his claim is not due, or he would be injured by it; but, as before said in these cases, they all demand a sale. In Vanderkemp v. Shelton, 11 Paige, 28, a bill was filed to foreclose a junior mortgage and the prior mortgagee was made a party. The chancellor says:

"The complainant's bill is properly framed for that purpose; as this is a bill for the foreclosure and sale of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises to satisfy the several encumbrances thereon according to their respective priorities, and is not a mere bill to redeem. In England the court does not decree a sale of mortgaged premises, but merely allows the second encumbrancer to file a bill to redeem from the first encumbrance, and that the junior encumbrancer may redeem both of the prior ones or be foreclosed. And the complainant there is in all cases required to offer to redeem the first encumbrance. But where the puisne creditor has the right to a sale of the estate to satisfy his debt after applying so much of the proceeds of the sale as may be necessary to pay the debt and costs of the prior encumbrancer, he is not required to offer to pay the first encumbrance. All the prior encumbrancer has a right to ask, even when he is in possession under his encumbrance, is that he shall not be subjected to useless costs, when the proceeds of the sale will not probably be sufficient to pay the amount of his debt with interest and the costs of foreclosure."

In Hagan v. Walker et al., 14 Howard, 29, Justice CURTIS, after very fully considering the subject, says: The court will exercise its discretion whether to sell free from or subject to prior encumbrances.

The power exercised by the court of bankruptcy, to sell free from encumbrances, is but an instance of a similar one familiar to the court of chancery. We should wholly, irrespective of the bankrupt law, if the facts ultimately presented warranted it, sell the entire estate free from encumbrances; it may appear that in no other way can the various interests in the equity of redemption be in the slightest degree protected.

Respecting the power of the court in exercising the functions conferred upon it by the bankrupt act, when these functions should be called into operation by proper proceedings on the part of the assignees, his honor said:

"The reading of the statute which has been given by the learned counsel for the mortgagees comes too late. The numerous instances in which the district courts, originally by summary proceeding, and latterly, since that has been pronounced to be irregular, by bill, have sold property free from encumbrances, remitting lien holders to the fund in court, would upon every rule of propriety constrain this court to consider it as settled law, until a superior tribunal shall pronounce the practice unlawful." The following cases are some only of the instances of its exercise: In re Sacchi, 10 Blatchford, 29; Alabama and Florida R. R. Co., B. R. 100; in re Kirtland, 10 Blatchford, 515; in re Salmons, 2 B. R. 19; in re Stewart, 1 B. R. 42; Foster v. Ames, 2 B. R. 147; in re Barrow, 1 B. R. 125; in re Rahley, 4 B. R. 124; in re Columbian Metal Works, 3 B. R. 18; in re N. Y. Kerosene Oil Co., 3 B. R. 31; in re Schnepf, 1 B. R. (Supp.) 41; Markson v. Keavey, 4 B. R. 165; in re McClellan, 1 B. R. 91; Davis v. Anderson, 6 B. R. 145; in re Mebane, 3 B. R. 91; Houston v. City B'k N. O., 6 How. 486; Fowler v. Hart, 13 How. 373.

In a proper case he thought the circuit court would, under this act, entertain a bill in equity to ascertain the extent of liens and to sell free of encumbrances. That a lien-holder is an adverse claimant, and that an ordinary debtor is such, was several times decided under the act of 1841, the language of which, so far as affects this question, is identical with that of the present law. See Mitchell, Assignee, v. Great Works Co., per Judge STORY, 2 Story, 648; Pritchard v. Chandler, 2 Curtis, 488, by Judge CURTIS. In Forsyth v. Woods, 11 Wallace, 484, jurisdiction to recover a debt was assumed without question; and see Morgan v. Thornhill, 11 Wall. 65. In McLean, Assignee, v. Lafayette Bank et al., 3 McLean, 415, it is said that an assignee in bankruptcy, having a right to discharge encumbrances on the bankrupt's estate, may file his bill in chancery against all encumbrancers to ascertain the validity, priority, and amount of the encumbrances.

But all this history, it is said, is rendered wholly inapplicable by the late decision in Marshall v. Knox, 16 Wallace, 551, in which it was decided that property in the custody of a state sheriff, by process anterior to the bankruptcy, could not be interfered with by a district court.

Digitized by Google

But for that case, after a good many perusals of the judgments in 3 Howard, 292, ex parte Christy; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612; Orton v. Smith, 18 How. 263; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. 450; Buck v. Coldbath, 3 Wall. 334; and the many judgments in which their doctrine has been applied and limited—he would have confidently held with so many of his brethren of the circuit and district courts, that the bankrupt law did intend to create a complete system and enable the district court to administer all the assets of the bankrupt, irrespective of the accident of whether litigation might be pending in state tribunals concerning portions of his property. They who have so held did so in no want of familiarity with the rule which these cases affirm. It was thought that congress had exercised its undoubted power to create a complete bankrupt system, and draw instanter into the district court every right of the bankrupt. When it dissolves attachments, notwithstanding the custody of the state courts, and abrogates assignments when the property is in the hands of the assignees under state insolvent laws, and full jurisdiction is expressly given to arrest all pending suits in personam, at law in state tribunals, no matter when commenced, it would seem that but a small additional power is necessary to complete the wholesome and beneficial system which ought at least, he thought, to have been established by the statute. And when it is considered, what Marshall v. Knox seems to concede, that where judgments are confessed and levies made by way of preference in the state courts within four months preceding the bankruptcy, they may be declared void, and the property seized by the bankrupt court; the remaining domain of state tribunals which cannot be interfered with is so trivial and exceptional as to leave the inference a strong one that it was not intended to be protected by congress His honor remarked that it was difficult, many times sitting in the midst of exigencies which demand a more extended power in order to secure an efficient and protective administration of right, at first to appreciate the wisdom of decisions which seemingly without necessity limit and cramp our jurisdiction. It was only when we take into consideration a series of decisions made in a long course of years that their wisdom could be fully appreciated. They have established a principle, which experience had found to be beneficent, of leaving every assumption of jurisdiction on the part of federal tribunals to be expressly authorized by congress. Nothing was to be taken by implication, unless it was that necessary inference without which the law could not be administered. Notwithstanding the ingenious criticism of the assignee's counsel, he did not see why Marshall v. Knox does not decide that, excepting cases where a fraud upon the bankrupt law is charged, property in custodia legis by a state court was beyond the jurisdiction of the district court. The decision in this case, he said, goes upon the supposition that Marshall v. Knox so holds. The doctrine, however, he thought, has no application where the pending suits are in our own tribunal, and the property in the hands of our own receiver. Here no comity is to be violated. A large mass of property worth millions, encumbered by successive and doubtful liens, some upon one portion and some upon another, with bills unnecessarily and irregularly filed, he thought, within principles entirely familiar to courts of equity, and especially to the federal tribunals, a bill by the assignees, setting forth the entire history of the case, might be authorized by the court. He did not think it necessary in this case to resort to the doctrine of ancillary or cross-bills. He had, however, had his request answered which was made during the argument, that he might be referred to a few cases sustaining a bill in the nature of a cross-bill, in which both new parties and new matters might be added, irrespective of any power derived under the bankrupt act. The following cases were then cited and commented upon: Brown v. Story, 2 Paige, 594; Jones v. Smith, 14 Ill. 229; Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vt. 414; Fletcher v. Holmes, 25 Ind. 458-68. That the time in which this may be done is within the discretion of the court, see Story's Eq. Pl. 396.

A reading of all the judgments upon this subject with attention to the facts involved in each will show with entire clearness that all which is meant when it is said that new parties and new subject matter cannot be introduced into a cause by cross-bill, is that it cannot be done when they are foreign to and not necessarily connected with the matter of the original bill.

His honor, in the progress of the opinion, indicated his intention to make an order directing future proceedings in the several foreclosure cases. Such an order, however, was not made, but subsequently an order was entered in each of the cases vacating the previous orders staying the proceedings, leaving the counsel for the assignee to take such action, in the light of his honor's opinion, as they should deem best. It is understood that an immediate application will be made by them for leave to amend their answers, and to file a cross-bill in the Sutherland case.

Railway Negligence — Killing Cattle — Fencing Track within Corporate Limits.

FLINT & PERE MARQUETTE RAILWAY CO. v. LULL.

Supreme Court of Michigan, January Term, 1874.

[Through the courtesy of Henry N. Chaney, Esq., of Lansing, Michigan, editor of Chaney's Quarterly Digest of Decisions of the Supreme Court of Michigan, we are permitted to extract from advance sheets, embracing the decisions rendered at the January Term, 1874, the interesting case of Flint & Pere Marquette Railway Company v. Lull.]

Lull's cow, while passing over the track to go to the river for water, was killed at one side of the highway crossing where there was no cattle-guard. Lull owned the land on both sides of the track between the crossing and the river. He sued for the value of the cow under Act 43 of 1872 (now repealed, but substantially re-enacted so far as cattle-guards are concerned, in Sec. 15 of Art. 4 of Act 198 of 1873—Sess. Laws of 1873, Vol. 1, p. 538), and obtained a verdict. The company urged that the statute obligation to fence the track and put in cattle-guards did not apply to so much of the road as lay within the limits of a city or village, and supported itself by reference to Lafayette, etc., R. R. Co. v. Shriner, 6 Ind. 141; Indianapolis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Kinney, 8 Ind. 402; Davis v. Burlington, etc., R. R. Co., 26 Iowa, 549; and Durand v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 26 Iowa, 558. The judgment was, however, affirmed with costs.

The following are the rulings made, and the authorities by which they are supported:

Fencing Track within Corporate Limits.—The more satisfactory rule relating to statutes requiring the fencing of railroad tracks, holds that they do not apply where it would be illegal or improper that the road should be fenced, as at the crossings of streets and alleys in a city or town, or at mills, etc., where public convenience requires the way to be left open. This, however, is the limit of the exception, and the track within the corporate limits of a city or town, at points where no such reasons apply, is as much within the statute as the track elsewhere. Indianapolis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Parker, 29 Ind. 471; Jeffersonville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Parkhurst, 34 Ind. 501. Any exceptional case must be proved by the railroad company, and cannot be inferred.

Fencing at Depot.—No statute can be held to require depot grounds to be fenced, without a very clear declaration to that effect, not only because such fencing is unusual, but because the convenience of the company, as well as of the public in transacting business with it, would be very seriously incommoded by such fencing, and the track of the company can be better protected, and with less impediment to business at such points, by other methods than fencing.

Contributory Neglect.—In case of injury to cattle, the owner's contributory negligence would be a defence in a common-law action. Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274; Corwin v. N. Y. & Erie R. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 46. But in cases rising under statutes, the purpose of which is not merely to compensate the owner of destroyed property, but to enforce against the company an obligation they owe to the public, it is almost uniformly held that the plaintiff's negligence in case of his property can constitute no defence. Indianapolis, etc., R. R. Co. v.

Digitized by Google

Townsend, 10 Ind. 38; Indiana Central R. R. Co. v. Leamon, 18 Ind. 173; McCall v. Chamberlain, 13 Wis. 637; Horn v. Atlantic, etc., R. R. Co., 35 N. H. 169. If it could, the purpose of the statute might be defeated by virtually allowing the neglect of the company to constitute its own defence, since that neglect alone would render the conduct of the plaintiff negligence, in permitting his cattle to be at large in the vicinity of the road, even on his own grounds.

Fencing, a Police Rule.—Statutes requiring the fencing of railroad tracks are police regulations, as much for the security of passengers as for the protection of property. Indianapolis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Marshall, 27 Ind. 302; Jeffersonville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Nichols, 30 Ind. 321.

Removal of Causes from State Court to Federal Court—Construction of Acts of Congress.

CRANE v. REEDERS.

Supreme Court of Michigan, January Term, 1874.

[We are also permitted to select this important case from advance sheets of Chaney's Michigan Digest:]

The supreme court having thrice reversed judgments obtained by the Reeders in an action of ejectment brought against them by Crane, and having each time remanded the cause for new trial, the Reeders alleging that they were British subjects, and that they believed that owing to prejudice or local influence they could not obtain justice in the court below, petitioned said court to transfer the cause to the United States court. The court below granted the petition, and Crane brought error on that decision. His opponents moved to dismiss the writ; the motion was denied, and when the case came up on the merits their counsel declined to argue it. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment with costs.

The following are the points ruled and the authorities referred to:

Construction of the Federal Transfer Acts.—For the meaning of the acts of congress relating to the transfer of cases from state to federal courts, see Ackerly v. Vilas, 24 Wis. 165; Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 20 Ohio St. 175; Bryant v. Rich, 106 Mass. 180; Adams Express Co. v. Trego, 35 Md. 47; Burson v. Nat. Park Bank, 40 Md. 174.

Retaining Jurisdiction.—In construing statutes affecting the continuance of jurisdiction in courts of original and general authority, the law has always favored its retention. Cates v. Knight, 3 T. R. 442; ex parte Heath et al., 3 Hill, N. Y. 42; Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. 440.

Construction of the Federal Transfer Acts.—Of the federal transfer acts, that of 1789 literally limits the application to remove a case from a state to a federal court to the time of the defendant's appearance in the state court, and expressly gives the right to alien defendants, and to citizen defendants residing in a state other than that in which the suit is begun; that of 1866 cures an abuse of the former act, by which it came to be held that alien and non-resident citizen defendants could not take steps to remove a case when impleaded with citizens of the state in which the suit was brought, so that plaintiffs resorted to impleading or joining resident citizens solely to preclude the right of removal; and that of 1867 literally applies to citizens, and does not apply to cases where the ground of removal is the alienage of the defendants. The last law contemplates a class of cases arising from the civil war, when the suit is between citizens of different states and the abuse or denial of jurisdiction is apprehended in the state tribunal. The three acts all relate to the same general subject, but contemplate distinct grounds on which the right to remove is made to depend; and if any case has only in part the elements which assign it to one class, and in part the elements for another, it is not removable. It wants the precise composite character predetermined by congress as indispensable.

The Transfer Act of 1866.—The federal transfer act of 1866 requires the application to remove a case from a state to a federal court to be made before the "trial." It covers cases at law and in equity, and the term "trial" is uniformly applied to the actual litigation of the merits in an action at law as contradistinguished from the debate on the merits in equity; while the term "hearing" is more precisely applied to equity cases, and others savoring of civil law forms, rather than to proceedings grounded in common law, or shaped by analogy to its forms and methods. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. 440; United States v. Wonson, 1 Gall. 5; United States v. Goodwin, 7 Cranch, 108.

Wording of Acts of Congress.—Congress must be presumed to be acquainted with the course of judicial action and of the prevailing practice, and to understand the meaning of words they employ in their enactments as that meaning has become generally settled. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. 440; Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. 212; King v. Judd, 2 T. R. 255; Beaden v. King, 9 Hare, 499; Pollard v. Patterson, 3 Hen. & Mun. 67; Lowenburg v. People, 27 N. Y. 336; Com. v. Churchill, 2 Metc. 118; Merchants' Bank v. Cook, 4 Pick. 405; Snell v. Company, 24 Pick. 296; Thornby v. Fleetwood, 1 Strange, 318, 377.

Notes of Recent Decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

[Courtesy of Henry N. Sheldon, Esq., of Boston.]

Life Insurance—Restrictions as to Employment.—Defendant insured the life of plaintiff's intestate by a policy which acknowledged the receipt of the first annual premium, and provided among other things that the insured should not act as an engineer, but for five dollars additional gave him permission so to act for one year. The first premium was paid in part by notes which were not paid when due; and the insured acted as engineer for more than one year. Held, that the policy was avoided. Ayer v. New England Mutual Ins. Co.

Contract to Compromise Indebtedness—Effect of Breach.—Defendant's intestate gave to plaintiff his note for $45,000. Simultaneously therewith, plaintiff agreed under seal to receive in full payment therefor $10,000 to be paid in quarter annual payments. The intestate died insolvent, and his administrator suspended the quarterly payments. Held, that the whole amount of the note, less payments actually made, could be proved against the decedent's estate. Blake v. Blake.

Property in Church Pew—Forfeiture by joining another Society, etc.—Petitioner was a pewholder in the respondent corporation, under a deed of a pew containing the condition that it should be forfeited if he should leave that meeting-house without first offering his pew to the corporation for a fixed price. Petitioner joined another church, not having so offered his pew; and respondent entered the pew for breach of condition, and excluded him from meetings of the pewholders. Held, that he could not be restored by mandamus, although the entry was not made for four years after he had so left the church, and he had in the meantime been recognized as a pewholder by the respondent. Crocker v. Old South Society.

Travelling on Sunday.—A person travelling in a horse-car on Sunday, to go to a spiritualist camp-meeting, being herself a spiritualist, is not travelling unlawfully. Feital v. Middlesex R. R. Co.

Negligence—Common Carrier.—In an action by a passenger for injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the carrier's negligence, the plaintiff need not show what particular acts of negligence caused the injury. Feital v. Middlesex R. R. Co.

———. ———. Where Fare has not been Paid.—A person who gets upon the front platform of a horse-car, by invitation of the driver merely, not paying and not intending to pay any fare, and while there is injured by the carelessness of the driver, can maintain an action for such injury against the horse-railroad company, if she is otherwise in the exercise of due care; and this is a question for the jury. Wilton v. Middlesex R. R. Co.

———. ———. Injury to Passenger in leaving Horse-car.—A passenger injured while leaving a horse-car in motion, without having requested either conductor or driver to stop the car, is not in the exercise of due care, and cannot recover damages for such injury. Nichols v. Middlesex R. R. Co.

Constitutional Law—Municipal Corporation—Slaughter-houses, etc.—A statute forbidding the future establishment of slaughter-houses, rendering establishments, &c., without the consent of the selectmen of the town in which the business is to be carried on, is constitutional. Watertown v. Mago.

Expert Testimony—Health.—A witness, though not an expert, may testify to the comparative health of a person at different times. Parker v. Boston & Hingham Steamboat Co. [Compare Ashland v. Marlborough, 99 Mass. 47.]

Municipal Corporation—Influencing Legislation—Taxation.—No duty is by law imposed upon a town to resist, before the legislature or a committee thereof, a change in its boundaries, or its annexation to another city or town; and therefore a town has no authority to tax its inhabitants for expenses incurred in such proceedings. Coolidge v. Brookline.

Digitized by Google

Varying Written Receipt by Parol Evidence.—Although a receipt is signed with full knowledge of its purport and effect, without fraud, deductions being made bona fide and under a claim of right from the demands of the receiptor, and after some objection acquiesced in by him, yet he may, after receiving the amount named therein, control it by parol evidence that such deductions should not have been made. Nelson v. Weeks.

Notes and Queries.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., February 21st, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL: — Availing myself of a liberty treated by you with some leniency, I propound in the form of a query what may be regarded as more properly a suggestion. What would be a reasonable recompense to the reporters of several of our states whose vanity leads them to persist in pasting their own instead of the name of their state upon the backs of the volumes of reports with which they so copiously afflict the country, as an inducement to a change? If this is not a proper query for a law journal to answer, would a mandamus lie, at the instance of the profession et als, to compel a recognition of the propriety of at least allowing the name of the state to appear in conjunction with their own; so that text writers and others who are to cite and be cited to such reports, may know at once, without having to expend valuable time and labor in ascertaining, where Smith's or Jenkins' reports come from?

W. H.

ANSWER.—The evil complained of by W. H. is a grievous one, and with the multiplicity of law reports, is becoming more so every day. We have Hill, New York, and Hill, South Carolina; Greene, Iowa, and Green, New Jersey; Metcalf, Massachusetts, and Metcalfe, Kentucky; Munroe, and B. Monroe; A. K. Marshall, J. J. Marshall, Marshall, English; and so on through a catalogue of infinite perplexity. The responsibility does not rest entirely with the reporters. The habit has become inveterate in some states, and new reporters do not like to take the responsibility of changing it.

There was an excellent opportunity to correct the mischief in Tennessee when Mr. Heiskell came into office as reporter; and if the supreme court of that state had made an order, or the legislature had passed an act providing that the series of reports commencing with the present bench should be cited as the Tennessee State Reports, the evil would have been obviated so far as that state is concerned, and probably for all time. In many of the states, Connecticut, Alabama, Michigan and Iowa, for instance, after several volumes had been published entitled after the reporters, the style was changed so as to make the series "run in the name of the state." Nearly all the states have now adopted this plan, and there would seem to be no reason why Tennessee, Virginia, Kentucky, Delaware and the United States should not wheel into line.

Apropos of this subject, the writer would state that he has derived more benefit in the way of becoming familiar with the various reports and acquiring the habit of citing them correctly, from Mr. Bishop's First Book of the Law, than from any other book he has used. We must, however, protest against Mr. Bishop's manner of citing Mississippi as "Missis.," and Missouri as "Misso." The proper and becoming abbreviations of Mississippi is Miss., and that of Missouri is Mo.

AUSTIN, Minn., February 24, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A., B. and C were members of the common council of the village of A., and as such contracted with D. verbally to do a certain piece of work for the village. The village charter required that all contracts of that nature should be in writing, and that the minutes of the common council should show that such a contract was entered into. Now, in the absence of any written contract, and of any record of this proceeding, can A., B. and C. show by parol evidence that they contracted as public agents, in an action brought by D. against them as individuals? And are they liable individually? An early answer through the JOURNAL will oblige yours,

C. & F.

ANSWER.—In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, Sec. 176, note, will be found collected the cases on the subject of the rights and liabilities of public officers. As to records of such corporations, ib. Chap. XI. Mode of Contracting, Chap. XIV. By consulting the cases here referred to, the views of the courts on questions similar to the above will be seen, and the principles they recognize can be easily applied.

BOONVILLE, Ind., February 26, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—A. mortgages to B. a growing crop (tobacco) in August, to secure the payment on the first of the following March of certain indebtedness (note). The mortgage is an ordinary short form Indiana real estate mortgage, the proper changes being made, and is duly recorded. In January, A. loads his tobacco and starts to Kentucky to sell it.

Now is the mortgagee entitled to possession at any time after the mortgage is made? or must he wait until default in payment before he can maintain replevin? The mortgage is silent as to possession. G. & P.

ANSWER.—Assuming that the mortgage is silent as to possession, and that the local statutes contain no provision restricting the mortgagee's rights, he is entitled to possession and may maintain replevin before default in payment. See. 2 Hilliard on Mortgages, Ch. 38 and cases cited.

Book Notices.

DECISIONS OF THE COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE AND THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, UNDER THE MINING STATUTES OF JULY 20, 1866, JULY 9, 1870, AND MAY 10, 1872, WITH APPENDIX OF CIRCULAR AND FORMS. By HENRY N. COPP, General Land Office, Washington, D. C. San Francisco: A. L. Bancroft & Co. 1874 pp. 351.

The title accurately indicates the scope and purpose of this work. It seems to be prepared with care, and is undoubtedly a useful compilation to whomsoever desires to be acquainted with the provisions of the mining enactments of congress, and the official construction which they have received. The full Index and Table of Contents make the book easy of reference.

THE PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY: A Treatise on the System of Justice administered in Courts of Chancery. By GEO. TUCKER BISPHAM. Philadelphia: Kay & Bro., 1874. pp. 540.

This is an elementary work on Chancery Law. The plan is the same as Mr. Spence's treatise, but in the scope and general character it resembles Mr. Adams' excellent work. It is mainly devoted to a discussion of principles, and the occasional cases specially mentioned in the text are introduced by way of illustration. Our examination satisfies us that, all things considered, it is probably the best book to be first placed in the hands of American students of equity law. It should precede, in a course of reading, the more elaborate works of Story, Spence and Daniell. It has its value also to practitioners in the great attention which the author has bestowed upon the recent equity decisions of the house of lords and chancery courts of Great Britain. This is a marked feature of the work, and gives it an especial value, as many of these decisions are of general and great importance, and have not yet found their way into the text books in common use.

United States Supreme Court — Decisions Last Week.

[Compiled from the New York Herald.]

Presumptive Proof of Guilt—Burden of Proof. — In the case of Chaffee v. The United States, brought to recover the penalty prescribed by the forty-eighth section of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, against the plaintiffs in error for having in their possession certain distilled spirits for the purpose of sale with design of avoiding the duties imposed thereon. This court reverses the judgment of conviction on various grounds of evidence and for the following error in the instructions to the jury: The court, in substance, instructed the jury that in this class of cases the government need only prove the defendants were presumptively guilty, and the duty thereupon devolved upon them to establish their innocence, and if they did not they were guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. On this point it is held the error is palpable. All the authorities condemn it. It sets at nought established principles and justifies the criticism of counsel that it substantially withdrew from the defendants their right of trial by jury, and converted what at law was intended for their protection—the right to refuse to testify—into the machinery for their sure destruction. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Lien of National Bank upon Shares of Stockholders.—In the case of Bullard, trustee, v. The National Eagle Bank of Boston, the court held that a national bank organized under the act of 1864 cannot acquire a valid lien upon the shares of its shareholders by virtue of the articles of association or by-laws. This re-affirms the decision in The Bank v. Lanier (11 Wall. 369). Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD dissented.

Digitized by Google

Railway Aid Bonds—Defences—Absorption of Aided Road by Another.—No. 620. Nugent v. Board of Supervisors of Putnam County Ill. Error to the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois. In this case the county issued bonds in aid of the construction of the Kankakee & Illinois River Railroad Company, but before they were delivered that road was consolidated with another. Meanwhile, Nugent purchased some of the bonds in the market for value, and payment being refused, this action was brought to recover upon them. The court below held that the bonds were invalid, because before their delivery the road to which they were issued had ceased to be a distinctive corporation. That judgment is here reversed, the court holding that the plaintiff being a bona fide holder, should recover. In purchasing in the market he was not bound to enquire further than to ascertain if the bonds were authorized by law, and if their issue had been approved by popular vote, nor did it make any difference that the road had been consolidated. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion. Dissenting, Justices DAVIS and MILLER.

Savings Banks—Taxation of Contingent Fund.—No. 203. The Dollar Savings Bank v. The United States. Error to the circuit court for the western district of Pennsylvania. The question in this case was. whether the contingent fund authorized by the charter of the bank to be retained from the accumulated earnings to the extent of ten per centum of its deposits, for the security of its depositors, is liable to the five per cent. tax imposed by chapter 182, section 9, of the act of 1866. The court sustains the decision below that it is, and the judgment is affirmed. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice BRADLEY dissented, holding that an action will not lie for a tax of this kind unless it be first entered on an assessment roll.

Land Law—Controversy upon Fact.—No. 188. Carpenter, et al v. Bonnels. Error to the supreme court of Missouri. This is the affirmance of title to 200 arpens of land in the county of St. Louis, being formerly of the district of New Madrid under the French. The questions were of fact only, and drawn from documentary evidence. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Bankruptcy—Set-off.—No. 478. Rollo, assignee in bankruptcy. Appeal from the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois. This was an affirmance of a decree below, refusing to allow Gray to set off an indebtedness due from him to the assignee against an equal amount of indebtedness due from the assignee to the firm of Gray Brothers, of which he was a partner. Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion.

Municipal Bonds—Mode of enforcing Payment after Judgment—No Relief in Equity.—No. 219. Reese v. City of Watertwon. Appeal from the circuit court for the western district of Wisconsin. This was an action on municipal bonds issued by the city of Watertwon. There was no dispute about the validity of the bonds, and judgment was for Reese. Afterwards he sought to compel payment by mandamus to enforce a levy for that purpose; but a quorum of the board of aldermen resigned, and several subsequent writs were defeated by the evasive conduct of the corporation officials. This suit was then commenced to subject the taxable property of the city to the payment of the bonds. The court below dismissed the bill, taking the view that its prayer could not be enforced in equity. That decree is here affirmed, the court holding that where the remedy at law is adequate and complete, as in this case, the fact that its execution is frustrated by fraud, violence crime, does not entitle the party to the extraordinary aid of a court of chancery. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion. Justices CLIFFORD and SWAYNE dissented, asserting that a court of equity will not suffer a trust to be defeated on account of the refusal of the trustee to administer the fund, and because the effect of the decree of the court below, if affirmed here, will be to give judicial sanction to a fraudulent repudiation of an honest debt. [See editorial on another page.]

Removal of Suits from State Court—Mandamus.—Ex parte State Insurance Company of Missouri. Motion for a mandamus, to compel the circuit court to try the cause of removal thereto, denied. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court, where there is one Resident Party.—No. 451. Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Company and the Singer Manufacturing Company v. Florence Sewing Machine Company. Error to the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts. This was an action by the Florence Company, a Massachusetts corporation, against the other companies to recover back certain moneys alleged to be due from them by reason of over-payments made by the Florence Company as patent rent, under an agreement providing for a reduction in the rent in case of the granting by the other companies of any additional licenses. The suit being brought in the supreme judicial court of the state, motion was made to remove it to the circuit court of the United States. The Grover & Baker Company was a Massachusetts corporation also, but the other two were foreign corporations—one of Connecticut and the other of New York. The court below held that where one of the defendant corporations was of the same state with the plaintiff where the suit was brought, removal was not authorized, and the trial proceeded and resulted in favor of the Florence Company. The question presented here was whether the court was right in this decision of the question of removal. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court at considerable length, affirming the judgment below. At the conclusion it is said: "Either the non-resident plaintiff or non-resident defendant may remove the cause under the act for that purpose, provided that all the plaintiffs or all the defendants join in the petition, and all the parties petitioning are non-resident, as required under the judiciary act; but it is a great mistake to suppose that any such right is conferred by that act, when one or more of the plaintiffs, or one or more of the petitioning defendants, are citizens of the state in which the suit is pending, as the act is destitute of any language which can be properly construed to confer any such right, unless all the plaintiffs or all the defendants are non resident and join in the petition." Dissenting, Justices MILLER and BRADLEY.

Railway Aid Bonds—Bona Fide Holders—Defences.—No. 207. Town of Queensbury v. Culver. Error to the circuit court for the northern district of New York. This was an action on interest warrants attached to bonds issued by the town in aid of the construction of a railroad from the village of Glenn's Falls to intersect the Saratoga and Whitehall Railroad. The bonds were purchased by the defendant in error, without notice of any defence. On the trial the unconstitutionality of the law authorizing the subscription and various irregularities were urged as rendering the bonds invalid, but the judgment was for the complainant and is here affirmed on the authority of the numerous decisions by this court in similar cases. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Legal News and Notes.

—JUDGE DRUMMOND of the United States circuit court decided, on Friday last, in Milwaukee, in the case of Flanders, assignee, v. Brigham and others, that it was the right of a bankruptcy court to have possession and control of the property of the bankrupt for the purpose of paying debts, and that the fact that there was a suit in a state court, and that the property of the parties was in the hands of a receiver, did not prevent the filing of a petition either by or against them.

—The trial of the Tichborne claimant on charges of perjury committed during the trial for the possession of the estate, which has been in progress upwards of 180 days, was brought to a close on the 28th ult., and resulted in the conviction of the accused. The jury, after being out a short time, brought in a verdict of guilty of the charges, and the claimant was sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude. There was great excitement over the verdict. The newspapers issued extras, and several foolish people lost their lives in firing cannon in honor of the result. The press and popular sentimeut seem divided as to the propriety of the verdict. It is said that Dr. Kenealy will move for a new trial, and, if this is denied, make application to the house of lords on behalf of his client. Some of the democratic journals deplore the verdict, and denounce the chief justice for unfairness in the conduct of the trial.

—EDWIN LYLE has recovered a judgment of $10,000 in the supreme court of Cleveland, Ohio, against the Cuyahoga lodge of Odd Fellows of that city, for posting him as a swindler in some of the Cleveland papers, and publishing him as such in a circular to other lodges. The defendants offered in mitigation, to prove the truth of the charges against Lyle, but the court ruled that their truth or falsity did not affect the merits of the case. The lodge, unlike a newspaper, was not in the business of publishing news, and the jury must judge of their motives from an entirely different standpoint. It was also urged for the defense that the lodge was simply a benevolent organization, without stockholders, and consequently not liable; but the court decided that its charter by the state gave it a responsible existence.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. }
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1874.

{SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance.

The Law of Religious Societies and Church Corporations.

The February number, 1874, of the American Law Register, has the third chapter on the above subject from the pen of the Hon. Wm. Laurence, of Bellefontaine, Ohio. The learned author is exhausting the subject, and his notes display an amount of research and careful discriminating labor which are seldom witnessed in articles contributed to the press. We trust the series will, when completed, be collected and published in book form.

Conclusiveness of Judgments of Sister States.

The unsatisfactory state of the authorities on the question as to the conclusiveness of the records of judgment in other states is well known. The act of congress passed under the authority conferred by the constitution, art. 4, sec. 1, declares that records and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law and usage in the courts of the state from whence said records are taken. The subject was before the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Knowles v. The Logansport Gaslight Company, decided on the 4th instant. An action was brought in the United States circuit court for Minnesota, on a judgment rendered by a court of record of Indiana. The record of that judgment recited that the defendant "had been duly served with process to appear," and the record of the cause contained a summons, with the return of the sheriff thereon endorsed, showing a personal service of the writ on the defendant. On the trial the defendant was offered as a witness to prove that he had not been personally served with process.

The Supreme Court, applying the principle of Thompson v. Whitney, decided by it at the same term, hold that the proposed evidence was admissible, although according to the opinion of the courts in Indiana, such a judgment would seem to be conclusive between the parties in that state. ——— v. Pratt, 23 Indiana, 628; Wescott v. Brown, 13 Indiana, 83; Bigelow on Estoppel, 237.

Is a Person Responsible to the Municipal Tribunals of one Country for Acts committed while acting as the Executive head of another Government?

BUENAVENTURA BAEZ, ex-president of the republic of Santo Domingo, was recently arrested in a civil action brought in the supreme court at Brooklyn, New York, by one Davis Hatch, and held to bail in the sum of $25,000. The substance of the complaint was, that the defendant, while acting as president of Santo Domingo, illegally arrested and imprisoned the plaintiff, and confiscated his property. On the 4th instant the case was heard before Judge PRATT, on a motion to vacate the order of arrest. Mr. Choate, for the defence, said that so far as the question here involved was concerned it was immaterial whether the acts of Baez were a stretch of power or not. He contended that in a case like this it was not legal to come into a municipal court like the present to get grievances redressed. Resort must be had to higher and diplomatic channels. He argued that for what was done by the head of another government by virtue of his official power he could not be called to account, even after he had ceased to be the head of the government, by the municipal courts of another country; that it all laid within the domain of the law of nations exclusively, and that if this plaintiff had suffered wrong thereby he had either one of two means of redress. First, if, as he said, there was an extension of the power of the president, a going beyond the constitutional limits of the president, he (plaintiff) could apply to that government which the president had offended—that was the Dominican Republic. Second, if a citizen of the United States, as he claimed to be, he had his remedy, as all other citizens had, through the intervention of his own government.

Mr. Maxwell, for the plaintiff, argued that the defendant was sued as a private person, as the so-called president of a so-called republic, and he claimed to be able to show that he was president over no existing nation. He was responsible to this court as a private individual.

Judge PRATT took the papers, and the next day issued an order vacating the order of arrest, with costs.

Another suit has been commenced against Baez, the plaintiff being Mr. Julius M. Columbani, of New York. His counsel applied to Judge PRATT for an order of arrest against the defendant. The application was based on a lengthy affidavit, setting forth that in 1870 the plaintiff was imprisoned by Baez illegally, and that his health, commercial credit and reputation were greatly impaired thereby. He claims damages in the sum of $200,000. The application was denied. It will probably be renewed before some other supreme court judge in New York or Brooklyn.

Bankruptcy—Illegal Preference—Possession of the State Courts.

The ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 40, was applied and followed in Appleton v. Bowles et al., 6 Daily Register, No. 49, determined in the supreme court of New York, first department in general term.

The proceeding was commenced by attachment in the state court, and after a receiver had been appointed and had taken possession of the property attached, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the defendants in the federal court for Massachusetts. Thereupon the receiver applied to the state court for an order directing him to deliver the assets in his hands to the assignee in bankruptcy, but the court instructed him to hold them until further order. The attorney for the plaintiff afterwards made a similar motion, which was denied. Meanwhile another creditor, Alvah Miller, having obtained a judgment against the defendant Bowles, applied to have it satisfied out of the assets in the hands of the receiver, which was done.

Appeals were severally taken from these orders to general term, and they were severally affirmed. DONOHUE, J., delivering the judgment of the court (with whom DAVIS, P. J., and DANIELS, J., concurred), said: "The first ground of the appeal would seem to be that the bankrupt court, having taken possession of the estate under proceedings, takes from this court all further authority in the matter, and that all the assets must be handed over to such assignee, no matter what may be the question litigated here. This is a mistake. This court and its receiver first obtained the possession of the property and the control of the litigation, and has the right to finish its proceedings before being interfered with by any other jurisdiction. (Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583, and cases there cited.) If the assignee has rights, or is entitled to the fund, his title and right can be, and will be, disposed of by this court as the law shall direct.

Digitized by Google

"The next ground on which the appeal is pressed is, that the levy on the attachment is void under the bankrupt act, and that this court will not give to the petitioner, Miller, a preference prohibited by that act. If the case presented facts showing such prohibited preference, this court would be bound to protect the assignee against it. Whatever may have been the opinion or course of decisions heretofore on that point, we suppose the case Wilson v. The City Bank of St. Paul, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States at its present term, is decisive on the question. In the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice MILLER, in which he thoroughly examines the point, he holds that liens by attachment or execution, obtained prior to the proceedings in bankruptcy in state courts, are valid, and take preference to the claims of the assignee, unless an intent to evade the bankrupt act is shown, and that the fact of taking steps to obtain satisfaction by the ordinary course of law, with a knowledge on the part of the creditor that the debtor is insolvent, is not evidence of such improper intent, and that in the absence of any further facts, the party who obtains such preference can hold it. As on this point the opinion is conclusive on this court, it follows that the preference obtained by Miller was valid, and the order directing payment to him out of the fund obtained from the property he attached, must be affirmed."

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court.

The judiciary act limited the right to remove a cause from the state to the federal court to the non-resident defendant when sued by a resident plaintiff (sec. 12); and if there were several real defendants all must be non-resident to entitle any of them to a removal. In other words, if the cause was not removable as to all of the defendants, it was not removable as to any. But by the act of July 27, 1866, the non-resident defendant, in a case where he is joined with a resident defendant, may have the cause removed as to himself, where there can be a final determination of the controversy without the presence of the resident co-defendant. This leaves the cause to proceed in the state court as between the resident plaintiff and the resident defendant, and to proceed in the federal court as between the plaintiff and the non-resident defendant. This is the first and only statute which in any event authorizes a portion of the defendants to remove a cause from the state to a federal court.

On the 2d of March, 1867, an act was passed professing to be an amendment of the act of July 27, 1866, which gives the right of removal to the non-resident party, plaintiff or defendant, at any time before final hearing or trial, on the ground of prejudice or local influence. This is the first act that in any event extended the right of removal to a plaintiff who had elected to bring his suit in a state court. Johnson v. Monell, Woolw. 390. The effect of the act of 1867 upon that of 1866, and the relation of the two acts to each other, have occasioned no little difficulty of construction. One important point under the act of 1867 has recently been set at rest by the decision of the supreme court (March 5th) in the case of the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Company, and the Singer Manufacturing Company v. Florence Sewing Machine Company, in error to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

The action was brought by the Florence company, a Massachusetts corporation, against the other companies, to recover back certain moneys alleged to be due from them by reason of over-payments made by the Florence company as patent rent, under an agreement providing for a reduction in the rent in case of the granting by the other companies of any additional licenses. The suit being brought in the supreme judicial court of the state, motion was made to remove it to the circuit court of the United States. The Grover & Baker company was a Massachusetts corporation also, but the other two were foreign corporations—one of Connecticut and the other of New York. The court below held that where one of the defendant corporations was of the same state with the plaintiff, where the suit was brought, removal was not authorized, and the trial proceeded and resulted in favor of the Florence company. The question before the United States Supreme Court was whether the state court ruled the question of removal correctly, and its view was sustained. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Either the non-resident plaintiff or non-resident defendant may remove the cause under the act for that purpose, provided that all the plaintiffs or all the defendants join in the petition, and all the parties petitioning are non-residents as required under the judiciary act; but it is a great mistake to suppose that any such right is conferred by that act when one or more of the plaintiffs, or one or more of the petitioning defendants, are citizens of the state in which the suit is pending, as the act is destitute of any language which can be properly construed to confer any such right, unless all the plaintiffs or all the defendants are non-resident and join in the petition." MILLER and BRADLEY, JJ., dissented.

This seems to support one point ruled in Allen v. Ryerson, 2 Dillon, C. C. R. 501, that where a case for the removal of a cause is made under the act of July 27, 1866, the petitioner therefor is not obliged to make an affidavit such as is required by the act of March 2, 1867.

Railway Consolidation—Effect on Municipal Bonds—Decision of United States Supreme Court in Putnam County v. Nugent.

A new and important point has recently been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Putnam County v. Nugent, touching municipal liability on railroad-aid bonds. The case went from the northern district of Illinois, and the judgment of the circuit court in favor of the county was reversed. The opinion of Judge BLODGETT is reported in full in 5 Chicago Legal News (August 23, 1873), p. 533. The material facts were these: In June, 1869, an Illinois corporation existed, known as the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company, and counties along its line were authorized to subscribe for its stock and issue bonds therefor, provided the project was sanctioned by a vote of the people. In July, 1869, and again in February, 1870, the people of Putnam county voted to subscribe for stock in the above named railroad corporation, but no subscription to that company was in fact ever made. On and before the 21st day of October, 1870, there existed in Indiana a corporation known as the Plymouth, Kankakee and Pacific Railroad Company, with power to construct a road from the easterly line of Illinois to Plymouth, Indiana. On the 21st day of October, 1870, the corporate rights, stock, powers and franchises of the two corporations above named were consolidated, and the consolidated company became known as the Plymouth, Kankakee and Pacific Railroad Company, with a largely increased capital. It was printed in the articles of consolidation that the stockholders of the original companies should be stockholders in the consolidated company.

Digitized by Google

After the consolidation, and without any new election, the bonds previously voted were issued by the county of Putnam (whose officers assented to the consolidation) and delivered to the consolidated company. The bonds thus delivered were, however, made payable, not to the consolidated company, but to the company in existence when the vote was taken and in whose favor the vote was had. Accordingly the bonds recited that they were "issued for the subscription to the stock of the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company, in pursuance of a resolution of the board of supervisors of said county." The plaintiff was a holder for value. The Kankakee and Illinois River Company had power by its charter to consolidate with another company; and the articles of consolidation were on file in the proper office. Following the principle of Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, the court below held that the corporate existence of the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company ceased when the consolidation was effected, and that its franchises became merged in the consolidated company, which was a corporation with a more extended line of road, with larger capital stock, with a different directory, and under the control of the legislature of two states instead of one, and therefore the authority to issue bonds which had been voted, ceased absolutely on the legal demise of that company. Assuming this to be true, the court below held that the doctrine of the well known case of Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, applied to and controlled that case. The Fulton county case asserted the principle where a popular vote was necessary, and the vote was to one corporation, and the bonds under that vote were made and delivered to another corporation into which the original corporation had been changed by legislative act subsequent to the vote, that even a bona fide holder of bonds thus issued could not recover. We have not yet seen the text of the opinion of the supreme court in the Putnam county case, but inasmuch as there was legislative authority to the county to subscribe to the stock of the railroad company to which the bonds of the county were made payable, and they were issued by the officers of the county after after a popular vote had in fact been had, the court probably considered the case to fall within the principle so often declared as the law of this class of securities, viz: "that when a corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and they are no more liable to be impeached in the hands of such a holder than any other commercial paper." Per CLIFFORD, J., in Lexington v. Butler; 14 Wall. 282.

The judgment in the Putnam county case is one which possesses great interest in Missouri, where many bonds voted to companies before consolidation have been issued without a new vote to the consolidated company; but some of these cases differ from the Putnam county case in the circumstance that the bonds were issued to the consolidated company instead of the original company, and the history of the transaction was displayed on the face of the bonds by way of recital. How important this difference is, remains to be judicially determined. We shall publish the Putnam county decision at an early day. MILLER and DAVIS were the only judges who dissented, from which it would appear that FIELD, J., who delivered the opinion in the Fulton county case, considered the two cases to be distinguishable.

Can a Married Woman living apart from her Husband be adjudged a Bankrupt?

IN RE JULIA LYONS.

District Court of the United States, District of California, January 29. 1874.

Before Hon. OGDEN HOFFMAN, District Judge.

1. Bankruptcy—Married Women.—In a state whose statute law makes a married woman living apart from her husband liable to be sued in all actions as f sole, she may be proceeded against under the bankrupt law.

W. H. Fifield, for petitioning creditors; Whiting and Naphaly, for respondent.

HOFFMAN, J.—The question raised by the demurrer in this case, is whether the respondent, being a married woman, is liable on a contract to pay rent, and, if she has committed an act of bankruptcy, can be adjudged bankrupt. It appears that the husband of the respondent has long since renounced and abandoned all his marital rights and duties. For twelve years Mrs. Lyons has lived separate and apart from him, supporting herself and her minor children by her own exertions. In the course of her business as keeper of a lodging-house, she has contracted an indebtedness for rent, and being so indebted, and in contemplation of bankruptcy and insolvency, has made, as is alleged, an assignment of her property in fraud of the bankrupt act.

It is urged by the respondent's counsel that the contract of a married woman for the payment of money is void, and that the petitioning creditor has no debt which the court can recognize. On this point numerous authorities are cited; but as they, for the most part, are decisions under the act of April 17, 1850, and the amended act of May 12, 1862, no examination of them is necessary. The decision of the question before us turns upon the force and effect to be given to the act of March 9, 1870. (Laws of 1870, p. 226.)

The first three sections of that act are as follows: Section 1. "The earnings of the wife shall not be liable for the debts of the husband." Section 2. "The earnings and accumulations of the wife and her minor children living with her, or being in her custody, while the wife is living separate and apart from her husband, shall be the separate property of the wife." Sec. 3. "The wife, while living separate and apart from her husband, shall have the sole and exclusive control of her separate property, and may sue and be sued without joining her husband, and may avail herself of, and be subject to, all legal process in all actions, including actions concerning her real estate." The fourth section prescribes the mode in which she may convey her real estate.

Digitized by Google

The object of these enactments is apparent. It was to secure to the wife, when abandoned by her husband, the fruits of her own industry, and to enable her to support herself and her children out of her earnings and accumulations, free from his interference or molestation. For this purpose her earnings and accumulations, which at common law belonged to her husband, are declared her separate property, and her rights in respect of such property are carefully defined. She is to have the sole and exclusive control of it; she may separately sue or be sued, and may avail herself of and be subject to all legal process in all actions. That the principal intention of the legislature was to protect deserted wives in their just rights, and not to impose upon them additional liabilities, is admitted. For this purpose they were placed in the position of quasi femes sole, and were granted all the powers necessary to enable them to earn their own livelihood, and to retain and enjoy the fruits of their industry. But to accomplish this object, it was evidently necessary to create new liabilities as well as to confer new rights. The ability to sue for moneys earned by or due to her was clearly indispensable to enable the wife to attain the object contemplated by the law.

Justice and reason, and even her own interests, demanded that she should herself be liable for all debts contracted by her. For without such liability how could she obtain the credits usually necessary in the conduct of any business; and what could be said of the morality of a law which should announce to a woman that for all debts and demands due her she shall have the right to sue and enforce payment, but as to debts due by her she may plead her coverture as a conclusive bar to the action?

The separate property of a married woman has, on general principles of equity, been held liable for debts contracted in respect to it or in and about its management and improvement. The act of 1870 created a new species of separate property in the earnings and accumulations of the wife while separated from her husband.

The equitable principles already adopted by the courts, and usually enforced by statute, required this new species of separate property should be liable for debts incurred in its creation or management, and in the course of the business, the proceeds of which the statute enables the wife exclusively to enjoy. Further discussion, however, is needless, as the language of the act is too explicit to be mistaken. It enacts that the wife separated from the husband "may sue and be sued, and that she shall be subject to all legal process in all actions." This language is obviously inconsistent with any exemption from liability to suit for a just debt on the pretext that, being a married woman, her contracts for the payment of money are void.

The respondent being thus found to have incurred a valid indebtedness and a liability to be sued therefor as if a feme sole, she may, if she has committed an act of bankruptcy, be adjudged a bankrupt. Hilliard on Bankruptcy, p. 49; Avery and Hobbs on Bankruptcy, pp. 33-4; in re Kinkead, 7 N. B. R., p. 439.

The demurrer is overruled and the respondent allowed ten days to answer the petition.—Pacific Law Reporter.

NOTE.—Whether a married woman may be proceeded against under the bankrupt act, would seem to depend, in each particular case, upon her power of making contracts, or of engaging in trade or other business independently of her husband. The general rule of the common law is that a married woman possesses no such power; but that if she enters into contracts or engages in trade or other business with her husband's consent or ratification, she acts simply as his agent; and hence that the fruits of such contracts, or the accumulations of such trade or business, belong to him and not to her. Bish. Mar. Wom., § 733; Switzer v. Valentine, 4 Duer, 96; Jenkins v. Flinn, 37 Ind. 349. Wherever this rule of the common law obtains in full force, it is clear that she cannot be adjudged a bankrupt. In re Goodman, 8 N. B. R. 380.

But this rule admits of exceptions, and these may be arranged into two classes: 1. Exceptions created by local custom or by local law. 2. Exceptions growing out of a temporary cessation of the coverture.

Under the first of these exceptions is the case of frequent occurrence in the English books, where a married woman acts as a sole trader according to the custom of London. Ex parte Carrington, 1 Atk. 206; Lavie v. Philips, 3 Burr. 1776; s. c. 1 W. Black. Rep. 570. See also in Pennsylvania, Burke v. Winkle, 2 Sergt. & Rawle, 189; in South Carolina, Newbiggin v. Pillans, 2 Bay, 162; in Louisiana, Christensen v. Stumpf, 16 La. An. 50; Spalding v Godard, 15 La. An. 277; Bowles v Turner, 352 ib.; in California, Melcher v. Cuhland, 22 Cal. 522; Abrams v. Howard, 23 Cal. 388. Under the same head would fall those cases like re Lyons, supra, where by statute in particular states, a married woman may, under certain circumstances, contract liabilities, carry on business and sue and be sued independently of her husband, and as a feme sole. In these cases there would seem to be no doubt that she is amenable to the bankrupt law. As in New York: In re O'Brien, N. B. R. Sup. 38; Graham v. Starks, 3 N. B. R. 92. Or in Illinois: In re Kinkead, 7 N. B. R. 439. Thus it was held, in the last case in the United States district court at Chicago, by BLODGETT, J., that where a husband and wife carried on a business in partnership, their status was such, under the statutes of Illinois relating to married women, that the firm might be proceeded against in bankruptcy; and hence that the partnership creditors were entitled to a preference in the distribution of the assets, over a creditor of the husband, whose demand had accrued prior to the organization of the firm. And it was intimated that the wife would be separately adjudicated a bankrupt if it should be found necessary in the course of the proceeding to do so, in order to reach any individual property she might have. In the case of Re Rachel Goodman, 8 N. B. R. 380, determined in the United States district court for Indiana, before GRISHAM, J., the principle above stated is fully recognized; but when applied with reference to the statutes of Indiana relating to married women, as interpreted by the supreme court of that state, the case resulted in a dismissal of the petition. It was found under the Indiana statutes, as expounded by the state supreme court, (1), that a married woman cannot engage in any kind of trade or business on her own account unless she have separate property; (2) that if a married woman, not having separate property or means of her own, engage in and carry on business, the profits, if any there be, belong to the husband as the earnings of the wife; and (3), that a married woman in Indiana, possessed of no separate estate, is relieved of none of the disabilities imposed upon her by the common law. The petition failed to show that Mrs. Goodman was possessed of any separate property or means with which she was carrying on her business, and it was held to follow that she could not be adjudged a bankrupt. So in the case of Re Slichter, 2 N. B. R. 107. in Minnesota, where the statute allows a married woman, under certain circumstances, to engage in trade in her own name, upon obtaining a license from a probate justice, in which case the business and profits become her separate property, and she is bound by her contracts as a feme sole, NELSON, district judge, held that a married woman who had been engaged in business as a member of a partnership firm, but without complying with the statute, could avail herself of the plea of coverture to defeat the bankruptcy proceedings against her.

Under the second head, which embraces the question whether a married woman may be adjudged a bankrupt where the marriage relation has been temporarily interrupted, the books furnish many instructive decisions defining the circumstances under which, independently of local custom or statute, a married woman may be separately sued. These decisions embrace cases where a married womam lives apart from her husband on a separate maintenance; in which case it has been held and afterwards denied, in England, that the wife may be sued at law as a feme sole. Corbet v. Poelnitz, 1 Term R. 5. Contra, Compton v. Collinson 1 H. Blacks. 350; Clayton v. Adams, 6 Term R. 604; Marshall v. Ratton, 8 Term R. 545. And Chancellor KENT states (2 Com. 161) that the rule of Corbet v. Poelnitz has never been adopted in this country. It has also been held in England that a wife may be sued at law whose husband is an absent alien enemy, and is under an absolute disability of returning. Derry v. Duchess of Mazarine, 1 Ld. Raym. 147. Or where he had been transported. Sparrow v. Caruthers, 2 W. Black. 1197. Or had been banished or had abjured the realm. Lady Belknap & Wayland, 1 Co. Lit. 132 b, 133 a. So it has been held in Massachusetts that a married woman who had been divorced a mensa et thoro might sue and be sued as a feme sole in respect of property acquired or debts contracted by her subsequently to the divorce. Dean v Richmond, 5 Pick. 461; Pierce v. Burnham, 4 Metcf. 303. And it has been held in the same state that a feme covert, whose husband had deserted her in a foreign country, and who had thereafter maintained herself as a single woman, and for five years had lived in that commonwealth, the husband being a foreigner and having never been within the United States, was competent to sue and be sued as a feme sole. Gregory v. Paul, 15 Mass. 31. And the question is now said to be settled in Massachusetts, as a necessary exception to the rule of the common law, placing a married woman under a disability to contract or maintain a suit, that where the husband was never within the commonwealth, or has gone beyond its jurisdiction, has wholly renounced his marital rights and duties, and deserted his wife, she may make and take contracts, and sue and be sued in her own name as a feme sole. "It is," said SHAW, Ch. J., "an application of an old rule of the common law, which took away the disability of coverture where the husband was exiled or had abjured the realm." Gregory v. Pierce, 4 Metcf. 478. And within the meaning of this principle, the residence of the husband within another of the United States is held to be equivalent to his residence in a foreign state. Abbot v. Bayley, 6 Peck, 89. "But," said SHAW, Ch. J., in Gregory v. Pierce, supra, "to accomplish this change in the civil relations of the wife, the desertion by the husband must be absolute and complete; it must be a voluntary separation from and abandonment of the wife, embracing both the fact and intent of the husband to renounce de facto, as far as he can do it, the marital relation, and leave his wife to act as a feme sole. Such is the renunciation, coupled with a continued absence in a foreign state or country, which is held to operate like an abjuration of the realm." In Love v. Moynehan, 16 Ill. 277, 282, the supreme court of Illinois, after reviewing many modern cases, hold the law to be "that where the husband compels the wife to live separate from him, either by abandoning her, or by forcing her, by whatever means, to leave him, and such separation is not merely temporary and capricious, but permanent and without expectation of again living together, and the wife is unprovided for by the husband in such manner as is suited to their circumstances and condition in life, she may acquire property, control her person and acquisitions, and contract, sue and be sued in relation to them, as a feme sole, during the continuance of such condition."

Digitized by Google

So it has been held in a recent case in Georgia, that, on general principles, a married woman whose husband has deserted her and resided in another state, has the right to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued, as if sole. Clark v. Valentino, 41 Ga. 143. See also as supporting the same view, the following cases: Rhea v. Rhermer, 1 Peters, 105; Cornwall v. Hoyt, 7 Conn. 427; Arthur v. Broadnax, 3 Ala. 557; Jones v. Stewart, 9 Ala. 855; Roland v. Logan, 18 Ala. 307; Rose v. Bates, 12 Mo. 47; Starrett v. Wynn, 17 Serg. & Rawle, 130; Bean v. Morgan, 4 McCord, 148; Valentine v. Ford, 2 P. A. Brown, 193.

It would seem to follow, by reasonable analogy, that where a married woman is, for any such reason, liable to be sued as if sole, at least in an action at law, she may, if otherwise amenable to the provisions of the bankrupt act, be proceeded against thereunder. Accordingly it was held in England in ex parte Franks, 7 Bing. 762, that the wife of a convict sentenced to transportation was liable to be made a bankrupt, she having become a trader, although her husband had not been sent out of England. The sentence of transportation against her husband rendered her liable to suit generally; and the fact that she had become a trader brought her within the provisions of the English bankrupt law.

Life Insurance—Right of Insured to notice of Premiums Falling Due—Duty of Company to furnish Agent with Receipts.

SARAH L. MOREY v. NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi, November Term, 1873.

Before Hon. ROBERT A. HILL, District Judge.

1. Life Insurance—Representations of Agent that Notice of Accrual of Premiums will be Given.—Where the local agent of a life insurance company, on receiving payment of the first premium due on a policy, represented to the assured that the company was in the habit of giving thirty days' notice to its policy-holders of the time when each premium falls due, and promised that he would give such notice, and the assured died two days after the second premium fell due, no such notice having been given to him, and the proof failed to show that the agent had any authority to make such an agreement, it was held that the beneficiary could not recover on the policy.

2. ——. Payment of Premium to Local Agent—Failure of Company to forward Receipt to Local Agent.—Where the company's receipt for the premium was not received by the local agent to whom it was to be paid, until two days after the death of the insured, it was held, under the circumstances above stated, that the beneficiary could not recover on the policy; otherwise if the premium had been tendered before it fell due.

3. ——. ——. ——. Where by express agreement, or by the course of business between the parties, it is understood that payment will be made to the local agent, and no notice has been given in sufficient time that payment shall be made at the office and principal place of business stipulated in the contract, a tender of payment to the local agent, whether received by him or not, will excuse the policy-holder and prevent a forfeiture.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

HILL, J.—This action at law was brought in the circuit court of Madison county, and removed into this court, to recover the amount of a policy of insurance issued by the defendant on the first day of April, 1871, for the sum of five thousand dollars, payable to plaintiff upon the death of her late husband, John B. Morey, upon the payment of $197.90, then made, and the same amount to be paid thereafter on the first day of April of each year during the continuance of said policy, with the usual condition annexed, that if said premium should not be paid on or before the first day of April of each year, the policy should become void, and all payments theretofore made become forfeited to defendant.

The plea is that the policy became void under this stipulation by reason of the non-payment of the premium due on the first day of April, 1872; to which the plaintiff replies: First, that when said John B. Morey made application for said policy it was to one Morey, a local agent of defendant, doing business for defendant in the city of Canton; that at the time he stated to said agent that he feared he would forget the time when the premiums would become payable and fail to make them in proper time, and thereby the policy would become forfeited; that the said agent stated, as an inducement to said John B. to take said policy, that the company was in the habit of giving thirty days' previous notice of the time, and that he would give the notice and save the forfeiture; and, secondly, that it was understood that payment would be made to the local agent in Canton; that, at the time the premium fell due, the agent at Canton had not been furnished with the printed premium fell due the agent at Canton had not been furnished with the printed premium receipts, without which he was not authorized to receive payment; that the failure to give the notice and to furnish the receipt was a waiver of the right to a forfeiture of the policy.

A jury being waived, the questions of both law and fact are submitted to the court.

The only facts shown by the proof, and necessary to be stated for the application of the rules of law, are as follows:

Morey, the agent of the defendant, did make the statements to John B. Morey, at the time the application for the policy was made, as stated in the pleadings; the advance premium was paid on the delivery of the policy; no notice of the time the premium fell due was given; John B. Morey died on the 3d day of April, two days after the premium fell due, without having paid or tendered the same to any one. On the 5th, payment of the premium was tendered to the agent at Canton, and refused, for the reason that John B. Morey had died on the 3d.

That the premium receipt was not forwarded to the general agents at Vicksburg until the 4th, and not forwarded to the local agent until the next day.

The question upon the pleadings and proof is, did the want of notice of the time of payment, and the absence of the receipt in the hands of the local agent, excuse the payment of the premium upon the day it became due, and thereby avoid the forfeiture stipulated in the contract?

The policy, and the conditions annexed to it, constituted the contract, and must be held binding on both parties to it, unless its conditions have been waived by some act or omission of the party against whom it is sought to be enforced, or by the authorized agent of such party.

The proof fails to show that the agent, Morey, had any authority to engage that notice should be given; indeed, none such is claimed; but it is claimed that, being the agent, it was a fraud in him to make such a promise, as it misled the assured, and induced him to take the policy, which he would not otherwise have done but it is apparent from the proof that he did not make the promise as agent, or pretend to bind the defendant, but only made it as a friend and relative of John B. Morey; it was a mere personal promise, for the fulfillment of which he could only look to him who made it; Morey, the agent for this purpose, was more the agent for the assured than the insurer; so that upon the facts, this want of notice cannot avail the plaintiff.

Digitized by Google

The remaining question is, did the failure to place in the hands of the agent at Canton the premium receipt on or before the time of payment, waive and excuse payment on that day? The conditions of the policy require payment at defendant's office in the city of New York, unless a different place is stipulated for in writing between the parties, or to an agent having for delivery a printed receipt, signed by the president of the company, or other officer mentioned.

The advance payment was made to the local agent in Canton upon the delivery of the policy. The fact that the premium receipt for the second payment was forwarded to the local agent in Canton shows that that was the place where payment was expected to be made, and where it doubtless would have been made but for the death of said John B. Such evidently being the understanding between the parties, I am satisfied that had the tender of the amount due been made to the local agent at Canton on the day and within the time stipulated, the forfeiture claim could not have been maintained; but, unfortunately for the plaintiff, this was not done. I cannot accept the position as correct that nothing can avoid the forfeiture but an agreement of waiver of payment made by the principal officers of the company in New York, or by actual payment or tender of payment there, or to a local or other agent having the premium receipt, signed as provided for. Where, by an express agreement or by the course of business between the parties, it is understood that payment will be made to the local agent, and no notice has been given in sufficient time that payment shall be made at the office and principal place of business stipulated in the contract, a tender of payment to the local agent, whether received by him or not, will excuse the policy-holder and prevent the forfeiture. To hold otherwise would open the door to the grossest frauds upon the part of these foreign insurance companies. The policy-holder who had been depriving himself and family of the comforts, if not the necessaries of life for years, to provide, as he supposed, something for his helpless family when he shall have been laid in the grave, and when the company's coffers shall have in part been filled with his hard earnings, the company can withhold the receipt; and when he comes, perhaps, on the last moment in which payment can be made, he is for the first time informed that he must pay in New York, or all he has paid will be forfeited—a thing which it is impossible for him to do, and which would be gross injustice. It is said, and is in proof, that these receipts are furnished to the local agents through the general agency for the state, and if the agents' accounts at the principal office are not satisfactory, the receipts are withheld. The answer to this is, that it is a thing about which the policy-holder is not presumed to know anything; it surely cannot be held that he is responsible, or to be affected by dereliction in duty of the company's agent, over whom he has no sort of control. John B. Morey is not presumed to have known of the absence of the receipt, and its absence could have had no influence upon his unfortunate aeglect; and however much it is to be regretted that the widow and orphan shall be deprived of the maintenance and support a kind husband and father intended for them, the rules of law must be applied to the facts, which being done, necessarily results in favor of the defendant.

JUDGMENT FOR DEFENDANT.

NOTE.—Upon the question how far the agent of an insurance company may waive the conditions of the policy in regard to the payment of premiums, and make engagements independently of the policy which shall bind the company, see May on Insurance, § 360, and the cases there cited. The question does not seem to be involved in this case, since the learned judge seems to have concluded that the promise which the agent made, that he would give the insured notice of the falling due of the successive premiums, was merely the tender of a friendly office in his personal capacity, and was not an engagement made in his character of agent, such as might possibly bind his principal.

Under the facts surrounding the contract of life insurance in litigation in Hamilton v. New York Mut. Life Ins. Co., 9 Blatchford, 234, 251-3, it was held that the insurer was bound to provide, in the state where the defendant resided at the time the policy was taken out, and continued afterwards to reside, an agent to receive the premiums which should accrue, appointed and qualified according to the statute law of such state on the subject, and that the insurer was not obliged to pay the premiums elsewhere. Substantially the same ruling was made in view of the Virginia statute, in Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Warwick, 20 Grattan, 614. Extending these principles to the principal case, and supposing a similar statute to exist in Mississippi, the conclusion of the learned judge would seem to be well warranted, that a tender to the local agen would be sufficient, and that the assured would not be obliged to make payment elsewhere, whether such agent had been provided with the proper receipts or not.

Railway Aid Bonds—Defences.

CHARLES H. KEANE v. FORT SCOTT (CITY OF).

In Circuit Court of the United States, District of Kansas, November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge.

Defences where Vote Embraces two Propositions.—When there is legislative authority to a municipal corporation to issue negotiable bonds, it cannot defend against them in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, on the ground that the question submitted to the voters embraced two distinct propositions, or for non-compliance by the railroad company to which the bonds were issued with the terms of the ordinance authorizing their execution and delivery.

This is an action upon coupons attached to bonds issued by the city of Fort Scott, dated December 1, 1870, in payment of a subscription to the stock of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company.

The case is submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts, consisting of the charters of the Union Pacific Railway Company, southern division, incorporated February 20, 1868, and the change of its name, February 3, 1870, to the "Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company." Also the charter of the Labette and Sedalia Railroad Company, and of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company.

On July 25th, 1870, an ordinance of the city of Fort Scott was enacted submitting the question of subscribing $75,000 to the capital stock of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company, and $25,000 for the purpose of procuring the right of way for the road of said company through the corporate limits of the city, and the purchase of grounds for depot and machine shops to be donated to the company. Ballots to be "for" or "against" the stock and donation.

The proposition carried, and the city was authorized to subscribe $75,000 to the stock of the M. K. and T. Railway Company, on the following fundamental conditions:

1. The company within six months to cause to be constructed and completed its road from Sedalia, Missouri, to Fort Scott, Kansas, and as soon thereafter as practicable, southwesterly.

2. The said company shall make said line from Sedalia the "great through line by the way of Fort Scott to the southwest," etc.

3. Fort Scott to be the end of a division of the road, at which engine houses and machine shops shall be erected before they are at certain other points, and as soon as the road needs them.

4. Bonds shall be issued by the city for the $75,000.

5. These bonds are to be placed with a trustee chosen by the parties, "to be kept by the trustee until such time as said company shall have constructed and put in practical operation its road from Sedalia to Fort Scott, when he shall deliver them to the company," said trustee to give bond to the city for $150,000 for a faithful performance of his duties.

Digitized by Google

6. The stock of the city to be sold and assigned for a nominal consideration to the Land Grant Railway and Trust Company of New York. (Stated to be a Pennsylvania corporation in New York.)

7. Depot grounds, etc., to be procured by the city and donated to the company.

On December 5th, 1870, an ordinance of the city of Fort Scott was passed, reciting the previous ordinance, and that the proposition submitted received 523 votes for, and 3 against, and "that the terms and conditions upon which the said subscription, and the issue and delivery of said bonds [were made], have been complied with by said company," and ordaining,

1. That the city subscribe for the $75,000 of stock, and it appoints John G. Stuart its agent to make the subscription.

2. For one dollar the city assigns its stock to Parsons, trustee for the capitalists who constructed the road.

3. The city attorney is ordered to prepare the bonds of the city to bear date December 1, 1870, etc., to be signed, etc., and delivered to the company; and these are the bonds to which the coupons in suit were annexed.

Grant & Smith, for the plaintiff; Stewart & McComas, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—Upon the agreed statement of facts, the court holds:

1. That the plaintiff is presumed to be a holder for value, and without notice of the coupons in suit, and is entitled to recover unless there is some defence available to the city as against such a holder.

2. The only defence open to the city against such a holder of its bonds, is want of power to issue them; mere irregularities in the exercise of the power will not avail.

The defence that the bonds are void because the stock was never subscribed, if true as matter of fact, is not available to the defendant. The bond recites that "it is issued under the laws of Kansas, and in pursuance of an ordinance of the city of Fort Scott, approved July 22, 1870—$75,000 subscription to the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company." This recital estops the city to make this defence, and hence it is not a good defence against a holder of the bonds for value before due and without notice.

The same observations hold in reference to the provisions of the ordinance, that the stock issued for the bonds should be transferred for a nominal consideration by the city, and the failure of the company in respect to the erection of machine shops. It is contended that the submission to the voters was not according to the statute authorizing "the city council of any city of the state to subscribe for the stock of any railway company of the state upon such conditions as it may prescribe, provided there is a majority vote in favor of the subscription." (General Laws, 1868, chap. 23, sec. 51.)

The objection is that the ordinance submitted a proposition to vote $75,000 to the stock of this railway company, and $25,000 for another purpose, and that a joint subscription is unauthorized. But the vote was taken in this manner, and carried by 523 votes against 3 votes, and the bonds have been issued. Now a defect or irregularity in the manner of making the submission will not invalidate the bonds in the hands of innocent holders for value; and under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States it is doubtful, if there had never been an election, but the bonds were nevertheless issued and in the hands of innocent holders for value, whether the defence of want of election would avail the municipality which issued them. But here this point does not arise; for there was an election and the proposition carried, and the ordinance authorizing the issue of the bonds so recites. The objection to the submission would probably have been well taken in a suit to prevent the issue of the bonds, but it comes too late now.

Another defence is that the bonds are void because the railroad company to which they were issued had no authority or power in law to build the road into or through the city of Fort Scott. But upon the agreed statement of facts this does not appear, and from the agreed statement taken in connection with the recitals in the act of March 2, 1871, relating to the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company, it would seem that the company had such power; and it appears from the ordinance of December 5, 1870, that the company did build the road and in all respects comply with the terms and conditions on which it was to become entitled to the $75,000 subscription. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject of municipal railway-aid bonds cover the case, and under those decisions the defences of the city here relied on are not good.

JUDGMENT FOR THE PLAINTIFF.

Copyright at Common Law—Jurisdiction of the State Courts—Infringement.

ISAAC S. ISAACS v. AUGUSTIN DALY.

Superior Court New York City, Special Term, March, 4, 1874.

Before CURTIS, J.

1. Copyright at Common Law.—The right of an author or his assignee to the exclusive use of his literary productions exists at common law, independently of all statutes.

2. —— Jurisdiction of State Courts.—Such being the case, the state courts have jurisdiction to protect literary property. The act of congress of July 8, 1870, affords an additional remedy merely, and does not affect the pre-existing jurisdiction.

3. —— Infringement—Title of Play.—The mere fact that a dramatic composition bears the same title as a prior dramatic composition, does not, if this circumstance is wholly accidental, and if the compositions are in other respects dissimilar, constitute the latter composition an infringement of the copyright of the proprietor of the former.

CURTIS, J.—This action is brought to restrain the performance of a play called "Charity," also for accounting of profits and for $20,000 damages. The 19th of December, 1873, the plaintiff deposited in the copyright office, at Washington, the title of a play called "Charity," and copyrighted such dramatic composition. In January following the defendant procured the exclusive right, as he alleges, to possess and use manuscript copies of an entirely different play, by William S. Gilbert, also called "Charity," the latter being then played at the Haymarket, London. The defendant, in February following, prepared it for performance, and on the 27th of that month advertised it for a public representation on the 3d of March, the day subsequent to the hearing of this motion for an injunction. It is objected that the action should have been commenced in the federal courts. This court has long exercised a jurisdiction to protect literary property, and the act of congress, in 1870, conferring jurisdiction in this class of suits upon the federal courts, appears to afford an additional remedy—without affecting the pre-existing jurisdiction—in respect to the rights this plaintiff has in the play, and which exist at common law, independently of all statutes. (Palmer v. De Witt, 47 N. Y. R. 532.) The other question, as to whether the defendant should be enjoined from performing the play under the name of "Charity," is not free from difficulty. The affidavits fail to satisfy me that the plaintiff would be injured on the ground claimed by him, that Mr. Gilbert's play has been unfavorably received and criticised when played. It is not alleged that there has been any bad faith on either side. The complication appears to be purely accidental. Should the dramatic performance be enjoined because the word "Charity" is the title of each? No question exists as to any similitude or imitation in either. It is simply to be considered whether the use of the word "Charity" in plaintiff's play for a title, and his copyrighting the play, give him the exclusive use of that word as a title in the public performance of plays. Charity is a virtue that has been employed and portrayed in every stage and department of art for all ages. Would it be just that an engraver who has copyrighted a design that he entitled "Charity" should restrain another engraver from vending to the public a different design which the latter also designates as "Charity," both being works of art symbolizing the same virtue, but differing in plan and execution? If this principle is answered in the affirmative the same principle might be invoked by a publisher who has copyrighted a sermon called "Charity," by "——," to enjoin the sale by another publisher of a sermon, utterly different in composition, also called "Charity," written by some other person. The law favors literature and art, and while it seeks to protect all in the enjoyment of their property and their rights, it does not abridge the field of occupation and enterprise. The use of the word "charity" as a designation for any work of art or literature, cannot ordinarily be monopolized by any one person. There may be occasions were a title is made use of in bad faith, or to promote some imposition, or to inflict a wrong, when a court of justice should interfere to prevent its use, or to compensate a party who has in consequence sustained an injury. But the present case does not appear to be one where the court is called upon to interfere for any of these reasons. Both parties having acted in good faith, it would be inequitable to subject the defendant to loss, who has prepared for representation and advertised Mr. Gilbert's play under the name of "Charity." Nothing is shown by which it appears that the plaintiff would sustain loss by changing the name of his play if he desired to do so, and I do not find any case where a court has granted a plaintiff, under the circumstances appearing in the papers, the relief he seeks by the present application. The motion for an injunction must be denied with costs.

Digitized by Google

INJUNCTION REFUSED.

NOTE.—The case of Palmer v. DeWitt, above referred to, contains a very clear exposition by ALLEN, J., of the rights of the owner of literary property as they exist at common law. The distinction is very clearly drawn between what is sometimes termed "copyright before publication," and the exclusive right to multiply copies after publication. It is this "copyright before publication" which the common law regards as property independently of any statute so declaring it, and which courts of common law jurisdiction will, without any statutory warrant for so doing, exercise their power to protect. Concerning the nature of this right, it may be said that it consists simply in the right of the author or his assignee to the first publication of his manuscript. "The author of a literary work or composition," said ALLEN, J., in the case above cited, "has by law a right to the first publication of it. He has a right to determine whether it shall be published at all, and if published, when, where, by whom, and in what form. This exclusive right is confined to the first publication. When once published, it is dedicated to the public, and the author has not at common law any exclusive right to multiply copies of it or to control the subsequent issue of copies by others. The right of an author or proprietor of a literary work to multiply copies of it to the exclusion of others, is the creation of the statute. This is the right secured by the 'copyright' laws of the different governments." "It is certain," said YATES, J., in Miller v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303, 2379, "that every man has a right to keep his own sentiments if he pleases; he has certainly a right to judge whether he will make them public or commit them only to the sight of his friends. In that state the manuscript is, in every sense, his peculiar property, and no man can take it from him, or make any use of it which he has not authorized, without being guilty of a violation of his property. And as every author or proprietor of a manuscript has a right to determine whether he will publish it or not, he has a right to the first publication, and whoever deprives him of that priority is guilty of a manifest wrong, and the courts have a right to stop it." Mr. Phillips, in his valuable work on copyright, page 2, speaking of this right of first publication, says: "It is the exclusive privilege of first publishing any original material product of intellectual labor. Its basis is property. A violation of it is an invasion of property; and it depends entirely upon the common law." After quoting these and other authorities, the learned judge in Palmer v. DeWitt, supra, defines this right as follows: "An author of an unpublished literary work has, then, a property in such work, recognized and protected both here and in England, and the use and enjoyment of it is secured to him as of right. This property in a manuscript is not distinguishable from any other personal property. It is governed by the same rules of transfer and succession, and is protected by the same process, and has the benefit of all the remedies accorded to other property, so far as applicable. It is personal, as other movable property, personal in legal contemplation, following the person of the owner, and is governed by the law of his domicile." The court further held that an alien friend was entitled to the same measure of protection in this species of property as a citizen. Accordingly in that case, where a copy of an unpublished drama had been surreptitiously obtained in England and published in this country without the license or consent of the proprietor, it was held that he might maintain an action in the courts of New York to restrain its publication.

Notes of Cases Decided at the February Term, 1874, of Supreme Court of Missouri, at St. Joseph.

[Courtesy of Litt. R. Lancaster, Esq., of St. Joseph.]

1. Criminal Procedure—Assistant Prosecuting Counsel.—State v. Joseph P. Hamilton. There is no law in this state to prevent the employment of counsel to assist the prosecuting attorney in carrying on a prosecution, and the peculiar position or attitude that such counsel shall assume in reference to the trial of such cause, is a matter to be arranged among themselves, under control of the trial court.

2. ——. ——. Closing Argument.—It is discretionary with the trial court to permit assistant counsel to close the argument in the case, if the prosecuting attorney waives his right to do so, and such discretion will not be reviewed here.

3. Re-examination of Witness.—When a party has examined his witness, and the other party has cross-examined him, it is discretionary with the trial court whether a re-examination will be allowed, and this court will not interfere unless manifest abuse and injustice is shown.

1. Sheriff's Deed—Effect of by Relation.—William S. Leach v. George Kœnig. A sheriff's deed relates back to the day of sale, as to the defendant in the execution and his privies, and to strangers subsequently purchasing with notice, and vests title in the execution purchaser from the day of sale, but no title passes to a bidder at a sheriff's sale until the amount of the bid is paid and the deed delivered.

2. Landlord and Tenant—Attornment to New Landlord.—A tenant in possession of property under a lease cannot recognize another landlord under a subsequent lease, without the consent of the first landlord, and such attornment, if made, is void.

Bills and Notes—Endorser Presumed Innocent Purchaser.—Amanda Corby, executrix, &c, v. Squire T. Butler. The endorser, by delivery of a negotiable note, before maturity, is presumed to be an innocent holder for value, and must be so treated in absence of evidence to the contrary, and without such proof no evidence is admissible of fraud in procuring the note.

1. Defaulting Guardian — Bankruptcy—Remedy of Sureties.—Wesley Halliburton v. Calvin T. Carter. A defalcation by a guardian is not relieved by a discharge in bankruptcy, nor is his contingent liability to his security on his bond as such guardian discharged, where such security pays the debt, and the securety can recover for money paid to his use when he pays the defalcation after the discharge in bankruptcy of the principal.

2. ——. ——. ——. The relations of principal and surety of a fiduciary trust are not in any manner affected by bankruptcy proceedings. They remain in the same position toward each other, and to the cestui que trust, as if no bankruptcy proceedings had ever been commenced.

Suit to Quiet Title—Disclaimer.—Evan Jourdan v. Allen Stephens. In a proceeding under our statute to quiet title, if the defendant disclaims all title adverse to the plaintiff, tha ends the case.

Fencing Railway Track.—Michael Slattery v. The St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. R. Co. A railroad must be fenced as required by sec. 43, 1 Wag. 310, in all enclosures, whether timbered or not. [See F. & P. Railway Co. v. Lull in 11 Cent. Law Jour. 131.

Money Paid for Extension of Time—Usury.—Arthur Kirkpatrick v. F. W. Smith and T. B. Weakley. Money paid for an extension of time on a note cannot be recovered back as usury, nor be applied as payment on the note.

Possession of Mortgagee of Realty—Rents and Profits.—Augustus Honaker v. David Shough. A defendant in an action for possession of land, who becomes equitably entitled to a mortgage, may protect his possession against the mortgagor or his heirs, but must account for rents and profits toward the mortgage debtor till redeemed.

Digitized by Google

Landlord and Tenant—Notice to Quit.—George W. Stephens v. A. J. Brown. When a lease has a definite period to run, no notice to quit is necessary, nor is any notice to quit necessary where the tenant denies or disclaims his landlord's title.

1. Deed of Bargain and Sale—Construction.—Benjamin Cornelius et al. v. Margaret Smith et al. Deeds of bargain and sale originated under the statute of uses, and are used to make family settlements in which express trusts may be created in favor of beneficiaries, the same as executory devises, and must demand th same liberal construction, &c.

2. Partition—Equitable Title.—A suit for partition of equitable real estate may be maintained by an action in equity.

Description of Town-Site—Mistake.—John G. Wood city attorney, ex rel. J. S. Rogers et al. v. Trustees of the Town of Cameron. A town built up and located on section 23, but described in the act of incorporation as on section 24: Held, the section is a false particular which may be stricken out and leave enough to demonstrate the locality. The town itself by name, as laid out on the ground, sufficiently demonstrates its locality, and is better known than the numbers of the United States survey.

Corporate Existence—Failure to Record Articles—Individual Liability of Directors.—Peyton J. Hunt v. Lucius Salisbury. Suit on a note given as directors of a corporation. The corporation organized under articles of association duly signed, acknowledged and recorded, but did not file the same with the secretary of state until after suit brought. Held, that the corporation had no legal existence to transact business until the articles of incorporation were filed with the secretary of state, and that defendants are liable individually on the note.

Note executed by one Partner and endorsed by the other to raise Money—Remedy of Endorser after Paying.—Benson Bond v. Luke W. Burris. Where one partner as maker, and another as endorser, makes a note to raise money to pay the debt of the firm, the endorser cannot take up the note and sue on it at law, and recover against his co-partner. It constitutes a debt in his hands against the firm, and must come in as such in a final settlement.

Tender on Terms.—Geo. W. Adams & J. M. Scott v. Mary A. Helm, Executrix, etc. A debtor has the right to prescribe the terms of a tender, and the creditor may accept or refuse. If he accept it, he must take the tender on the terms prescribed by the creditor.

Estoppel in Pais.—Wm. A. Donaldson v. Henry Hibner. Estoppels in pais act on existing, and not on subsequently acquired rights. If a party has no title at the time, he may afterwards acquire the title, and such subsequently acquired title will not pass by an alleged former estoppel.

Railway Negligence—Killing Cattle.—John Crafton v. H. & St. Jo. R. R. Co. Salt spilled on a railroad track in unloading cars, naturally attracts cattle, and when plaintiff's cow was so attracted and killed, this is evidence conducing to prove negligence on part of railroad company. It was not the plaintiff's, but the defendant's business to remove such salt, and no contributory negligence in plaintiff to let his cow run out, as he might presume the servants of defendant would do their duty.

1. Sheriff's Deed—Amendment of.—John H. Ware v. Wm. Johnson. A sheriff acts by authority of the statute in sales of land, and no court except the court under whose process he acts can supervise and make him correct his deed.

2. Execution of Power—Equity Jurisdiction.—A court of equity cannot aid the imperfect execution of a statutory power.

3. Color of Title—Possession—Enclosures.—A party holding color of title to a tract of land may take possession in good faith without making actual enclosures, but not so with a mere trespasser without color of title.

1. Corporations—Suits Against—Denial of Corporate Existence—Appearance.—Thomas Seaton v. The C. R. I. & P. R. R. Co. The appearance of a corporation as defendant, dispenses with proof of its corporate existence, and is conclusive evidence of its corporate existence for the purposes of such case.

2. Suits for Penalties—Double Damages—Who must Sue.—Double damages, though punitive in their nature, are not strictly penalties which belong to the state, referred to in sec. 42, 1 Wag. Stat. 310; but the parties injured are the real parties in interest under sec. 43; and they, and not the state, must sue.

1. Corporation—Liability for Malicious Prosecution by Agent or Servant.—Thomas S. Gillette v. The Mo. V. R. R. Co. A railroad company is liable to an action for malicious prosecution by an agent or servant when such alleged malicious prosecution is done by such agent or servant in the course of his employment, and within the scope and power of his duties, and exemplary damages may be recovered for such acts.

2. ———. ———. What necessary to fix Liability.—But in order to hold the company liable, the act complained of must not only come within the scope of the authority conferred upon such agent or servant, but it must appear that the act done was done in the performance of business, coming within the purview of the objects and purposes for which the corporation was organized, and the powers conferred by its charter.

3. ———. ———. ———. Prosecution of Crimes.—The prosecution of crimes against the state does not come within the scope of the powers conferred upon a railroad company by its charter; and therefore its officers and agents cannot bind the stockholders of any such company in their corporate capacity by such proceedings.

Charles Sumner.

This distinguished statesman died on the 11th instant, at his residence in Washington, having on the previous day occupied his seat in the senate. We do not propose entering upon an extended notice of his life. He has been so long an active combatant in the arena of national politics that his character as a lawyer had well nigh passed out of the professional mind. He was one of that numerous class of Americans whose lives have afforded illustrations of how eminently a sedulous study of the law is calculated to qualify a person for success in public life. In his earlier years Mr. SUMNER cultivated the law as a science—pursued it, not as a means of gaining a livelihood, but rather as an intellectual pursuit. He was called to the bar in 1834, at the age of twenty-three, and commenced the practice of the law in Boston. Although business rapidly sought him, he refused several advantageous offers of partnership. He was the pupil and friend of Mr. Justice STORY, who appointed him reporter of his circuit, in which capacity he published three volumes, known as Sumner's Reports. During the absence of Justice STORY, Mr. SUMNER filled his place as professor of law in Harvard University. So high an opinion did the former entertain of Mr. SUMNER'S ability and attainments as a lawyer, that he expressed a desire to see him occupy a seat on the Supreme Bench of the United States. Upon the death of Justice STORY, Chancellor KENT expressed a strong preference for Mr. SUMNER as the most suitable person to fill the chair of Dane Professor of Law in Harvard University, left vacant by that great jurist; but Mr. SUMNER instructed his friends not to press his appointment, and it was not made. He spent three years in Europe, during which time he was the recipient of distinguished honors, such as have seldom been bestowed upon young men, much less Americans, at the hands of the judges of Westminster Hall, and the most eminent jurists of England and the continent, including Mittermaier and Savigny. During this time his name appears as one of the editors of the American Jurist. This was one of the ablest law periodicals ever published in this country. Returning to America, he edited, with elaborate notes, in connection with J. C. Perkins, Esq., the Reports of the younger Vesey, in twenty volumes. This was his last contribution to the literature of the law.

In 1845 he engaged actively in politics, and in 1850 entered the senate as the successor of Daniel Webster. Since that time his public life has been part of the history of the country. One of the last acts of his life recalled his early and steadfast love of jurisprudence, which the contests of a quarter of a century of political life had in no degree diminished. We allude to the occasion when the subject of the confirmation of Chief Justice WAITE came before the senate in executive session. On that occasion Mr. SUMNER made a speech in which he reviewed in his most masterly style of eloquence the judicial career of STORY, MARSHALL, and others of the illustrious names which have adorned that great court, and whose labors have contributed in a lasting degree to the peace and honor of their country. At the end of his speech, the nomination of Mr. WAITE as chief justice was unanimously confirmed.

While many American statesmen have been found wanting towards the close of their career—while some have outlived their usefulness and even their fame—it was the extreme felicity of Mr. SUMNER to live to see the animosities which had been engendered by the fierce contests in which he had been engaged in a great measure pass away, and to see the charity and rectitude of his motives universally recognized by his countrymen.

Digitized by Google

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court—Amount in Dispute.

We learn through the press that an important decision on this subject was recently rendered by United States Circuit Judge DRUMMOND, in Wisconsin, in the case of Zinkeisen & Co. v. Hufschmidt. The action was brought in the state court to recover the value of a quantity of wheat. Upon the defendant's application, an order of removal to the circuit court of the United States was granted by Judge SMALL, of the state court. At the time he made the order, no pleading or writ was on file showing the amount in dispute except the petition of the defendant, asking for the removal. After the order was granted, Zinkeisen & Co. filed a complaint in the state court, alleging the cause of action and claiming damages in a stated sum. In that complaint they obtained an order from Judge SMALL to show cause why the order made by him, removing the cause into the federal court, should not be vacated and set aside. On hearing the order to show cause, Judge SMALL refused to vacate the order of removal. On the first day of the session of the United States circuit court after the order of removal, Hufschmidt brought into the court a certified copy of the papers filed in the state court, including the complaint filed after the order of removal was granted, and asked that said papers might be filed and the cause docketed in that court. The motion was argued before one of the judges of the United States district court, who denied it, holding that the complaint filed after the order of removal was conclusive as to the amount in dispute. A motion was then made before Judge DRUMMOND to vacate and set aside the order made by the district judge, and that the cause be docketed, and after argument the order was set aside and the plaintiffs required to file a declaration. This settles a question of practice which has perplexed the profession in the state, and also settles that when the plaintiff chooses to commence suit by summons, and not file either his summons or complaint, the defendant, in a proper case for removal, may enter an appearance and show by petition that a suit has been commenced, and the amount claimed exceeds $500, and tender a proper bond, and thus secure a removal of his cause into a federal court; and when he has done this, it is not in the power of the plaintiff to destroy that right by filing a complaint in the state court reducing his damages below $500, and that, when a cause is once properly in the federal court, the plaintiff cannot then file a declaration laying his damages at less than $500, and cut off the jurisdiction. In other words, when the jurisdiction of the federal court has once attached, it cannot be taken away by any act of the plaintiff.

Book Notices.

A TREATISE ON THE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS WHICH REST UPON THE LEGISLATIVE POWER OF THE STATES OF THE AMERICAN UNION. By Thomas M. Cooley, LL.D., one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of Michigan, and Jay Professor of Law in the University of Michigan. Third edition, with considerable additions, giving the results of recent cases. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1874.

We are glad to welcome a new edition of Judge COOLEY'S great work, not so much for the additional matter it contains, as for the renewed proof it affords of its almost unprecedented popularity. Its extraordinary success does not more than equal its intrinsic merits. We have had occasion thoroughly to examine it in every part, and have never failed to find convincing proofs of the careful research and great learning it embodies. Our judgment is that a work of equal value on this subject could have been produced by but few lawyers in the country. Judge COOLEY'S previous labors, studies, long judicial experience, ripe learning and sound judgment peculiarly fitted him to write upon American Constitutional Law; and his treatise from the first took rank among the productions of KENT, STORY, REDFIELD and PARSONS. This is no light praise, we know; for the works of these authors upon jurisprudence are certainly unsurpassed, and we may be pardoned if we add, in our judgment, unequalled by like productions in any country in the world. Foreigners, it is well known, have often disparaged the general literature of America, but have been compelled to concede the merits of its works upon the law. Even the liberal and enlightened Mr. Buckle says that "in no other country are there so few men of great learning, and so few men of great ignorance; * * and with the single exception of jurisprudence scarcely anything has been done for those vast subjects on which the Germans are incessantly laboring." (Hist. of Civilization, vol. 1, ch. 5.) The causes of this exception he endeavors to explain, but notices in passing, that Burke was early struck by the partiality of the Americans for works on law, and with the fact that even then nearly as many copies of Blackstone's Commentaries were sold in America as in England. Mr. Buckle adds: "Of this state of society, the great works of Kent and Story were, at a later period, the natural result."

The lawyers of America have done their full share in making the American name known and honored abroad, and it has so happened that this has been more effectually done by their general treatises than by the reported decisions of the courts. Of late years we frequently find the English judges citing, and with expressions of respect, the works of Kent, Story, Parsons, Greenleaf, etc., but we more rarely see any special reference to the judgments of our courts. Story is better known abroad than Marshall, and Parsons than Chief Justice Shaw. On the other hand, American lawyers and courts have from the first drawn freely from the fountains of English law. The productions of English lawyers and the judgments of English judges have always been familiar to the American bar, but the reverse is not so generally the case. This gives to an American lawyer, in the production of treatises on the law, great advantages over his English brother, and accounts, in part, for the number and excellent character of our works on jurisprudence.

In a familiar passage Macaulay portrays in eloquent words the extent of the influence of Greece upon the world, and declares that "Her empire is imperishable, * * and that her influence and glory will survive, fresh in eternal youth, exempt from mutability and decay, immortal as the intellectual principle from which they derived their origin and over which they exercise their control." Scarcely less vast, and probably not less enduring, are the triumphs of English law. It has followed the English flag into every country where English energy and enterprise have established themselves. More than all, it followed our ancestors here and has spread over the civilized portions of the American continent. If the traveller from the Thames visits the Supreme Court at Washington, or a court sitting on the banks of the Mississippi, or thousands of miles beyond on the shores of the Pacific, he will find lawyers citing and judges relying upon the decisions of the learned judges who have presided or are now presiding in Westminster Hall.

In the preparation of his work Judge Cooley has availed himself of whatever of English law or English history could contribute to it, and in addition has had the benefit of the decisions of the federal and state courts of his own country. The result is that he has produced a work distinguished for thoroughness of research, for learning, for original discussions, and for sound, temperate and conservative views—a work which has justly made him famous, and which is an honor to American legal literature.

Such is our estimate of its great value, and it gives us sincere pleasure publicly to express it. The general plan and character of the work are so well known that we do not feel called upon to notice in detail the subjects of which it treats. The second edition was published in 1871, and the third differs from it only in referring with adequate fullness to the decisions since rendered, which are quite numerous, bearing upon the topics discussed.

DIGEST OF FIRE INSURANCE DECISIONS IN THE COURTS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTH AMERICA. By H. A. Littleton and J. S. Blatchley. 3d edition, revised and enlarged by Clement Bates, of the Cincinnati Bar. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. 1873. pp. 795.

This is the third edition of this excellent work. The favor with which it has been received by the profession, affords another example that it never fails to appreciate a work on which has been expended sufficient skillful labor to make it worthy of its approving judgment. We have been familiar with this Digest since its first appearance, and have had constant occasion to resort to it as an aid in investigating questions connected with the law of fire insurance. The credit of its production belongs to the state of Iowa. Mr. Littleton was practically acquainted with insurance, and Mr. Blatchley was one of the most industrious and accomplished lawyers in the State. These two performed the greater part of the labor of preparing the work, but they were assisted by John L. Hawey, Esq., whose death, under distressing circumstances, soon after the appearance of the first edition, was deeply deplored by his friends and by the bar of the state, who felt a just pride in his abilities and promise.

The work was distinctly limited to fire insurance, and wisely so, and embraced a digest of all the decisions in Great Britain and America (including Canada), from the earliest times down to the date of publication. It was, throughout, an original work—prepared from an actual examination of over 2,500 volumes, and gave the substance of the points decided of 930 cases, in 1,525 sections. A useful feature was that it gave the date of each decision. This is especially important in the study of a branch of the law which is constantly developing, and whose progress has been attended with so many judicial conflicts as the law of insurance. The second edition appeared in 1868, under the editorial charge of Stephen G. Clarke, Esq., who, by bringing it down to that date, added to the original work an abstract of 316 cases and 691 additional sections. This edition by Mr. Bates includes not only all the original work, but also the sections added by Mr. Clarke, and an addition of 362 cases, coming down to June, 1873. The work of the present editor has been carefully performed.

Digitized by Google

Whoever has this Digest and the recent elementary work of Mr. May, heretofore noticed (1 CENT. LAW JOUR. p. 48), has the means of ascertaining, with the least possible trouble, the existing state of the law on the subject of fire policies, or, at least, the sources where it may be found.

THE AMERICAN LAW TIMES AND REPORTS. NEW SERIES. Monthly. New York: Hurd & Houghton. Cambridge: The Riverside Press. Edited by Rowland Cox, Esq., of Washington, D. C.

The new series of this publication, beginning with 1874, embraces two features: a digest of decisions published in extenso in the various American legal periodicals, and reports of leading cases on important topics of the law. The cases digested and reported are in separate series, so that the reports can be bound in a separate volume at the end of the year. The editor makes his selections with much discrimination; and for typographical beauty this publication is unsurpassed by anything of the kind, whether issued in this country or in England.

THE NASHVILLE (Tenn.) COMMERCIAL REPORTER, weekly, $2 00 per annum, has adopted the feature of a "law department," in which is published the decisions of the supreme court of Tennessee long in advance of the regular reports. The "law department" is under the editorial charge of Maj. Josiah R. Hubbard, an accomplished lawyer, by whom the cases are reported, with carefully prepared head-notes and appropriate editorial comments. This feature renders the Commercial Reporter well deserving of the patronage of the legal profession in Tennessee.

Notes and Queries.

A correspondent asks whether "the chairman of the board of trustees" of towns incorporated under the general law of Missouri (2 Wag. Mo. Stat. 1318, § 16), is a judicial officer, and as such authorized to hear and determine causes arising under the town ordinances.

ANSWER.—The statute clothes the chairman of the board of trustees with power to hear and determine all civil actions for fines and penalties accruing to the town corporation, subject to the right of appeal to the circuit court; gives him power to issue execution, and upon a return of no property, to imprison the defendant.

In view of the terms of the statute, we cannot understand what notion our correspondent had in his head that prompted the question he asks. If a person who is vested with power to sit as a justice in the trial of causes, to render judgment, to issue execution and to imprison the defendant, is not a judicial officer, we are at a loss to know what kind of an officer he is. If, as our correspondent suggests, the question was raised in the case of O'Connor v. The Town of Memphis, supreme court of Missouri, October term, 1873, we presume the counsel for the plaintiff in error had the discretion not to press it before the court. It is not noticed in the opinion.

United States Supreme Court — Decisions Last Week.

[Compiled from the New York Herald.]

Private Corporations—Directors have no Power to Increase Capital Stock.—No 577. The Chicago City Railroad Company v. Ailtoner. Appeal from the circuit court of the northern district of Illinois. The directors of the company, without consultation or calling a meeting of the stockholders, resolved to increase the capital stock of the company from $1,250,000 to $1,500,000. The appellee, a stockholder, objected to the proceeding and filed his bill to prevent the increase, insisting that it could not be lawfully done without the concurrence of the stockholders. The court below sustained the position and restrained the act. That decree is here affirmed on the ground that a change so organic and fundamental as that of increasing the capital stock of a corporation beyond the limit fixed by the charter canno be made by the directors alone, unless expressly authorized thereto. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Taking Private Property for Public Use—Writ of Error.—No. 555. Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company v. Trustees of Sixth Presbyterian Church. Error to the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The church recovered a judgment against the company for $11,500 damages for running the road through Sixth street in front of the church edifice. The company obtained a writ of error, and a motion was made to dismiss it on the ground that the law under which the assessment of damages was made by the jury in the case was a Maryland statute, which, by the construction of the Maryland courts, does not allow an appeal or writ of error. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court denying the motion, holding that the writ lies in such a case, notwithstanding the objection urged. The early decisions of this court, it is said, held that the right to the writ exists by virtue of the appellate power of this court as defined in the act of 1801, creating the circuit court of the district, and the court is governed by that act.

Insolvency—Marshalling of Assets — Charleston Fire Loan Bonds.—No. 153. Baring Bros. v. Dabney Morgan & Co. Error to the supreme court of South Carolina. This case involved the distribution of the assets of the bank of the state of South Carolina, on its own account and as the financial agent of the state, now in the hands of a receiver, and particularly the question of the title of the fire loan bondholders and the fire loan stockholders—bonds and stock negotiated by the bank, under the authority of the state, for the rebuilding of Charleston after the fire of 1838. The bonds were taken up in Europe and the stock in the United States. The former had the guarantee of the bank, and the latter did not. The decision is that the fire loan bondholders are on an equal footing with the other creditors of the bank, and that the fire loan stockholders are not creditors of the bank at all, and not entitled to any participation in the fund. The assets are directed to be distributed among the creditors of the bank in proportion to the amount of claims, reducing those arising during the war to their values in national currency. This is an affirmation of the judgment of the supreme court of the state. Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice STRONG dissented.

Construction of Will.—No. 200. Croply v. Cooper. Appeal from the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Wm. Cooper left a will containing the following clause: "To my daughter, Elizabeth Croply, at her mother's death, I give and bequeath the rent of my house on Pennsylvania avenue in the city of Washington, for and during her life, and at her death it is my will that the said house be sold and the avails therefrom become the property of her children, or child, when he, she or they have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the interest in the meantime to be applied toward their maintenance." The daughter had one child at the death of the testator, who lived to be twenty-one years of age, who died intestate and unmarried, in the lifetime of his mother. The mother, Elizabeth Croply, now claims the property, under the clause of the will quoted. The court below sustained a demurrer, holding that the devise over to the children or child of Elizabeth Croply was contingent upon its, or their, surviving the mother, and, also, attaining the age of twenty-one years. That decree is here reversed, where it is held, in substance, that the testator vested the residuum in the child or children of Elizabeth Croply, and there left it without further disposition to now go to the mother Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Foreclosure of Mortgage—Defence of Fraud—Rights of Bona Fide Holder.—No. 184. Sawyer v. Pickett et al. Appeal from the circuit court or the northern district of Illinois. This was the foreclosure of a mortgage given by the appellees to the Fox River Valley Railroad Company to secure a subscription note, and by the company assigned to the appellant. The defence was that the note and mortgage were obtained by fraud of the company practiced to induce property owners in the locality of the appellee to subscribe to its stock. The court below sustained the defence and dismissed the bill. That decree is here reversed, the court holding that the defence is not satisfactorily proven, and that, as against the appellant, a bona fide holder, without notice, it should not be sustained. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Admiralty—Collision—Negligence and Fault of Libellant.—No. 210. Schooner Mary H. Banks v. Steamer Falcon. Appeal from the circuit court for the district of Maryland. This was the reversal of a decree dismissing the libel of the schooner in a case of collision on the Chesapeake Bay in July, 1867, the principle affirmed being that it was the duty of the steamer to see the schooner as soon as she was to be discovered, watch her progress and direction, observe the general situation, and thus keep out of her way, having at command all the means to do so--ample sea room, calm weather and water, abundant light, and no other vessel in proximity on either side. It is also said the steamer was grossly at fault in approaching too near the schooner and at too high a rate of speed, which, as asserted, was the real cause of the disaster. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Digitized by Google

Claims against Government—Transportation of Stores—Right to Employ other Contractors.—No. 63. Caldwell v. United States. Appeal from the court of claims. This was an action on a contract for the transportation of military stores and supplies in the west. The government maintained that there was no covenant to employ Caldwell on the route, to the exclusion of other persons or means, but the court of claims gave judgment for the claimant for a portion of the amount alleged to be due. The judgment is here reversed and the defence of the government sustained. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Construction of Will—Limitation over.—No. 164. Clarke et al. v. Johnson et al., executors. Appeal from the circuit court for the southern district of New York. The appellants sought to recover of the defendants as executors of one Boorman, who was last surviving executor of their great-grandfather, J. R. Smith, the present value of certain lands of which he died seized. The complainants were children of the son of a daughter of the testator, their grandfather dying before their grandmother. A codicil to the will provided for the children of a daughter whose husband should survive her, but not for the children of a daughter who should survive her husband. Hence it was held below and is affirmed here that the limitation over to the grandchildren provided by the codicil does not inure to the benefit of the complainants. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Land Law—Conveyance of Ancestor's Title.—No. 199. Zautzinger v. Gunton. Appeal from the supreme court of the District of Columbia. This was the ffirmance of a decree of the supreme court of the District determining that certain lands conveyed by the parents of the wife of Zautzinger to Gunton terminated their interest in the property and vested it in Gunton and the Bank of Washington, of which he is president, and concludes the complainants as heirs. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Pleading in Federal Court—Allegation of Citizenship.—No. 211. Morgan ex S. N. Gay. Error to the circuit court of Louisiana. The testator was charged as the drawee and accepter of an inland bill of exchange of which one Goodrich was the drawer, and with being the drawer of another of which Pilcher and Goodrich were the drawees. The plaintiff did not allege that the payee and first endorser was a citizen of a state other than Louisiana, only averring that he was a citizen of Louisville, Ky. This allegation is deemed insufficient to give the court jurisdiction, and the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, that amendments may be made to the pleadings showing the citizenship of the endorsers of the bills, and whether such as to give jurisdiction. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Action on Foreign Judgment—Defendant may show that he was not served with Process in Original Suit.—No. 477. Knowles v. Gaslight Company. Error to the circuit court for the district of Minnesota. This was an action on a judgment by the Logansport (Ind.) Gaslight Company on a judgment recovered in Indiana against Knowles. The plea was that the Indiana court did not acquire jurisdiction by personal service on Knowles. The company relied on the sufficiency of the judgment record to show that the court did acquire jurisdiction, and the court below held the record to be conclusive of the question. The judgment was for the company. This court reversed the decision, applying the doctrine laid down in Thompson v. Whitney, the opinion in which was read just in advance of the one in this case, that Knowles was entitled to show that he was not served with process in the case in which the judgment was entered, and that the court did not, therefore, acquire jurisdiction therein. Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion.

Infringement of Patent—Decision upon the Facts.—No. 181. Klein v. Russell. Error to the circuit court for the northern district of New York. This was an action to recover for an alleged infringement of a patent for improvement in the process of preparing bark-tanned sheep and lamb skins for gloves, by the agency of "fat liquor," an article produced by the scouring of deerskins after tanning in oil. The judgment below was for the patentee, the verdict having found the fact of infringement, and it is sustained here. Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion.

Infringement of Patent.—No. 87. Mitchell v. Tilghman. Appeal from the circuit court for the southern district of New York. In this case the appellee recovered in the court below for the infringement of his patent for a new process in the use of fat acids in the manufactures to which they are adapted. The decree is here reversed, the court sustaining the theory of the defence that there was no infringement of the patent in the process used by the defendant. The court say that differences between the two processes so great as that exhibited in the record relieve the case, in their judgment, from all doubt, and warrant the conclusion that the process under which the respondent works is substantially different from that of the complainant. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion. Dissenting, Justices SWAYNE, STRONG and BRADLEY; not sitting, Mr. Justice DAVIS.

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent Preference.—No. 196. Cook et al. v. Tullis. Appeal from the circuit court for the southern district of Ohio. In this case Cook and others are the assignees in bankruptcy of one Homans, an insolvent, and as such claimed to hold a demand note for $7,000, which before his failure he had deposited in the place of certain bonds and securities which Tullis had left with him for safe-keeping, using the securities for his own purposes. This was done without the knowledge of Tullis, and about a month before the failure. The note maturing, Homans took measures for its collection On the day of the suspension, and nearly a month before the petition was filed, he notified his attorney that the note belonged to Tullis. Under these circumstances the court below found that the note was the property of Tullis, and that the transfer was not a proceeding intended to give him the preference over other creditors contrary to the statute. That decision is affirmed here. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion. Mr. Justice MILLER dissenting.

Affirmance by Divided Court.—No. 194. Clinkenbeard et al. v. The United States. Error to the circuit court for the southern district of Ohio. The questions involved are not stated. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD announced the affirmance of the judgment in this case by a divided court.

Appeal--Final Decree.—In the case of Governor Kellogg, of Louisiana, v. H. C. Warmoth, in the Louisiana circuit, the court was petitioned to allow an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but the motion has been refused on the ground that the record does not show a final decree.

Parties in Equity—Joinder of Complainants.—In the case of The City of Davenport et al. v. Darks, the latter sued in the circuit court for Iowa on behalf of himself and others as stockholders in the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, to restrain the city from enforcing a tax for general revenue against the company. A demurrer insisted that the company should have been joined in the action; that the complainant had a complete remedy at law, and that the tax was a valid one upon the property of the company. The court overruled the demurrer and enjoined the tax. Without passing upon the other questions, it is here held that the company should have been joined, and as it was not, the demurrer should have been sustained. The decree was reversed. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion.

Public Lands—Entry before Proclamation of Sale.—No. 205. Eldred v. Sexton. Error to the supreme court of Wisconsin. This was a contest concerning the title to certain lands in Wisconsin. It is here held that the plaintiff's entries were invalid, and rightfully cancelled because they were made before the lands had been proclaimed for sale at the price fixed by law, and that as the entries of the defendant were made after the lands were properly put into the market they were valid. Judgment affirmed. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion.

Demurrer Overruled.—No. 8. Original. State of Florida v. Anderson. Demurrer overruled.

Legal News and Notes.

—CASSIUS G. FOSTER has been confirmed United States district judge for the district of Kansas.

—MESSRS. TAVEL, EASTMAN & HOWELL, of Nashville, have just issued a "Criminal Code and Digest of Criminal Cases decided by the Supreme Court of Tennessee," compiled by Hon. James M. Quarles, of Clarksville. Gen. Quarles is one of the most accomplished lawyers of Tennessee.

—WM. L. GROSS, Esq., proposes to the Illinois legislature to furnish the new revision of the statutes of that state at $2 per copy. If this proposition is accepted, Illinois will have reached the golden age of cheap statutes. So much for competition.

—THERE appears to be no definite prospect of the passage of the bankrupt bill as it recently came from the senate. It is stated that a majority of the house judiciary committee adhere to their first decision in favor of a total repeal, and will not yield their concurrence to the bill which has passed the senate. They are, however, going through the entire law, scanning every sentence, and will make such thorough work of it that a bill may finally be produced which will be satisfactory to both houses. The involuntary bankruptcy clause will doubtless be repealed, but if the house judiciary committee utterly refuse to change their views, no bankrupt law is likely to pass this session.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MARCH 26, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3 PER ANNUM, in Advance

Liability of Assignee in Bankruptcy to be Sued in the State Courts.

The bankrupt act has given rise to a multitude of vexed questions growing out of conflicts of jurisdiction between the state and federal courts with reference to the possession of the property of insolvent persons, or property seized as belonging to insolvents; and these are continually presenting themselves in new shapes. We are indebted to our correspondent in Boston, Henry N. Sheldon, Ksq., for the following memorandum of the case of Stephen W. Leighton v. J. A. Harwood et al., recently determined in the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in which it is determined that an assignee in bankruptcy, appointed by the federal bankrupt court, is liable to suit in a state court for the tortious taking of property alleged to belong to the bankrupt's estate:

This was an action of replevin. The defendants were assignees in bankruptcy of C. G. Foss, and they seized the replevined property as belonging to the bankrupt's estate. It was proved or admitted at the trial that the defendants took possession of the property by virtue of their assignment in good faith, with reasonable cause to believe it was part of the bankrupt's estate. The defendants contended, first, that they were officers of the federal court and their custody was the custody of the court; that a state court had no jurisdiction and could not take the property from their custody; and, secondly, that under section 14 of the bankrupt act, they were entitled to twenty days' notice before the action could be brought. At the trial before a jury these positions were both overruled by the presiding judge, and a verdict was taken for the plaintiff. The defendant took exceptions which the supreme court has now overruled. The court decide that the assignment is not a precept, and it gave the assignees no color of authority to take property of strangers; that the plaintiff's right of action was not affected by section 14 of the bankrupt act; that the state court has jurisdiction of the action; that the cases relied on by the defendants were mostly cases where property in the hands of a marshal of the United States had been interfered with by a process from the state courts; that his office was different from that of an assignee in bankruptcy and his custody of attached property was of a different character; that the doctrine of these cases should not be extended by analogy; that it is not material that the defendant acted in good faith, and that the bankrupt act did not purport to exempt any person from an action in the state court for a tortious taking of the property of a stranger.

Should Defendants in Criminal Cases be Permitted to Testify?

The recent case of Edward Lange, tried in the United States circuit court at Brooklyn, before Judge BENEDICT, on a charge of stealing government mail bags, calls to mind in a forcible manner the propriety of changing the common law rule of evidence, which prevents the defendant in a criminal prosecution from testifying in his own behalf; and as there is now a bill before congress changing this rule so as to admit such testimony in prosecutions in the federal courts, including courts martial and courts of inquiry, a few observations on the subject may not be inappropriate.

We shall not advert particularly to the facts of the Lange case, further than to say that Mr. Lange was proprietor of an extensive printing establishment, and a gentleman of upright Christian character. The prosecution was commenced at the instance of his discharged coachman, who evidently smarted for revenge against him. This fellow was of course permitted to testify against him; but when Mr. Lange offered to testify and explain the possession of the mail bags and reconcile it with his innocence, the district attorney objected, and he was refused permission to do so. This ruling the Judge was obliged, under the law, to make, although the defendant's testimony would have been admitted in the state courts in New York. (United States v. Hawthorne, 1 Dillon C. C. 422.)

Is this rule of law right? Does it embody the common justice which every citizen has a right to expect in the courts of his country? We cannot avoid expressing a strong conviction that these questions must be answered in the negative. The argument urged in support of the common law rule is that the interest of the prisoner in the result of the prosecution is so strong, and his temptation to commit perjury therefore so great, that his testimony, if admitted, will be of no value in elucidating the truth. It is believed that this reason, on examination, will be found to be of no substantial force. We constantly receive and act upon the testimony of interested witnesses in all the most momentous affairs of life; and what reason can be adduced for holding that a mode of enquiry which is approved of as advantageous for the ascertainment of truth everywhere else, should be dangerous when applied to investigations in a court of justice?

Again, the existing rule of the common law produces the most absurd inequalities, not to say the grossest and most palpable injustice. Thus, the defendant is prohibited from testifying on account of his interest in the result of the prosecution, while at the same time the public prosecutor, who is likewise interested, and sometimes in an equal degree with the defendant, is heard without objection.

The law indemnifies the latter against the payment of costs unless the prosecution is adjudged frivolous or malicious; and in the latter event, he is liable to pay damages in a civil action. In some cases he is an informer who gets a moiety of the fine recovered. It is true that so far as the federal courts are concerned, it has been held by Mr. Justice MILLER that the claimant of property seized for a violation of the internal revenue laws is made by the act of July 2, 1864, a competent witness in his own behalf. Case of 10,000 cigars, 1 Woolw. 123. But cases are no doubt of frequent occurrence, both in the federal and in most of the state courts, where the public prosecutor is permitted to testify although under the impulse of a hope of a large pecuniary reward which will accrue to him in the event of conviction; while the defendant, however irreproachable his previous character may have been, is not allowed to be heard;—an argument that the public is more interested in the conviction of crime than in the acquittal of accused innocence.

Digitized by Google

Again, it is now a rule of evidence in the federal courts and in most of the state courts, that parties in civil suits shall not be prohibited from testifying in their own behalf. Shall a privilege which is allowed a man for the protection of his property be denied for the protection of his life and liberty?

A volume might be composed of cases illustrating the impolicy and hardship of this exclusionary rule of evidence. Let us take two cases, somewhat similar in their circumstances, one occurring in England, the other in this country. In Rex v. Morrison, 8 Car. & P. 21, a man had been shot, and an officer searching for the person supposed to have done the shooting, came to the defendant and said he was searching for a person named Morrison who was reported to have shot a man. The defendant replied, "unfortunately, I am the man." The committing magistrate, who held a preliminary examination of the case, in which the prisoner made a statement of the facts of the transaction, released him on his own recognizance; and afterwards the grand jury ignored a bill of indictment for manslaughter. But he was neverthless tried upon the verdict of the coroner's inquisition, charging him with manslaughter. On the trial he, of course, was not permitted to testify, and his statement made before the committing magistrate, and by him reduced to writing, was not read, because there happened to be no witness present to prove it. The only evidence of guilt adduced against him, then, consisted simply of proof of his admission to the officer that, unfortunately, he was the man that shot the deceased; and it was urged in his behalf, that this admission was entirely consistent with the idea that the killing was accidental, and that the jury ought so to find. But the court ruled otherwise. PARK, J., in summing up, said to the jury: "It is argued that no person was present, and therefore it cannot be said that it was not accidental. I do not agree with that view of the case. Because no person was present, is it to be inferred that the killing was accidental, without any evidence on the part of the prisoner? I say not. The law of England has said (and I wish to call your attention to this as the rule which has been attempted to be violated) the death of man, homicide, as it is called, if it be shown to have been occasioned by the prisoner, will be murder or manslaughter, as the circumstances may turn out, unless it be shown by the prisoner to have been occasioned by accident." The jury, under these instructions, were obliged to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter; but, no doubt, conscious that he had been tried on a part only of the testimony applicable to his case, strongly recommended him to mercy, and he was sentenced to pay a fine of 40 shillings. Now, the declaration of PARK, J., is unquestionably sound law; but how cruel and absurd is that rule which says that, in such a case, no third person being present, the prisoner shall be adjudged guilty of a felonious homicide unless he show by evidence that it was accidental, when the law at the same time disables him from giving any such evidence.

In the other case, that of Silvus v. The State, 22 Ohio State, 90, the killing took place under similar circumstances. The deceased was stabbed in a vital part, no third person being present. From the imperfect report it would seem that the deceased had no weapon. The defendant was tried upon his own testimony in connection with evidence of the surrounding circumstances, and was found guilty of manslaughter. From the statement of the facts proved, it can scarcely be doubted that the verdict was correct. But what would have been the verdict if his testimony had been excluded? The circumstances showing that he did the killing with a deadly weapon, by a stab in a vital part, the law would have presumed—that is to say, the jury would have been obliged to find—that he was guilty of murder in the second degree. (State v. Turner, Wright, Ohio, 20, 28.) In other words, under the Ohio Statute, he was tried upon all the evidence of which the case admitted, and the verdict was probably correct; whereas, under the common law rule of evidence he would have been tried on a part of the evidence taken in connection with a blind and arbitrary presumption, and the verdict would probably have been wrong.

If other examples are needed to illustrate the injustice and impolicy of the rule which prohibits a person charged with crime from testifying in his own defence, take the common case of a prosecution for receiving stolen goods. The rule in England and in most of the American states is that recent possession of the fruits of the larceny is, unexplained, conclusive evidence of guilt per se. 2 East P. C. 656; 2 Russ. Cr. 123; 2 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 742, 743. The prosecution, then, having shown that the goods were stolen, and that they were soon after found in the defendant's possession, a case against him is made out, and the burden shifts upon him to reconcile that possession with his innocence. Now the defendant is, of all others, the person most likely to be in possession of facts which will enable him to do this, and in many cases he is the only person in possession of such facts. The law says, Show your innocence; but you must not do this yourself; you must find some one else to do it for you, and if you can find no such one, you must suffer the penalty.

Similar cases might be multiplied indefinitely, did space permit. We shall, however, content ourselves with referring to Judge APPLETON'S work on evidence, chapter 7, in which the learned author, with the most searching analysis, picks to pieces, thread by thread, the tissue of fallacies by which the rule of the common law we are here considering is supported, and holds the fragments up to ridicule and scorn.

In several of the states, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Kansas and California, defendants in criminal cases are permitted to testify. So they are in Pennsylvania, when the prosecution is for a misdemeanor. It may be added that the tendency of judicial sentiment appears to be in favor of extending this privilege to accused persons. Thus, in Michigan there is a statute permitting the defendant to make a statement not under oath to the jury. It has been ruled by the supreme court of that state that this statement is evidence which may go to counterbalance sworn testimony. Durant v. People, 13 Mich. 351, 355; De Foe v. People, 22 Mich. 224, 226; People v. Jones, 24 Mich. 217, 226. See also Gale v. People, 26 Mich. 157. And the same ruling has been made under a similar statute in Florida. Barber v. State, 13 Fla. 675. For the construction of recent statutes permitting defendants to testify in criminal cases, see 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 782 a, 7th edition.

Since writing the foregoing, we learn from the Chicago Legal News, that under the new criminal code which has just been adopted by the legislature of Illinois, defendants in criminal cases are allowed to testify. The editor of the Legal News thinks the new measure will tend to convict the guilty and acquit the innocent. T.

Digitized by Google

Mortgages in Georgia—Mortgages with Power of Sale—Powers Collateral and Powers Coupled with an Interest—Effect of Bankruptcy of Mortgagor, and Jurisdiction of Bankrupt Court.

IN RE DANIEL P. HILL, BENJAMIN G. LOCKETT v. DANIEL P. HILL THE BANKRUPT AND HIS ASSIGNEE, EDWARD F. HOGE.

United States District Court, Northern District of Georgia, January 29, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN ERSKINE, District Judge.

1. Powers, Collateral or Coupled with an Interest—Expiration of.—A collateral power, although irrevocable, expires with the life or bankruptcy of the appointor; otherwise in case of a power coupled with an interest.

2. ——. Nature of Mortgages in Georgia—Mortgages with Power of Sale.—In Georgia a mortgage is merely a security for debt, and passes no title, estate or interest to the mortgagee. Therefore a power of sale in a mortgage is not, in Georgia, a power coupled with an interest, but is merely a collateral power.

3. ——. ——. Execution of Power of Sale—Bankruptcy of Mortgagor.—It follows that, in Georgia, a power of sale contained in a mortgage cannot be executed after the mortgagor has been adjudged a bankrupt.

4. Mortgages with Power of Sale—Possession of Mortgagee—Fractions of a Day.—Courts will regard fractions of a day when it is necessary to ascertain which of two events first happened. Thus, where a power to sell mortgaged premises was made to the mortgagee, and a lease of the mortgaged premises to a third person was made at the same time, which lease was referred to in the power, the court noticed the fact that the lease was executed previously to the power, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the mortgagee had been actually put in possession of the mortgaged premises or not.

5. ——. ——. If a mortgagee acquire possession of real property after the expiration of a lease made by the mortgagor to a third person, and there is no evidence that the property was rented to him by the mortgagor, he will, in Georgia, be a mere tenant at will or at sufferance.

6. ——. Possession of Mortgagee as Tenant at Sufferance.—The possession by a mortgagee of the mortgaged premises as tenant at will or at sufferance, is not a possession of such dignity as will, in connection with a power of sale granted to the mortgagee, create a power coupled with an interest.

7. ——. Execution of Power of Sale where there is a Limit as to Time.—Where the power granted to a mortgagee to sell the mortgaged premises is limited to a specified time, if the mortgagee fail to execute it within that time, the power is forever gone.

8. ——. Execution by Mortgagee of Power to Sell—Mortgagee cannot become Purchaser.—A mortgagee with a power to sell cannot himself become the purchaser, either in severalty, joint tenancy or otherwise. The relations of vendor and vendee cannot thus be united in the same person. Thus, where a mortgage with power of sale was made to an individual, he could not execute the same by selling the mortgaged property to a firm of which he was a member.

9. ——. Mortgagee with Power to Sell, a Trustee.—A mortgagee with power to sell is, in Georgia, a trustee for the mortgagor, his heirs, etc., and as such is accountable in equity; and this, although the power may not be regarded as collateral, but as coupled with an interest.

10. ——. ——. Bankruptcy of Mortgagor—Jurisdiction of Bankrupt Court.—This relation of trustee is not discharged by the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, but, upon the happening of such event, the trustee can no longer be held to account in a state court. The courts of bankruptcy possess a broad and comprehensive authority, sufficiently extensive to enable them, in such cases, to entertain jurisdiction over the rights of the parties, to take possession of the mortgaged property and administer in accordance with the bankrupt law.

Mr. Ely, for Lockett, the mortgagee and complainant; Mr. Hoge, the assignee, in propria persona, and Mr. Culberson and Mr. Conley, for both defendants.

ERSKINE, J.—This suit arises out of a mortgage given by Hill, in January, 1871, to Lockett. The bill states that Hill being indebted to Rust, Johnson & Co. (of which firm Lockett was a member), and in settlement and liquidation thereof, drew his draft on Burt, Johnson & Co., payable to his own order, for $7,451.75, and it was accepted by them and transferred to Lockett; and to secure its payment and in consideration of supplies and money, and to discharge a certain draft in favor of Ketchum & Hartridge, Hill executed the mortgage to Lockett on 1,625 acres of land and certain personal property, and which mortgage contained, among other stipulations, a power to sell the land on non-payment.

Lockett also alleges that he was placed in possession of the property, real and personal, on the 20th of December, 1871, and continued in possession until he conveyed the land under his power, on the 13th of December, 1873, for $4,875, to the firm (of which he was then a member) of Rust, Johnson & Co., and that he is still in possession of the personal property.

He prays an injunction against Hoge, the assignee, to restrain him from selling any of the personal property, or interfering with any of the mortgaged property, real or personal; and asks for a subpœna against both Hill, the bankrupt, and Hoge; and the bill prays for "other and further relief."

There is an addendum to the bill—an offer to take the property at a fair valuation to be determined by the court, or to sell the personal property by virtue of his power, and account to the assignee for any surplus; or to surrender the property upon payment of his debt.

The conveyance in mortgage from Hill, the bankrupt, to Lockett, the mortgagee and complainant, was executed on the 16th of January, 1871, by which he conveyed to Lockett a plantation in Dougherty county, in this state, containing sixteen hundred and twenty-five acres, also certain personal property on the land consisting of fourteen mules, all the stock of hogs, cattle, etc., wagons, carts and farming implements, and likewise the crops of corn, cotton and fodder to be raised on the place during the said year 1871; provided, nevertheless, if Hill shall pay on or before the 1st day of October, 1871, a certain draft accepted by one Rust & Son, and all advances so made during the year for provisions, and shall save Lockett harmless on the Ketchum & Hartridge draft, and all costs, expenses and fees, then the deed to be void, else of full force. The mortgage further stipulates that if Hill shall fail to pay the draft accepted by Rust & Son, at the time and in the manner specified, and also the advances for the present year, then Rust & Son or Lockett shall have the right to foreclose said lien or mortgage on the growing crops and other personal property, in accordance with the statutes of this state. As to the real estate, it is further agreed that Lockett shall have the right to foreclose this mortgage upon the same, or to sell said plantation upon the most favorable terms practicable, either at public sale to the highest bidder, or at private sale, and to account to Hill, after paying off said debts, for the balance; and Hill constitutes and appoints Lockett his attorney in fact, ratifying his acts and doings in the premises, provided, nevertheless, that this power of attorney to convey and make titles shall not operate until after the first day of October next, 1871.

On the 20th of December, 1871, Hill and Lockett entered into a written agreement, under seal, reciting that Hill being indebted to Lockett in a large amount, and to secure the debt, as well as for other purposes, he, on the 16th of January, 1871, executed to Lockett a mortgage to certain property, real and personal, and being still indebted to Lockett in the sum of six thousand seven hundred and thirty-three dollars twenty-three cents with interest from the 1st of December, 1871, at the agreed rate of ten per cent. from said 1st of December until paid; and that, by said mortgage, Lockett had the right to sell the land therein conveyed, but the present not being considered a judicious time to make the sale, it is agreed that Lockett shall take possession of said property, real and personal, and shall have the right to rent the plantation and the personal property in terms this day agreed upon between Lockett and one John La Roque, and that the rent shall be applied to the extinguishment of the debt due by Hill to Lockett; and that during the ensuing year (1872) Lockett shall have the right to sell all of the property, both real and personal, mentioned in said mortgage, consisting of the lands mentioned in the mortgage and personal property this day turned over to La Roque, and apply the proceeds, firstly, to the balance due on the debt above mentioned in this agreement, and secondly, to the payment of the Ketchum & Hartridge draft (provided this draft has to be paid), and Lockett is appointed attorney in fact for Hill, with full power and authority to act as his attorney in fact and to make all needful conveyances.

Digitized by Google

On the 24th October, 1873, Hill wrote Lockett that as he was unable to pay him, he might take all the stock, etc., on the land ("all of which is mortgaged to you") at a fair valuation, and credit the same on the debts. There is no evidence that this offer was accepted or rejected. Much was said during the argument as to whether Lockett ever took actual possession of the land and personal property. The evidence read is conflicting. It was, however, agreed by the instrument of December 20, 1871, that Lockett "shall take possession of the said property, real and personal, and shall have the right to rent and hire," etc. By a writing dated December 20, 1871, Lockett rented the "plantation of D. P. Hill," and the personal property thereon, for the year 1872, to La Roque for forty bales of cotton, to be raised on the place and delivered to him. One Blake filed an affidavit stating that he rented the plantation from Lockett for 1873, and paid him the rent, and regarded Lockett as the lawful owner and posssesor of said plantation, and held the same as his tenant, and upon delivering the possession to Lockett, he put one White in possession. But he does not positively state that Lockett was at any time in actual possession of the land, and he makes no mention whatever of the personal property. Mr. Ely, solicitor and counsel for Lockett in this cause, swears that he was present on the plantation of D. P. Hill on the 20th December, 1871, and that in his presence Hill delivered the possession of the plantation to Lockett, and all the personal property thereon. The bankrupt, in his answer, read as an affidavit, denies that he ever, at any time, turned over the possession of the plantation and personal property to Lockett, but simply authorized him to exercise a supervisory control over the same, in order to protect and further defendant's interests in the way of making crops. He also denies that Lockett rented out the property for 1872 or 1873, but, on the contrary, he says that he rented out the plantation, stock, etc., etc., to La Roque for forty bales of cotton for the rent; but intending that Lockett should have the rents and profits, he caused La Roque to execute the contract with Lockett instead of with himself. He further says that Lockett never gave him (Hill) leave to rent the place for 1873 to Blake, as his (Lockett's) agent; but that he himself rented it to L. Blake, without obtaining the consent of any one, except that of Blake; but let Lockett collect and retain the rents due by Blake for 1873.

On the 3d of December, 1873, Hill filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was adjudged a bankrupt by Register Black. On the 9th Lockett was, on petition of the bankrupt, restrained from selling the mules, wagons, etc., enumerated in the mortgage; and Edward F. Hoge was appointed assignee of Hill on the 20th; but on the 13th, intermediate the filing the petition in bankruptcy and the appointment of the assignee, Lockett sold the land, in fee, to Rust, Johnson & Co. (the mortgagee himself being the company), for $4,875, by a warranty deed, executed in the name of Hill, the mortgagor and bankrupt; the deed of conveyance is signed and sealed as follows: "D. P. Hill, [L. s.] by B. G. Lockett, attorney in fact." Hill, in his answer, swears that this land cost him $16,225 before the war. On the 2d of January, 1874, Lockett instituted the present suit, and by consent, the court granted an order restraining the assignee from selling the personal property until argument could be had on the prayer for injunction, etc. Lockett, by counsel, insisted that by virtue of the power of sale inserted in the mortgage of January 16, 1871, and in the power of sale in the agreement of December 20, 1871, and by the power of attorney contained in each of these instruments, appointing him attorney in fact to sell, convey and make all needful conveyances, and by the authority given him in the latter instrument to take possession of all the mortgaged property, real and personal, he had a power coupled with an interest, and therefore a perfect right to convey the fee as he had done, and authority to make an absolute sale of the personal property notwithstanding Hill was then a declared bankrupt; and that no part of this property, real or personal, is assets of the bankrupt's estate.

On the part of the assignee it was contended that all said real and personal property is assets of Hill's estate, and that it passed to him by deed of assignment for distribution among the creditors of the bankrupt, under the bankrupt act of 1867 and its amendments.

And for the bankrupt it was urged that he, being the head of a family, is under the first section of the seventh article of the state constitution of 1868, and the state law of the same year (Code, section 2002), entitled to a homestead in said mortgaged land to the value of $2,000 in specie, and exemption in the personal property to the value of $1,000 in specie.

It is a rule too well settled to need the citation of authorities, that a collateral power, although in many instances irrevocable by the principal, expires with his life or bankruptcy, but it is otherwise when the authority or power is coupled with an interest; for in the latter case it is not extinguished by the death or bankruptcy of the appointor; it survives and may, as a general rule, be executed in the name of the person in whom it was placed. Venerable authority on questions of this nature says that if a person clothed with a power hath at the same time an estate in the land, the power is not collateral because it savors of the land. Hardres, 415. And the Supreme Court of the United States, by Chief Justice MARSHALL, in Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 175, said: "What is meant by the expression 'a power coupled with an interest?' Is it an interest in the subject on which the power is to be exercised, or is it an interest in that which is produced by the exercise of the power? We hold it to be clear that the interest which can protect a power after the death of a person who creates it must be an interest in the thing itself. In other words, the power must be engrafted on an estate in the thing."

Does the power now in question answer the definition given in Hardres, or the equally accurate description given by the Supreme Court? Had Lockett, at the time when the power was executed, a vested interest or estate in the mortgaged property? Was the power conferred conjoined with an estate, held by Lockett, in the thing itself? "A mortgage in this state is only a security for a debt, and passes no title" Code, 1954. Avoiding unessential matters as far as may be, and matters collateral to the questions for decision, I will quote from or refer to the construction given to this statute by the state supreme court, as found in the Reports. In Davis v. Anderson, 1 Kelly, 176, WARNER, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said that "a mortgage in this state is nothing more than a security for the payment of the debt; and the title to the mortgaged property remains in the mortgagor until foreclosure and sale, in a manner pointed out by the statute." * * * * "Under our law the legal title to the mortgaged property remains in the mortgagor until after foreclosure and sale." And the interpretation given by that learned judge has been followed from that day to this. See the Reports, passim. In Scott v. v. Warren, 21 Ga. 408, MCDONALD, J., said: "In England and in some of the states of the Union, when the condition is broken, the estate is so absolutely vested in the mortgagee that he may maintain ejectment and recover the premises. This is not the case here. In this state a mortgage in its inception is nothing more than a security for the payment of money, and it so continues to be, and nothing more, after the breach of the condition; therefore, creates a lien only, and not an estate." And this court, in The United States v. The Athens Armory, 35 Georgia, 344, said: "A mortgage in Georgia is only a security for the debt; the title to the property remains in the mortgagor." This is fully settled as a rule of property by a series of state adjudications, and when such is the case the federal courts adopt the decisions of the state courts.

Digitized by Google

It has been nearly a century and a half, if my researches are correct, since powers of sale, in conveyances in mortgage, were first known to the courts in England. And notwithstanding their validity has been supported in courts of equity, and they have at least impliedly become a part of the jurisprudence of that country, yet as late as 1825, Lord Chancellor ELDON, in Roberts v. Bozan, mentioned in 1 Pow. on Mortg. 9, 13, characterized them as extraordinary and of a dangerous nature.

The first reported case in our own country, which I have been able to find on this subject, is Bergen v. Bennett, 1 Caines' Cases in Error, 19. This is a bill to redeem on the ground that the power to sell, contained in the conveyance in mortgage, became extinct on the death of the mortgagor. The court for the correction of errors held that the authority to sell was a power coupled with an interest, and dismissed the bill. I will quote portions of the language used by KENT, J., who gave the opinion of the court, and which embody the principal reasons for holding that the power in the mortgage was a power coupled with an interest: "But when power is given to a person who derives under the instrument creating the power, or otherwise, a present or future interest in the land, it is then a power relating to the land. * * The power now in question answers exactly to this definition" (Hardres, 415) "of a power with an interest, because the mortgagee has, at the same time, a vested estate in the land, and it does not answer at all to the definition of a power simply collateral; for that is but a bare authority to a stranger, who has not, and never had, any estate whatever."

Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cowen, 195. This was also a bill to redeem. It was held by the court, as had previously been done in Bergen v. Bennett, and Wilson v. Troup, 7 Johns. C. R. 25, that a power of sale contained in a mortgage is a power with an interest. And the court of errors intimated the opinion that a power of sale inserted in a mortgage was in the nature of a power appendant to the land. A power appendant is where a person has an estate in the land, and the estate to be created by the power is to, or may, take effect in possession during the continuance of the estate to which the power is annexed; as a power to tenant for life, in possession to make leases. Co. Litt. 342 b. n. 298 H. & B. And SUTHERLAND, J., in Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cowen 195, said: "Now, the power of the mortgagee to sell is a power to create or acquire to himself the equitable estate in the land during the continuance of the legal estate conveyed to him by the mortgage."

The validity of the clause of a power of sale inserted in a mortgage has been, as already remarked, established in the courts of chancery at Westminster (Coote on Mortgage, 128 et seq.) and also in New York, and indeed in nearly all the states. In New York and in other states the mode of enforcing these power-of-sale-mortgages is in a greater or less degree guarded by statutes, against irregularity and abuse. Such enactments are highly commendable, for it may be borne in mind that the mortgagee holds the antagonistic and anomalous position of creditor and trustee united in himself, and it must often transpire that the time, the place and the manner of selling will present questions of difficulty and importance to the parties. In New York, for example, there must be six months' notice in the public Gazette before the mortgagee can sell under the power of sale. See Jackson v. Lawson, 17 Johns. 300.

With these remarks, I will proceed to ascertain whether, under the statute law of this state, and the construction which it has uniformly received by the state supreme court, a power of sale contained in a conveyance in mortgage, executed in this state, is a power coupled with an interest. Directing attention to the cases which have been cited on the subject of a power of sale in a conveyance in mortgage, it will readily be perceived that the decisions of the courts of England and New York, founded on the legal fact that to create a power combined with an interest, the donee must have at the time of the creation of the power a vested estate in the land or thing. Such power may be classed as an appendancy, and the power must have an estate to conjoin with and nourish it. When this is not the case, the power is simply collateral and ends, at farthest, with the life or bankruptcy of the donor.

In England and in several of the states, including New York (and in the latter state at least when the decisions above noted were made), ejectment may be maintained by the mortgagee against the mortgagor on his failure to pay the money at the time stipulated. Whereas, in Georgia, no ejectment or other possessory action on breach of the condition by the mortgagor has been recognized as a part of its jurisprudence. The rule of evidence is that the plaintiff in ejectment must succeed, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not on the infirmity of the claim of the defendant. So, too, the claimant, to support his action of ejectment, must be clothed with the legal title to the lands. In Reed v. Shepley, 6 Vermont, 502, it was resolved that in an ejectment a mortgagor cannot dispute the title of the mortgagee. Thus, in England and in New York and other states of the Union, upon the delivery of the ordinary conveyance in mortgage, an estate or interest passes to and vests in the mortgagee, and such estate being then vested in him, it is sufficient, in law, upon which to raise a power coupled with an interest; and the estate or interest in the land or thing being in the mortgagee at the time he is clothed with the authority, the estate supports the power and they stand united.

So far as my information extends, the common law doctrine, even in its modern and modified form, in relation to conveyances in mortgage, has never met the sanction of the supreme court of this state. Here the rights of parties to these securities for debts, from beginning to end, are regulated and enforced solely by the principles of equity; the very language of the statute is the rule in equity. "A mortgage," says the Code, sec. 1954, "in this state is only a security for a debt and passes no title." As already observed, the state supreme court, in Davis v. Anderson, said that the title remains in the mortgagor until foreclosure and sale in the manner pointed out by the statute. And MCDONALD, J., in Scott v. Warren, said: "Here a mortgage in its inception is nothing more than a security for the payment of the money, and it so continues to be, and nothing more, after the breach of the condition. The mortgage therefore creates a lien only and not an estate; and the mortgagee in relation to the mortgaged property stands on the same footing as any other creditor." And this view of the law of mortgages in Georgia was approved by LUMPKIN, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Elfe v. Cole, 26 Georgia, 197.

Numerous other cases, containing like views, might be cited; but it is deemed unnecessary to do so. Counsel for complainant read the case of Robenson v. Vason et al., 37 Ga. 66, as affirming and adopting as a rule of decision the doctrine of the courts in Westminster and New York. In Robenson v. Vason et al., the main question before the court was whether an injunction which had been granted at the instance of the mortgagor to restrain an innocent assignee of the notes and mortgage from selling the property under a power of sale, given to the mortgagee, his heirs and assigns, was properly dissolved. WARNER, C. J., for the court, held that it was. The chief justice, in the latter part of his opinion, said: "As a general proposition the power to mortgage would seem to include in it a power to authorize the mortgagee to sell in default of payment. William v. Troup, 7 Johns. 32. In this case there is an express power given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee or his assigns to sell the mortgaged property on default of payment upon giving thirty days' notice." I have perused the extended statement of the case made by the reporter, and have not discovered one word in it, nor in the opinion of Chief Justice WARNER, which says or indicates, in the remotest manner, that the authority to sell was a power connected with an interest, and I respectfully hazzard the remark that under the facts of that case, as they appear in the report, it could not be a point for decision. The mortgagor was before the court propria persona, and not a declared bankrupt. But notwithstanding the power from the mortgagor to the mortgagee and his assigns was not coupled with an interest, yet it may have been, and probably was, given for a valuable consideration, and consequently, in contemplation of law, irrevocable, but would cease with the life or bankruptcy of the mortgagor. Walsh v. Whitcomb, 2 Esp. 565; Hunt v. Rousmanier, supra. "These powers are not ordinary powers operating by means of limitation or use, but trusts declared on the legal estate in the mortgagee." Hilliard on Mortgages, 138, 3d edition.

Digitized by Google

I am of opinion that the power of sale contained in the mortgage, or that inserted in the agreement of December 20, 1871, was not in either instance, under the statute laws of this state, or the decisions of the state supreme court, that power which is known in legal language as a "power coupled with an interest."

Adverting to the synopsis of the bill, etc., in a former part of this opinion, in which is embodied the substance of the mortgage of January 16, 1871, and agreement of December 20, 1871, it will be seen that the authority to foreclose, as to the personal property, on default of payment was given to Rust & Son or to Lockett; and the power to foreclose, as to the land, or to sell it if the condition was broken, was given to Lockett.

It will be remembered that the mortgage conferred no power to sell the personal property; that authority was given by the agreement. If the authority inserted in the mortgage was a power combined with an interest, it must have been based upon a vested estate in Lockett. He did not foreclose the mortgage upon either the personal or real property, or sell the land after the first of October, 1871 (and which act a proviso in the mortgage authorized him to do if Hill did not pay the money at the time appointed), or before the 20th of December, 1871, on which day the "agreement" was executed. This instrument says Lockett shall take possession of the land and personal property mentioned in the mortgage and rent the same to La Roque "on terms this day agreed upon between Lockett and La Roque," and it is also stipulated that Lockett "shall have the right during the ensuing year (1872) to sell all of the real and personal property this day turned over to La Roque."

If the power in the mortgage to sell the land after the first of October, should the debts not then be paid, was a power linked with an interest, re-granting it by the agreement of December 20, 1871, was notional and superfluous, unless it had previously become extinct by efflux of time or otherwise, and the language of the agreement does seem to indicate that it had at that period been extinguished. As just mentioned, it is provided in the agreement that Lockett shall take possession of the mortgaged property, real and personal, and rent and hire the same to La Roque, and Lockett is given the right, during the ensuing year, to sell all of said land and personal property.

Courts disregard fractions or divisions of a day unless it be necessary to ascertain which of two events first happened. And I think it is proper to apply the exception here. It is plain, from the language used in the agreement, that Lockett, before the execution of the agreement, had agreed to rent and hire the mortgaged property to La Roque, and that it had been turned over to him—transferred; these were accomplished facts, effected anterior in time to the delivery of the agreement, though done on the same day. The words are not that Lockett is in possession, but that he shall take possession, etc. In the contract of lease for the mortgaged property made between Lockett and La Roque, it is rented for the ensuing year, 1872, as the "plantation of D. P. Hill." La Roque acknowledges himself as the tenant of Lockett, and signs the lease; Lockett does not sign it. Ely, in his affidavit, says that Hill, on the 20th of December, 1871, delivered the possession of the plantation and all the personal property thereon to Lockett. Hill swears that he never did turn over the possession to Lockett. If the possession was turned over to Lockett on that day—and I express no opinion on the weight of the evidence—the conclusion is that it must have been subsequent, in time, to the execution of the agreement, and consequently after the property had been turned over to La Roque, the lessee. The agreement provides that "Lockett shall have the right during the ensuing year" (1872) "to sell all the real and personal property this day turned over to La Roque." And Hill bestows on Lockett full power to act as his attorney, and to make all needful conveyances. No time was specified in the agreement for the termination of the possession; therefore the law of this state construes it to be for a calendar year. Code, sec. 2290. The agreement, as mentioned already, gave him the right during the ensuing year to sell all the real and personal property turned over to La Roque. This power he did not execute during 1872. And, as he must have known the certainty of his own term, he ought to have availed himself of his power to sell the property indicated in the agreement during its continuance; and whether the right to sell within the time named was a naked authority, revocable at the pleasure of the principal, or was a power irrevocable by the grantor, and consequently current until his bankruptcy, or a power coupled with an interest, is here an enquiry of no legal consequence. The right to sell the entire property during the ensuing year was suspended by Lockett beyond the limitation clause in the agreement, and being once suspended by his own voluntary act, it is, in my judgment, gone forever. But as the power of sale was merely cumulative, it would not bar a foreclosure. Turbish v. Sears, 2 Cliff. 454. "If a man grant all his trees to be taken within five years, the grantee cannot take any after the expiration of five years; for this is in the nature of a condition annexed to the grant." Moore, 882.

Lockett alleges that Hill, as his agent, rented the property to Blake for the year 1873. Hill says he rented it to Blake himself, but allowed Lockett to receive the rent, to be applied in discharge of the debt due him. Blake avers that he rented the plantation from Lockett for 1873, paid him the rent and surrendered the place to him, and he put White in possession. Lockett says he has been in possession of all the mortgaged property from the 20th December, 1871, until he sold the land, shortly after the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, and is still (2d January, 1874) in possession of the personal property. Let it be conceded that Lockett was in possession, though there is no evidence in the record that Hill rented him the property for 1873, so then he must have been in as a tenant at will or at sufferance. The possession as a tenant at will, or at sufferance, would not be of that dignity and nature which could be engrafted on a power in a mortgage in fee so as to make it a power coupled with an interest; it would not bring the power within the definition given in Hardres, or by Chief Justice MARSHALL, of a power coupled with an interest.

If the power of sale given to Lockett was what I have ruled it to be, a collateral power, then it became extinct, at farthest, on the bankruptcy of Hill, nine or ten days prior to the sale of the land by Lockett. But if it was really a power united with an interest, then it survived his bankruptcy, and Lockett could (were it not for reasons which will be explained presently) have conveyed the property in his own name, but not, as he adventured to do, in the name of Hill, who was at the time civiliter mortuus—at least he was incapable in law to execute a deed of conveyance. And assuming the power conferred to be of the latter kind, still Lockett could not purchase this land himself, either in severalty, joint tenancy, or otherwise; he could not be vendor and vendee; the characters are inconsistent. Michoud et al. v. Girod et al., 4 Howard, 502; Griffin v. Marine Company, 52 Ill. 130.

The remaining question which I shall now consider—and it is a question of importance in this case—springs from the record. Let the fact be yielded that the power granted by Hill, the mortgagor, to Lockett, the mortgagee, was a power connected with an interest, and consequently not revoked by the bankruptcy of Hill, nor shall I presume it to have been lost previously by the laches of Lockett, the donee, in not selling the property within the time limited, could he, by virtue of such power of sale, convey the land to himself or any one else after Hill had been adjudged a bankrupt under the provisions of the bankrupt act of 1867, unless the sale was made by the order and authority of this court? Now, although Lockett may have, by a clause in the mortgage or agreement, received a power coupled with an interest, yet, after all, he would be but a trustee for Hill, the mortgagor, his heirs or assigns; for neither the mortgage, the agreement, nor the power (even if coupled with interest) invested him with an absolute and indefeasible estate in the property which is the subject of this controversy; and as agent or trustee for the mortgagor, his heirs, etc., a court of chancery could compel him to account for the rents and other fruits of the mortgaged property. Did the bankruptcy of Hill discharge or in any manner lessen the responsibility of Lockett as trustee? Surely not. True, when Hill became a bankrupt, Lockett was no longer liable to account directly to him; for the moment he filed his petition in this court under the bankrupt act, all his estate, of every kind and description, in possession or in action, came by the mere operation of the bankrupt law into the possession of this court, and under its immediate control; and no state court, nor person, can interfere with the possession except by permission of this court. In re Steadman, 8 N. B. R. 319. It is declared by the first section of the bankrupt act, that the jurisdiction of the United States district courts, acting as courts of bankruptcy, shall extend "to all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon; to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties; and to the marshaling and disposition of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties and due distribution of the assets among all the creditors." Thus it will be seen that the congress of the United States has conferred on the bankruptcy courts a broad and comprehensive authority, sufficiently extensive for this court to entertain jurisdiction over the respective rights of the parties in and to the property, real and personal, which was mortgaged by Hill to Lockett, and to cause it to be administered in accordance with the bankrupt law.

Digitized by Google

Hill, the bankrupt, appears on the face of the bill as a party defendant; but whether he is a proper party need not now be enquired into; he appeared and responded to the allegations and charges in the bill.

The prayer for the writ of injunction is refused; and the order previously granted restraining the assignee from selling the personal property is hereby set aside.

ORDERED ACCORDINGLY.

Railway-Aid Bonds—Effect of Railway Consolidation.

GEORGE NUGENT v. THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF PUTNAM COUNTY.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 620, October Term, 1873.

1. Railway Consolidation—Bonds—Case in Judgment.—A county under legislative authority voted to subscribe for stock in a railroad company, to be paid for in its bonds; the county officers agreed to make the subscription, and the company accepted it; negotiable bonds of the company, payable to the company or bearer, were made, but before they were delivered the company consolidated with another company in pursuance of a law in force when the subscription was voted, and subsequent to the consolidation the county received certificates of stock in the new company, and delivered to the new company bonds payable to the company to which the bonds were voted or to the bearer: Held, that the plaintiff, a bona fide holder, could recover.

2. Effect of the Consolidation on the liability of the subscription for stock considered.

3. Cases Criticised.—Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, and Clearweather v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, distinguished.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

We think the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's replication. The bonds to which the coupons in suit were attached purport to have been made and issued by the order of the board of supervisors of Putnam county, in payment of the county's subscription to the capital stock of the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company. They are made payable to that company or bearer, and the plaintiff is a bona fide holder of the coupons, having paid value for them without notice of any defence. If, then, the bonds are valid obligations, if they were rightfully issued, the right of the plaintiff to a judgment against the county is plain. The material facts relating to their issue, as gathered from the pleadings, may be concisely stated as follows: The Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company was a corporation existing in Illinois under a special charter, and it was authorized to construct and maintain a railroad from the eastern line of the state to Bureau Junction. It had liberty to increase its stock to such an amount as might be necessary to complete its road. At the same time the county of Putnam was empowered, by a general law of the state, to subscribe for the stock of the company, and to issue its bonds in payment of its subscription. In attempted exercise of the power thus conferred, the board of supervisors of the county, on the 4th day of June, 1869, ordered an election to be held to determine whether the county should subscribe for stock of the railroad company to the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars, to be paid for with the bonds of the county, provided the railroad should be so located and constructed through, or within one half mile of, the town of Hennepin. The election was held, and it resulted in favor of the subscription. On the 4th day of January, 1870, another election was ordered to determine whether the county would subscribe for twenty-five thousand dollars more of the stock, to be paid in the same manner, and with a similar provision respecting the location of the road. This subscription was also sanctioned by the popular vote. On the 24th day of September, 1869, the railroad company accepted the $75,000 subscription, and on the 27th of October next following, gave notice of the acceptance to the board of supervisors of the county. This notice was put upon record, and on the same day the board of supervisors adopted a resolution that the subscription was thereby made for the building of the railroad, and directed the clerk of the county court to execute and deliver the bonds on behalf of the county. The resolution also declared that the bonds should be issued on the written order of a committee appointed to protect the interests of the county; that they should not be issued until the railroad company had made a bona fide contract with responsible parties for all necessary iron for their road, nor until the company should have made a bona fide contract with responsible parties for laying the iron and operating the road through the county, as specified in a previous order of the board. On the 15th day of March, 1870, the second subscription for $25,000 was made in a similar manner and with like directions.

That thus the county became, in effect, a subscriber to the capital stock of the railroad company, and liable for the sums designated, admits of no serious question. The fact that no subscription was formally made upon the books of the company is quite immaterial. In The Justices of Clarke County v. The Paris, Kentucky River and Winchester Turnpike Company, 11 B. Monroe, Kentucky Reports, 143, it was ruled that an order of the county court, by which it was said that it subscribed for a specified number of shares of road stock, was binding, the court having authority to make a subscription. In this case there was more. There was not only the resolution declaring the subscription made, but there was an acceptance by the railroad company and notice of the acceptance. The minds of the parties came together. Both understood that a contract was made, and had nothing subsequently occurred to change their relations, the county could have enforced the delivery of the stock, and the company could have compelled the delivery to itself of the bonds, on performance of the conditions stipulated. So the parties regarded their relations to each other. The bonds were delivered. The committee appointed by the board of supervisors to protect the interests of the county, under whose direction the bonds were ordered to be issued, were satisfied that all the prescribed conditions precedent to their delivery had been complied with, and so they decided. The county accepted the position of a stockholder, received certificates for the stock subscribed, voted as a stockholder, and proceeded to levy a tax to pay the interest falling due on the bonds. Were this all of the case, the validity of the bonds, and of their accompanying coupons, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, would be beyond doubt.

Digitized by Google

The circuit court, however, was of opinion, and so decided, that the bonds are invalid, because before their delivery the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company had become consolidated with the Plymouth, Kankakee and Pacific Railroad Company, another corporation. The facts of this part of the case, as set forth in the pleadings, are as follows: On the 12th of January, 1870, a company was organized under the laws of Indiana, for the purpose of building a railroad from Plymouth, Indiana, to the east line of the state of Illinois, at some point to be selected in the direction of Momence and Kankakee, with a view to connection with some railroad leading westward. Its corporate name was the Plymouth, Kankakee and Pacific Railroad Company. With this corporation, on the 21st day of October, 1870, the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company became consolidated, taking the name of the former. The consolidation was authorized by the general laws of the two states, and by a section in the special charter of the latter company. No claim is made that it was not legally effected. The result necessarily was that the consolidated company succeeded to all the rights, property and privileges which belonged to each of the two companies out of which it was formed, before their consolidation. It was not until after this had taken place that the county bonds were handed over and sold, and it was certificates of the stock of the consolidated company which the county received.

What, then, was the legal effect of the consolidation? Did it release the county from its prior assumption to take stock in the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company and give its bonds in payment? or did it render unauthorized the subsequent delivery of the bonds, and make them invalid even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser? These are the only questions presented by the record that need discussion.

It must be conceded, as a general rule, that a subscriber to the stock of a railroad company is released from obligation to pay his subscription by a fundamental alteration of the charter. The reason of the rule is evident. A subscription is always presumed to have been made in view of the main design of the corporation and of the arrangements made for its accomplishment. A radical change in the organization or purposes of the company may, therefore, take away the motive which induced the subscription, as well as affect injuriously the consideration of the contract. For this reason it is held that such a change exonerates a subscriber from liability for his subscription; or, if the contract has been executed, justifies a stockholder in resorting to a court of equity to restrain the company from applying the funds of the original organization to any project not contemplated by it. But while this is true as a general rule, it has no applicability to a case like the present. The consolidation of the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company with another company was no departure from its original design. The general statute of the state, approved February 28, 1854, authorized all railroad companies then organized, or thereafter to be organized, to consolidate their property and stock with each other, and with companies out of the state, whenever their lines connect with the lines of such companies out of the state. The act further declared that the consolidated company should have all the powers, franchises and immunities which the consolidating companies respectively had before their consolidation. Nor is this all. The special charter of the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company contained in its 11th section an express grant to the company of authority to unite or consolidate its railroad with any other railroad or railroads then constructed or that might thereafter be constructed within the state, or any other state, which might cross or intersect the same, or be built along the line thereof, upon such terms as might be mutually agreed upon between said company and any other company. It was, therefore, contemplated by the legislature, as it must have been by all the subscribers to the stock of the company, that precisely what has occurred might occur. Subscribers must be presumed to have known the law of the state. and to have contracted in view of it. When the voters of the county of Putnam sanctioned a county subscription by their vote, and when the board of supervisors, in pursuance of that sanction, resolved to make the subscription, they were informed by the law of the state that a consolidation with another company might be made, that the stock they proposed to subscribe might be converted into stock of the consolidated company, and that the liability they assumed might become owing to that company. With this knowledge and in view of such contingencies they made the contract. The consolidation, therefore, wrought no change in the organization or design of the company to which they subscribed, other than they contemplated at the time as possible and legitimate. It cannot be said that any motive for their subscription has been taken away, or that the consideration for it has failed. Hence the reason of the general rule we have conceded does not exist in this case, and, consequently, the rule is inapplicable.

In a multitude of cases decided in England and in this country it has been determined that a subscriber for the stock of a company is not released from his engagement to take it and pay for it by any alteration of the organization or purposes of the company which, at the time the subscription was made, were authorized either by the general law or by the special charter, and a clear distinction is recognized between the effect of such alterations and the effect of those made under legislation subsequent to the contract of subscription. In The Cork & Youghal Railway Company v. Patterson, 37 Eng. Law & Eq. 398, which was an action to recover a call of one pound per share on one hundred shares subscribed, it appeared that the defendant was one of the subscribers to the agreement for the Cork, Middleton and Youghal Railway Company. That agreement authorized the provisional directors to extend the purposes of the organization, to change the termini of the road, and to amalgamate with other companies. The subscribers' agreement for the Cork and Waterford Railroad Company contained similar provisions. After the defendant's subscription was made the two companies executed a deed of amalgamation, without any other assent of the defendant than his signature to the subscriber's agreement for the first-named company. Upon this state of facts all the judges held that he remained liable on his subscription. Its effect was said by Chief Justice JERVIS to be an authority to the company to tack his subscription to anything else they might see fit, and thus make him a subscriber to that; and therefore, added the judge, by signing the Cork and Youghal he afforded an authority to the directors to apply his signature to the Cork and Waterford, and so make him a subscriber to that. To the same effect are the cases of Nixon v. Brownlow and Nixon v. Green, 3 Hurl. & Norman, 686. The American authorities are equally explicit. They uniformly assert that the subscriber for stock is released from his subscription by a subsequent alteration of the organization or purposes of the company only when such alteration is both fundamental and not provided for or contemplated by either the charter itself or the general laws of the state. In Sparrow v. The Evansville and Crawford Railroad Company, 7 Porter, Ind. 369, where it appeared that after a public act had taken effect authorizing the consolidation of the charters of two railroad companies, the defendant had subscribed for shares in one of them, and a consolidation was afterwards made, he was held liable to the consolidated company for his subscription, and this though the consolidation took place without his knowledge or consent. The same doctrine was asserted in Bish. v. Johnson, 21 Ind. 299. (See also Hanna v. Cincinnati, 20 Ind. 30.) The supreme court of Connecticut recognized the rule in Bishop v. Brainard, 28 Conn. 289, and a subscriber to one company was held to be a debtor to the consolidated company in a case where there was no general authority to consolidate, but the charter of the company was subject to amendment by the legislature, and where the legislature, after the subscription, confirmed the consolidation. (Vide also Schenectady and Saratoga Plank Road Co. v. Thatcher, 1 Kernan, 102; Buffalo and New York City R R. Co. v. Dudley, 4 Kernan, 336; Meadow Dam v. Gray, 30 Maine, 347; Agricultural Branch R. R. Co. v. Winchester, 13 Allen, 32; Moyes v. Spalding, 27 Vt. 420; Pacific R. R. Co. v. Renshaw, 18 Mo. 210; Fry v. Lexington, 2 Metc., Ky. 314; Illinois River R. R. Co. v. Beers, 27 Ill. 189; Terre Haute and Alton R. R Co. v. Ear, 21 Ill. 292.)

Digitized by Google

Many other citations are at hand, but these are sufficient. No well-considered cases are in conflict with them. Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, is altogether a different case. In that it appeared that the people of the county voted in November, 1853, in favor of a subscription for stock in the Mississippi and Wabash Railroad Company, and in April, 1854, the board of supervisors of the county ordered their clerk to make the subscription. It was not, however, then made. Subsequently, in 1857, the legislature made fundamental changes in the organization of the company, dividing it substantially into three companies, with a distinct governing body for each, and with three classes of stockholders. It was after this that the county subscription was made, and made not for the stock of the Mississippi and Wabash Railroad Company, but for the stock of one of the divisions. Necessarily, therefore, we held that there was no authority to make the subscription which was made, that it had not been approved by a popular vote, and hence that the bonds issued in payment for it were invalid. The county had entered into no contract until after the radical changes had been made in the organization of the company. It never assented to such a change, and when the proposed subscription was approved by the popular vote, there was no reason to expect the change afterwards made. There was at that time nothing in the general law of the state, and nothing in the charter, which authorized the company to change its organization, or which looked to its division into several distinct corporations. It needs nothing more to show how unlike that case was to the present.

In the case in hand the county had, under lawful authority, undertaken to subscribe for stock before the consolidation was made, and the undertaking had been accepted. A liability had been incurred, and the business agents of the county, to whom exclusively the law entrusted the management of its affairs, consented to and promoted the consolidation. And the subscription was made in full view of the law that allowed an amalgamation with another company. The contract was made with reference to that law. Nothing has taken place which the county was not bound to anticipate as likely to happen, and to which the people in voting for the subscription, and the board of supervisors in directing it, must not be considered as having consented. What was ruled in Marsh v. Fulton County, therefore, does not touch this case. Nor was there anything decided in Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, which sustains in any degree the defence set up on behalf of the defendants.

We have, then, in brief, this case: The people of Putnam county, in pursuance of law, voted a county subscription for stock in a railroad company, to be paid for with county bonds. The financial agents of the county agreed to make the subscription, and the company accepted it. The bonds were made payable to the company, or bearer, but before they were delivered, the company became consolidated with another, in pursuance of authority conferred by the law in force when the subscription was voted, and at the instance of the board of supervisors of the county. All the conditions precedent to the delivery of the bonds were complied with to the satisfaction of the county agents, certificates for the stock were received, and the bonds were delivered and sold. The plaintiff is a bona fide holder of some of the coupons for value paid. It would, we think, be a reproach to the administration of justice if he cannot enforce the payment of those coupons, and we see no principle of law or equity that stands in the way of his action. He found the bonds and the coupons upon the market, payable to the Kankakee and Illinois River Railroad Company, or bearer. Proposing to buy, he had only to enquire whether the county was, by law, authorized to issue them, and whether their issue had been approved by a popular vote. He was not bound to enquire farther, and had he enquired he would have found full authority for the issue, and if he had also known of the consolidation it would not have affected him.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause is remitted, with instructions to overrule the defendant's demurrer.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice DAVIS and Mr. Justice MILLER.

Railway-Aid Bonds — Funding Bonds — Defences when Sued on by Innocent Holders.

ISAAC W. POLLARD v. THE CITY OF PLEASANT HILL.

United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON and KREKEL, JJ.

1. Railway-aid Bonds—Defences when Sued on by Innocent Holder.—An innocent holder of bonds issued by municipal corporations in aid of railroads, is not required to look beyond the authority and recital in the bond to see whether formalities of any kind, embracing the question as to the subscription, have been complied with.

2. ——. ——. Application of this Principle.—Thus, where the vote and ordinance under which bonds were issued by a town corporation in aid of a railroad, required that they be issued to a particular road, and the bonds on their face recited that they were issued to such road, it was no defence to a suit by an innocent holder, upon coupons detached from such bonds, that they were in fact issued to another and a different road.

3. ——. ——. Interest Payable in Gold.—Nor is it any defence to such a suit that the interest on such bonds is payable in gold coin. A contract specifically made for the payment of interest in gold coin is valid and will be enforced.

4. ——. ——. Bonds issued to raise Funds to influence Legislation.—In a suit upon coupons detached from municipal bonds which recite on their face that they are issued to fund the floating debt of the city, if legal authority to fund such debt existed, it is no defence that such bonds were in fact issued to raise funds to improperly influence legislation. The municipal authorities will not be thus permitted to set up their own wrongful acts against innocent holders of commercial securities which they have issued.

Judson and Barnard, for plaintiff; Hall and Adams, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—This action is brought on detached coupons of two classes of bonds, the first on subscription of $15,000 to the Pacific Railroad of Missouri; the second on bonds funding the debt of the city.

Plaintiff claims to be holder for value before maturity.

As to the Pacific Railroad bonds and coupons, the answer sets up that the vote and ordinance authorizing the subscription were to the Pacific Railroad of Missouri in aid of constructing the Pleasant Hill and Lawrence branch thereof, that the subscription was actually made to the Pleasant Hill and Lawrence Branch of the Pacific Railroad, and the bonds issued in payment thereof delivered to the St. Louis, Lawrence and Denver Railroad; that for not pursuing the authority as cited in subscribing, the bonds and coupons are void. It is admitted by the pleading that the necessary two-thirds vote to authorize the taking of stock was had. The bonds on their face recite that they were issued to the Pacific Railroad. An innocent holder is not required to look beyond the authority and recital in the bond to see whether formalities of any kind, embracing the question as to the subscription, have been complied with. This has been the uniform decision of the supreme court of Missouri, from the case of Flagg v. The City of Palmyra, 33 Mo. 440, to its last unreported utterances in the Clark county case. Nor has the federal judiciary been wanting in its steadfast adherence to this doctrine. As late as 15 Wallace, Grand Chute v. Winegar, 355, it has been re-asserted, and former cases affirmed.

Digitized by Google

As to the defence that the bonds are payable in legal tender notes, and that no authority exists to contract for gold coin in payment of interest, it is only necessary to refer to the case of Triblecock v. Wilson and Wife, 12 Wallace, 687, to find the law as settled by the supreme court of the United States. It is there held that a contract may be made for gold coin or specie, and that such contract cannot be satisfied by payment in legal tender notes. That a contract to pay bonds in legal tender notes and the interest thereon in gold coin can be made, it is apprehended will not be seriously questioned. It is a matter of contract purely, and when its conditions sufficiently appear, the court will enforce it. In this case the bonds call for six per cent. interest, payable in gold coin, and the coupons conform to the bonds. No objections are perceived why the contract thus specifically made for gold coin should not be valid and enforced.

The demurrer to the second, third and fourth counts of the answer will be sustained.

The second class of coupons sued on are on funding bonds, and the petition as to them alleges that they were issued in pursuance to an act of the general assembly of Missouri authorizing the funding of the floating debt of the city; that the bonds issued; that plaintiff became a holder for value before maturity, and that the coupons were not paid on presentation.

The answers sets up that the bonds were not issued in payment of outstanding warrants, or in satisfaction of liabilities of the city; that they were issued to raise funds to improperly influence legislation, quoting an ordinance of the city, from which it would appear that such was the case. However much we may deprecate that any people should thus expose themselves on their own record, and swift as this court would be to visit upon the heads of those who would contaminate the fountain of legislation (if a proper case and parties were before the court), it would be but aiding and abetting their wrongful acts to allow them to come and set them up in their own defence against innocent holders of the commercial securities they issued. It is admitted that legal authority to fund the floating debt of the city existed, and that the bonds on their face purported to be issued under and by virtue of it. This binds the city. The use made of the proceeds of the bonds cannot affect holders for value.

The demurrer as to second and third count of answer, as to the second class, the funding bonds will be sustained.

JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

The Bar Association of St. Louis.

The members of the legal profession in St. Louis have organized an association with the above title, similar in its character and in most of the provisions of its constitution to the bar association of New York City, which has succeeded in purifying the professional and judicial atmosphere of that city in a marked degree. It is established "to maintain the honor and dignity of the profession of the law; to cultivate social intercourse among its members, and for the promotion of legal science and the administration of justice." At the meeting which took place on Monday evening, a constitution and by-laws were adopted, the important features of which are that members of the bar in good standing, residing or practicing in the city of St. Louis, may be active members; members of the profession residing elsewhere in Missouri may be members with all privileges except that of voting. Judges are likewise honorary members, and upon the accession of any member to the bench he ceases to be an active, and becomes an honorary member. The initiation and annual fees are fixed for the present at the low sum of ten dollars each, subject to be increased or diminished as the needs of the association may require. An adjourned meeting of the association will be held on Monday, the 6th prox., at which time the officers of the association will be elected.

Properly conducted, this movement may result in great good. That the the legal profession in the United States is greatly in need of the beneficial influence of such agencies cannot be denied. Under the influence of the law societies of London the legal profession in England has maintained a high standing, and has constantly deserved and received the confidence of the government and the people. The same cannot be said of the profession in this country. With us there are no effective means in existence of preventing the entrance of incompetent and improper persons into the ranks of the profession, or of securing their expulsion when they have shown themselves unfit to remain in it. It results that in the United States the legal profession is overrun with its multitude of pettifoggers and shysters, the same as the medical profession is overrun with its quacks. In England to be a barrister is to possess a title of honor and a passport to good society everywhere. To be an attorney and counsellor at law in this country is to be something or nothing, precisely according to the use which the possessor of these titles makes of the privileges of the bar. Indeed, in some instances our profession seems to have reached such a low standard and to have degenerated so thoroughly into a trade, that the name of lawyer has become almost a reproach. To remedy these evils should be, it occurs to us, the principal office of a bar association. If this association keeps the limited objects for which it is created steadily in view, it cannot fail to accomplish great good. If it steps outside of that limited circle and attempts to interfere with the general policy of legislation, or with other things which do not directly concern the legal profession as a profession, it will soon discover that it has outlived its usefulness.

Notes of Recent Decisions of the Supreme Court of Missouri.

[Through the courtesy of W. J. Gilbert, Esq., publisher of the Missouri Reports, we are permitted to make the following abstracts from proof sheets of Volume 54. The cases were decided at the October term, 1873, at Saint Louis.]

Evidence—Admissions—Hearsay.—In a suit brought on the parol promise of the defendant to pay for stock sold to A., although one of the plaintiffs testified that he knew nothing about the contract with the defendant, yet in cross-examination it would be proper to show by him that on a former occasion he had testified that it was his understanding that A. had purchased the stock, and that B. had become his surety. Such testimony was competent as an admission on the part of the plaintiff. Glenn v. Lehner, vol. 54, p. 45.

Statute of Frauds—Original and Collateral Liability.—The question whether a verbal contract comes within the statute of frauds or not, depends wholly on the agreement. If a party agrees to be originally bound, the contract need not be in writing; but if his agreement is collateral to that of the principal contractor, or is that of a guarantee or surety for another, the agreement must be in writing. It is immaterial in such case whether the promise was prior to the passing or delivery of the consideration, or afterwards; in either case the contract must be in writing, and in the latter, must have a new consideration to uphold it. Ib.

Social Evil Ordinance of St. Louis—General Law Repealed by Municipal Charter.—The case of The State v. Kate Clarke, vol. 54, p. 1, has been published in several of the legal journals, and is familiar to the profession in Missouri. In 1870 a charter was granted to the city of Saint Louis, giving the city council power "by ordinance not inconsistent with any law of the state * * to regulate bawdy houses." In pursuance of the power thus granted an ordinance was passed providing for the compulsory registration of prostitutes and houses of prostitution, and for the physical examination of the inmates of such houses by medical officers at stated periods also compelling the payment of fees for such examinations, which fees went to the establishing of a hospital for the curing of diseased inmates of such houses, who on being discovered to be diseased were sent compulsorily to such hospital and compelled there to remain until cured, when they were set at liberty. The city ordinance thus "regulated" houses of prostitution and gave them a permissive existence, whereas the law of the state punishes prostitution as a crime. The defendant kept a house of prostitution in Saint Louis, and was indicted therefor in the state court and convicted under the state law. The defendant appealed, and urged that the grant of power in the charter and the exercise thereof by the city council repealed, pro tanto, the state law, so that she could not be prosecuted and convicted thereunder; and so the supreme court in effect held. The judgment of conviction was, therefore, reversed. NAPTON, ADAMS and WAGNER, JJ., concurring; VORIES and SHERWOOD, JJ., dissenting.

Digitized by Google

Railway Aid Bonds—Defences in Hands of bona fide Holders.—Smith et al. v. Clarke County, vol. 54, p. 58. [This case has been published in this paper, ante, p. 5.]

Practice before Justices of the Peace—Judgment—Execution—Motion to Quash, etc.—Caldwell v. Fea, vol. 54, p. 55. The entry on a justice's docket showed suit brought against Fea, Brother & Turnbull, and judgment against defendants "as a firm, or against Joseph Fea and William Turnbull, as the summons was served on them personally. The execution issued under it recited a judgment and ordered levy against the three defendants. Held, that although the judgment bound only the two defendants named, yet under the statute (2 W. S. 839, § 15) the execution should not be quashed, but should be amended so as to conform its recitals to the law, and should be directed against the defendants who had been personally served.

Contracts by Infants—Disaffirmance—Ratification.—In Baker v. Kennett, vol. 54, p. 82, an infant who had taken a deed of land and given his note for the purchase money, made an attempt to disaffirm the contract before his majority, and again within a few days thereafter, and upon the refusal of the vendor to agree thereto, offered to give him $2,000, together with the improvements erected on the land, by way of compromise; and abandoned the premises and left them to be occupied by the vendor when he saw fit. Held, that the disaffirmance was sufficiently speedy and unequivocal to avoid the contract. The court say in substance that to constitute a ratification of an infant's contract, a mere acknowledgment that the debt existed, or that the contract was made, is not sufficient. There need not be a precise and formal promise, but there must be a direct and express confirmation and a substantial promise to pay the debt or fulfill the contract. And the promise must be made with a knowledge of the facts, and with a deliberate purpose of assuming the liability from which the party knows that he is discharged.

———. ———. Liability of Surety on Infant's Note.—The same case decides that where an infant gives his note for land purchased, and on his majority disaffirms the contract, the sureties on the note are not liable.

Supreme Court of Missouri—Decisions this Week.

State v. Alexander. Appeal from St. Louis criminal court. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Baldwin v. Chouteau Insurance Company. Appeal from general term of St. Louis circuit court. Judgment of general term affirmed, and cause remanded.

Walser v. Theis. Appeal from St Louis circuit court Affirmed.

State v. Gibbs. Appeal from St. Louis court of criminal correction. Reversed and remanded.

Bartholow v. Campbell. Appeal from St. Louis circuit court. Affirmed.

State v. Crowner et al. Appeal from St. Louis court of criminal correction. Reversed and remanded.

Missouri Loan Bank v. Filley. Appeal from St. Louis circuit court. Affirmed.

State ex rel. Attorney Genl. v. Townley. Original proceeding by quo warranto. Judgment of ouster.

State v. Fred Miller. Appeal from St. Louis court of criminal correction. Affirmed on an inspection of the record.

Myers v. Van Wagoner. Appeal from St. Louis circuit court. Affirmed.

Barry v. Otto et al. Appeal from St. Louis circuit court. Affirmed.

Eggeman v. Henschen. Appeal from St. Louis circuit court. Affirmed.

Kronenberger v. Buiz. Appeal from St. Louis circuit court. Affirmed.

We give below abstracts of the opinions so far as the space at our disposal this week will permit, and shall continue the same next week and thereafter, so as to give complete abstracts of all cases decided at this term.

Burglary in First and Second Degree.—State v. George Alexander. In this case the defendant was tried upon an indictment for burglary, which charged that he "with force and arms, about the hour of one of the clock in the night, * * * the dwelling-house of one Clemens Harig, * * * in which there was at the time a human being, feloniously and burglariously did forcibly break and enter, with the intent the goods and chattels in the said dwelling-house * * * to steal, take and carry away," etc. The proof corresponded with the allegations. Under the instructions of the court below the defendant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and of larceny. It was here urged that the judgment was erroneous, since the indictment was for burglary in the first degree, and the evidence all tended to establish that offence and none other. The court held that the indictment is applicable alone to the tenth section of the statute (1 Wagn. Stat. p. 454), which defines burglary in the first degree, and not to the eleventh section, which defines burglary in the second degree. The judgment convicting the defendant of burglary in the second degree is therefore reversed, but the judgment convicting him of larceny is affirmed. WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion. The other judges concurred, except SHERWOOD, J., who was absent.

Malicious Prosecution in Suing Out Attachment—Allegations and Proof—Measure of Damages.—Peter F. Walser v. Frederick Theis. This was an action for damages for maliciously suing out an attachment against the plaintiff, causing the same to be levied on his goods, and thereby breaking up his business.

The court hold—1. That it is not necessary in this kind of action that it should appear, from the pleadings or proof, that the defendant participated in the execution of the attachment process; overruling on this point Drake on Attachments, § 730, and Marshall v. Betner, 17 Ala. 832. The court say: "We are not willing to concede that it is necessary to the maintenance of the action that the defendant should in person deliver the writ to the officer, or be present and point out the property and tell him what to do. It is the duty of the court to deliver the process to its executive officer, and it is the duty of that officer to levy the attachment writs on whatever property may be necessary to satisfy the same. The plaintiff in the suit sets the whole proceeding in motion by making out the affidavit, and if he does the same maliciously, vexatiously and without probable cause, and injury results from his unlawful and wrongful act, he is liable and must respond in damages."

2. The jury fixed the plaintiff's damages at $800, and of this the plaintiff remitted $350 This was not such an assessment of damages as the supreme court will disturb. The business of the defendant (who kept a boarding-house) was injured by the attachment, and he was forced to sell out his establishment at great loss.

The court say: "The rules as to damages applicable to other cases of malicious prosecution apply to actions for malicious attachment." The court then state the rule in the language of Dr. Greenleaf (2 Greenl. Ev. § 456) and quote approvingly Drake on Attachments, § 745.

The judgment below is affirmed. WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion. The other judges concurring, except SHERWOOD, J., who was absent.

Assault and Battery.—The State v. Fred Miller. No bill of exceptions and no assignment of errors, the judgment of conviction in this case is affirmed upon an examination of the record. ADAMS, J., delivering the opinion. The other judges concurring, except SHERWOOD, J., absent.

Trade-Marks—The Missouri Statute Expounded.—The State v. John S. Gibbs. This was a criminal information in the Saint Louis court of criminal correction for counterfeiting the trade-mark of Lea & Perrin, of London, England, manufacturers of Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire Sauce, and for vending a spurious article thereunder. The opinion involves an exposition of the Missouri Statute of 1870 on the subject of trade-marks (2 Wagn. Stat., 2d ed., p. 1330). The questions ruled arise on the defendant's motion to dismiss the information for the following reasons: 1. Because the complaint did not charge upon the defendant the violation of any statute known to the laws of the state of Missouri. 2. Because the law under which the defendant was prosecuted was not intended to, nor did it protect merchants or manufacturers doing business in any other place than the state of Missouri. 3. Because the law on which the complaint was based was for the protection of merchants and manufacturers doing business in this state. These objections (the substantial one being embraced in the two last propositions, namely, that the statute was intended to protect domestic manufacturers, and does not extend to the protection of foreign manufacturers) the court overrule.

The court say: "A reading of the act will show that it is comprehensive and general in its character. There is not a word or an intimation given that it was intended to apply only to citizens of this state. Indeed, to give it such a construction would, I apprehend, defeat its principal object and expose our people to all the impositions and deceptions against which the law was intended to guard them. There is a well-known right of property in a trademark which the law will protect, and which it was not the intention of the statute to abridge. The citizens of foreign states will be protected in their rights of property in trade-marks in our courts the same as our own citizens. (Taylor v. Carpenter, 11 Paige, 292; S. C., 2 W. & M. 1.)

Digitized by Google

"But aside from this, the statute had another important object in view, which was intended directly to benefit our own citizens and shield them against counterfeiters and impostors. Many articles manufactured by certain persons, firms and corporations, have attained a high reputation and are of great excellence, and those articles are sold with peculiar marks, brands or wrappers, or other devices which have been adopted to show by whom they were made. These trade-marks are valuable to the persons who have a proprietary interest in them, and to the people who buy and use the articles, because they are a guarantee of their genuineness. But if by fraudulent means other persons are permitted to counterfeit and forge and simulate these trade-marks and attach them to inferior or indifferent articles, the community is imposed on and cheated. It was to prevent this that the law was enacted. And in its provisions it makes no distinction as to where the original manufacturer resides. It applies to all alike, and was designed to protect our people against gross deception and imposition, regardless of the place where the genuine articles were made."

Judgment reversed. WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion. All the judges concurring, except SHERWOOD, J., who was absent.

Promissory Note—Suit against Endorser—Composition with Maker a Defence.—Hermann Eggeman v. C. H. Henschen. This was an action against the payee and endorser of an ordinary promissory note drawn by Henschen, Krite & Co., in favor of C. H. Henschen, the defendant in this suit, and by him endorsed to the plaintiff. The defence is that the note before maturity had been satisfied by Henschen, Krite & Co., and the satisfaction accepted by the plaintiff, and that this released the defendant, the endorser. This composition deed was passed upon in Diermeyer v. Hackman, 52 Mo. 282, where it was held to be a release by the creditors of their debts. The defence here set up is sustained, the court holding in accordance with Story Prom. Notes, § 423, that the release of the makers by the holder released also the endorser. ADAMS, J., delivered the opinion. The other judges concurring.

Book Notices.

THE AMERICAN REPORTS: Containing all decisions of general interest decided in the courts of last resort of the several states, with notes and references. By ISAAC GRANT THOMPSON. Vol. 9. Containing all cases of any general importance in the following Reports: 1 Colorado; 37 and 38 Conn.; 43 and 44 Georgia; 35 Ind.; 107 Mass.; 23 Mich.; 27, 28 and 29 Wis. Albany: John D. Parsons, Jr., Publisher. 1873.

We gladly avail ourselves of this occasion briefly to speak concerning the series of Reports of which the volume above entitled is the last one which has yet made its appearance. The number of reports is so great and is being added to so rapidly that a complete set of even the American Reports is beyond the reach of the body of the profession. The time, however, has not yet arrived, and probably is not very near at hand, when the lawyer can dispense with reports. If he attempts it, his adversary who has recourse to them is likely to obtain thereby an advantage. But the problem remains, how is it practicable for the lawyer to overcome the difficulties which grow out of the publication each year of so many volumes of reports? Fifty or more are issued annually in this country alone. On the bench of the highest courts of many of the states are judges of great and varied learning, large experience and wise judgment, and this has been so from the beginning. Parsons the elder, Parker, Shaw, Redfield, Kent, Denio, Tilghman, Gibson, Hitchcock, Blackford, Breese, Dixon, Cooley and many other names familiar to American lawyers, will at once occur to the reader.

From causes which it has been found impossible to remove, the practice is to include in the official reports substantially all the cases determined by the several courts of last resort. These reports are published primarily for the use of the bar and courts of the particular state, and hence include many cases relating to local practice and which have no extra-territorial value. Besides, it is largely true that the value of an opinion depends very much upon the judge who prepares it; and whoever has had occasion to examine critically the opinions which are found in the fifty volumes of reports issued here each year has not failed to discover that many of them have been hastily written and not well considered.

Now, the object of the series known as the American Reports is to give, in about three volumes each year, all the cases of general value decided in the courts of last resort of the several states, omitting cases relating to practice, to constructions of statutes peculiar to the particular state, and those of merely local interest. In this way twelve or more volumes of state reports can be put in one of the present series.

The value of reports upon this plan depends almost wholly upon the selection of the cases to be published, and the manner in which the work of the editor is performed. None but an accomplished and experienced lawyer can do this work as it ought to be done; and we congratulate the profession that it has been undertaken by one so eminently fitted as Mr. Isaac Grant Thompson. His learning and ability as a law writer are known wherever one of the very best Law Journals in the world is read, and his tastes, talents and studies peculiarly qualify him to edit these reports. His notes to the cases, which are often full and exhaustive, are, in many instances, worth more to the practitioner than the principal case.

We warmly recommend this series of reports as deserving the favor of the profession. Its general usefulness will be much increased by a Digest when the number of volumes shall have somewhat increased.

Legal News and Notes.

—JUDGE PRATT, of the supreme court of New York at Brooklyn, has granted a peremptory mandamus compelling the coroners to deliver the bodies of paupers to the medical faculty of the Long Island College Hospital Association.

—TWEED has just been defeated in a legal endeavor to change his abode in the penitentiary on Blackwell's Island for the more convenient Ludlow street jail. Judge BRADY has overruled this application of his counsel, and holds that the terms of his sentence warrant his confinement in the penitentiary.

—THE new supreme court of Texas, after an examination of the question, have unanimously decided that Mr. De Normandie, appointed clerk of that court by military authority in 1869, and re-appointed by the late bench, December 8, 1873, is entitled to retain his office under the present bench.

—LOUIS JACOB, a laundryman, has obtained a verdict of $500 damages in the superior court of New York city, against Drs. Lalanne and Miller, for false imprisonment in sending him to the insane asylum at Blackwell's Island. Mr. Jacob was at the asylum five days, when the physician in charge examined him, pronounced him sane and ordered his discharge. He thus gets $100 a day for the unlawful detention.

—THE Supreme Court of the United States has just pronounced a decision in the case of Bartemeyer v. The State of Iowa—a case in which a liquor dealer, indicted under the recent Iowa law for the suppression of intemperance, sought the protection of the 14th amendment. The court rule against him, but chiefly on the ground that it was but a moot case, made up to obtain the opinion of the court, when the facts would not warrant a review in this tribunal. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

—THE following important rule, substituted for rule 39 of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, has just been promulgated—Judge TREAT holding that the change becomes necessary under the provisions of the act of Congress of May 9, 1872.

"In all suits had in law pending in this court, depositions shall be taken in conformity with the provisions of section 30 of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 United States statutes, 88), section 3 of the act of February 20, 1812 (2 United States statutes, 682), and sections 1 and 2 of the act of July 24, 1827 (4 United States statutes, 197), as modified by the act of May 9, 1872 (17 United States statutes, 89). Commissions to take testimony in such causes may be issued in vacation as well as in term, jointly by both parties, or severally by either party, upon interrogatories filed by the party seeking the same, in the clerk's office, ten days' notice thereof being given to the adverse party to file cross-interrogatories before the issue of the commission, and if no cross interrogatories are filed at the expiration of the time, the commissioner may issue ex parte. In all cases the commissioner or commissioners may be named by the parties jointly or by the court, or by the judge thereof, or by the clerk. If the parties shall agree, the testimony may be taken on the terms agreed, upon oral interrogatories by the parties, or their attorneys or agents, without filing any written interrogatories, and all depositions, on being filed, shall be opened by the clerk at the instance of either party, and be subject to the inspection of the respective parties or attorneys."

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, APRIL 2, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

The Legal Uses of Photography.

Examples are constantly occurring of the uses in legal investigations of the art of photographing. We noted in a previous number (ante, p. 121), that Judge BLATCHFORD has decided that photographs of papers will not be admitted in evidence where the genuineness of the handwriting is in dispute, and where the originals can be procured. The London Times, in its graphic account of the close of the Tichborne trial, thus alludes to this subject:

"It is impossible to avoid noticing, at the conclusion of the case, the important service rendered to the cause of justice by the art of photography. The principal documents in the case, the pocket-book of the defendant, his letters and those of Roger Tichborne, were photographed by the Stereoscopic Company, under the auspices of Mr. Nottage, their manager, and the fac similes thus produced were of immense use in facilitating the comparison of handwriting, to which the Lord Chief Justice attached much importance as one of the great tests of identity. There probably never was a case in which the application of the invention was of greater service."

We may add our conviction that the use of photography in legal investigations is destined, at no distant day, to form an important chapter in the law of evidence.

The London Times on Lord Westbury's Will—Some Advice to People who insist upon being their own Lawyers.

The London Times, after alluding to a conjectural interpretation which Sir GEORGE JESSEL, Master of the Rolls, has been obliged to put upon the will of the late Lord Chancellor WESTBURY, in pursuance of one of Lord WESTBURY'S own decisions, makes the following observations:

"The more prosaic question remains, what lesson we may best learn from Lord WESTBURY'S ill-success in carrying into effect his testamentary wishes. The first and most obvious feeling is, that English law presents a series of pitfalls which the most careful and most experienced travellers are not always able to avoid. If Lord WESTBURY stumbled, who, we ask, can expect to walk safely? But this reflection would really be unjust to English law so far as this particular case is concerned. Nor would it, again, be fair to draw from this suit a moral on the danger of neglecting the use and repetition of the proper cabalistic phrases, as though the courts incline to punish curtness and plainness as offences against the genius of an essentially mysterious profession, whose aim it is to deter the steps of all unqualified intruders. The true lesson of the case, in fact, is that it is not very prudent for any one to be entirely his own legal adviser, any more than it is prudent for him to be his own stockbroker or physician. Lord WESTBURY is far from being the first lawyer of eminence who has made himself, involuntarily, an occasion for the enforcement of this remark. It is not only the general public who cannot dispense with lawyers; lawyers themselves are scarcely less in need of one another's services. There are few men who can judge with any exactness of the nature of their own performances. The criticism even of an inferior mind will often be of the utmost value, and will often pronounce a truer, if only because a more unprejudiced, opinion. The case, as we have said, does not much differ, whether the sphere be that of law, or of medicine, or of finance. There is a great deal in all of them which a qualified man may do well and easily for himself, and there is a great deal, too, which it would be prudent for him to commit to others. Some will, perhaps, err by too great caution and self-distrust, just as others have erred in the contrary way from too great self-confidence; but there is no comparison whatever between the consequences of the two mistakes."

Enforcing Payment of Municipal Securities After Judgment.

We surrender considerable space in this number to the case of Rees v. The City of Watertown, recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, concerning the mode of enforcing judgments against municipal corporations. Viewed in the light of the practical consequences, which it requires no uncommon sagacity to see will flow from it, no case since Knox County v. Aspinwall, upon the subject of municipal securities, is of more moment than this one. Undoubtedly this is so, if what the learned Justice who delivered the opinion says upon the subject of the inherent inability of the court to appoint, if necessary, its own officers to discharge the duty which the municipal officers evade or refuse to perform, is to be regarded as the opinion of the court.

The bill was in equity, and for the reasons stated sought equitable relief, substantially upon the double ground that the property of the inhabitants was liable to judicial seizure for the corporate debts, and that the municipal authorities held their powers, in respect to the taxation of property, as trustees for the creditors of the corporation, and that the refusal of the trustees to do their duty in this regard constituted a ground of equity jurisdiction in favor of the judgment creditor, whose legal process had been three times thwarted and rendered unavailing. The court denies the proposition that for corporate debts the inhabitants are liable to be proceeded against personally, or their property seized by the court, and also holds that the proper legal remedy to enforce payment of a judgment against a municipality is the writ of mandamus, and that it is no sufficient ground for equity jurisdiction that by the devices and contrivances of the corporation debtor or its officers or inhabitants the writ has been rendered fruitless. Clearly, the case is decisive against the right of the creditor to enforce payment through the instrumentality of a court of chancery.

How far what is said as to the want of inherent power in the court in mandamus proceedings in any event to appoint its own officers to perform a duty specifically enjoined by statute as to levying and collecting taxes, which duty the corporate officers refuse to perform, is to be considered as a point decided or only obiter, will, in view of the vital importance of the question and the nature of the case before the court, be likely to give rise to controversy. At all events, the views here expressed are ominous, and the case marks a new epoch in the judicial history of the municipal bond question. Heretofore the bondholders have had an almost uninterrupted succession of victories in the federal tribunals. In this judgment they have met with the first reverse; and if the views therein expressed are the views of the court in other than a case in equity, the reverse is a serious one in cases where the corporations and their people are so bent upon not paying that they will not keep up a regular corporate organization.

Digitized by Google

Liability of Banks and Bank Officers for Misrepresentations Concerning Solvency of Customer.

An interesting question concerning the liability of a bank or its manager for damages sustained by an individual through the false representations of the manager with regard to the solvency of a customer, has recently (February 2) been determined in the Exchequer Chamber, Westminster Hall, in the case of Swift v. Jewsbury, appealed from the Court of Queen's Bench. The plaintiff, Swift, having been applied to by Sir William Russell to supply him with a quantity of rails, applied to his own bank to ascertain, if possible, the condition of Sir William. The manager of this bank wrote to the manager of the bank at which Sir William had banked, desiring to know whether Sir William was responsible to the extent of £50,000. To this the manager of Sir Willlam's bank sent the following reply:

"GLOUCESTERSHIRE BANKING COMPANY,
CHELTENHAM, 9th November, 1869.

"GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your favor of the 8th inst., and beg to say in reply that Sir William Russell, Bart., M. P. for Norwich, is the lord of the manor of Charlton Kings, near this town, with a rent roll, I am told, of over £7,000 per annum, the receipt of which is in his own hands, and has large expectancies; and I do not believe he would incur the liabilities you name unless he was certain to meet the engagement. I am, gentlemen, yours faithfully,

T. B. GODDARD, Manager."

This letter was directed to the plaintiff's bank, namely: "The Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield." This information having been conveyed to the plaintiff by his bank, he took in payment of his rails Sir William's acceptance, which was afterwards dishonored. He now brought this action against the Gloucestershire Banking Company, and against Mr. Goddard individually. The court hold—Chief Justice COLERIDGE delivering the opinion—that the bank is not liable for the misrepresentation, reversing on this point the Queen's Bench. But with regard to the individual liability of Mr. Goddard, they rule otherwise. The Chief Justice on this point says: "With regard to Mr. Goddard, he has signed this, is found by the jury to have signed it with a knowl edge that it is untrue, and with the distinct intention to mislead those, whoever they were, to whose knowledge that misrepresentation should come. Mr. Swift is a person to whose knowledge it has come, and upon him it has acted unfavorably to the extent of the loss of his money. Therefore, it appears to me clearly, as far as Mr. Goddard is concerned, the action can be maintained for the whole sum that Mr. Swift has lost, against Mr. Goddard."

This case involves a construction of the English statute of frauds, 9 Geo. 4, chap. 14, under which it is held that the writing "signed by the party to be charged therewith" was not signed by the bank so as to charge it. It is further ruled that the 19th and 20th Vict., ch. 97, § 13, does not operate to charge the bank. This statute provides that "an acknowledgment or promise made or contained by, or in writing signed by an agent of the party chargeable thereby, and duly authorized to make such acknowledgment or promise, shall have the same effect as if the writing had been signed by such party himself." The force of the case would then seem to be that representations of this character are not made by bank officers in their fiduciary character, but simply as individuals, and for the truth of which they are alone individually responsible.

The full opinion of Chief Justice COLERIDGE will be found in the Bankers' Magazine for March.

Louisiana Funding Bill—Suit to Enjoin its Enforcement—Decision by Judge Woods.

The act passed by the last legislature of Louisiana, providing for the funding of the debt of that state, is meeting with a determined opposition by the holders of Louisiana bonds in England and in this country. Among financial men this measure is regarded as an attempt at a partial repudiation of the obligations of the state. On the other hand, the results of the war and subsequent misgovernment have fastened upon that unhappy people a debt of such magnitude, much of it tainted with fraud and corruption, that the payment even of the interest of the debt in its present status seems a hopeless and foregone question.

We may perhaps find space to mention the character of this Louisiana funding scheme more fully hereafter. We allude to it now merely for the purpose of stating that at New Orleans the suits brought in the United States Circuit Court, before Hon. W. B. WOODS, by J. L. Macauley, of New York, and Stern Bros., of England, holders of Louisiana bonds, against auditor Clinton and other state officers, to enjoin the enforcement of the funding bill, were decided on the 21st instant. Judge WOODS, in an elaborate written opinion, held that this is in effect a suit against the state, and that the court has no jurisdiction, because such suits are prohibited by the 11th amendment to the federal constitution. This was the chief and decisive question of the case; but the learned judge also proceeded to point out that if any remedy existed at all, it would not be by injunction, but by mandamus. We have not seen the full opinion; but we publish in another place the substance of it, as given in one of the New Orleans papers.

In an article in a previous number on the North Carolina special tax bonds, we pointed out what seemed to us the difficulty in the way of success in the suits brought by the bondholders in that state, namely, that they involved a seeming attempt on the part of the creditors to coerce a sovereign state into the payment of its supposed obligations. It is a familiar principle that a sovereign state cannot be sued unless by its own consent, and then only in the particular forum and in the particular manner pointed out by that consent. Were this not so, states might be so embarrassed by the suits of private individuals and by the seizing of the public property under executions, that civil government would become impossible. Within the meaning of this principle the states of the American Union are sovereign. (Briscoe v. Bank, 11 Peters, 257, 321; Houston Tap and B. Railway Co. v. Randolph, 24 Tex. 317, 339; Auditorial Board v. Arles, 15 Tex. 75 Beers v. Arkansas, 20 How. 527; Auditor v. Davies, 2 Ark. 494, 504.)

Digitized by Google

It is true that it was held under the original constitution, by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the jurisdiction of the federal courts extended to the entertaining of a suit by a citizen of one of the states against another state of the Union. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419. But the 11th amendment of the federal constitution afterwards intervened, and put an end to this jurisdiction, if it ever in fact existed; so that no suit can now be entertained in the federal courts against one of the states of the Union in which a private person is plaintiff.

Now, what is a suit against a state? It is manifest that any proceeding, whether brought against the state itself or its executive officers, which seeks to compel the performance of a supposed duty on the part of such state—to coerce it into the payment of its supposed obligations—to restrain it from violating its contracts—is as much a suit against the state as one in which the state is sued by name, and which seeks to reach and diminish a fund in the state's treasury, or to subject the state's property to execution. This conclusion would seem to be fully supported by the opinion of Judge WOODS. The bondholders have appealed from his decision to the Supreme Court of the United States. We shall watch the case with interest, but without much doubt as to what the result will be.

Bankrupt Act—Illegal Payment—Right of Holder of an Endorsed Note to Receive Payment from an Insolvent Debtor.

The case of Bartholow et al. v. Bean, published in this number, recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, lays down a principle of law, under the bankrupt act, of great practical importance to bankers, business men, and the holders of endorsed paper. Bean, as assignee in bankruptcy of Kintzing & Co., sued Bartholow, Lewis & Co., bankers in St. Louis, to recover back money which it was alleged they had received by way of an illegal preference from the bankrupts. The material facts were that the defendants held the note of Kintzing & Co., endorsed by one Wilcox, who was solvent and whose liability had become fixed by his waiver of protest and notice. Kintzing & Co. were insolvent and known to be so by Bartholow & Co. Under these circumstances, Kintzing & Co., without the procurement of the endorser, and without being required to do so by the defendants, paid to them the amount of the note; and the question was whether they were liable to refund the money to the assignee, the makers having, within four months, been thrown into bankruptcy. The supreme court, affirming the judgment of the circuit court, held that the assignee was entitled to recover, placing its judgment upon the ground that the bankrupt act (sec. 15), in the language of Mr. Justice MILLER, "intended, in the pursuit of its policy of equal distribution, to exclude both the holder of the note and the surety or endorser from the right to receive payment from the insolvent bankrupt. * * It was equally the duty of the holder of the note and the endorser to refuse to receive such a payment." The court say that if the holder had refused to receive payment, the endorser could not have set this up as a defence in an action against him by the holder.

The severe effect of the holder receiving payment from the insolvent maker is declared, arguendo, to be that "he makes himself liable to a judgment for the amount in favor of the bankrupt's assignee, and loses the right to recover either of the endorser, or of the bankrupt's estate."

How far this had reference to the facts of the particular case, or is meant as a general proposition, does not appear from the opinion itself. But as stated, it relieves the solvent endorser, who was the party really benefited by the payment, since if it had not been made he would be liable; and the defendants had no motive to defeat or evade the bankrupt law, because the endorser's liability to them was fixed, and their right to insist upon and receive payment from him was undisputed.

Other aspects of the subject have arisen in the lower courts. Thus in Bean v. Laflin, East. Dist. of Mo., 5 Bankr. Reg. 333, TREAT, J., decided that an endorser who receives none of the proceeds of the note and whose liability has not become absolute, and who is guiltless of any fraud, cannot be compelled to pay to the bankrupt's assignee the amount of the note paid to the holder by the bankrupt while he was still carrying on business. But where the holder, who was innocent, was paid out of the means of the insolvent maker by the agency of the endorser, who knew the maker's insolvent condition, it was held that the endorser was liable to pay the amount to the assignee in bankruptcy, he and not the maker being, under these circumstances, the "party benefited" by the payment. LEAVITT, J., in Ahl v. Thorner, 3 Bankr. Reg. 29. Some general expressions in the opinions in both of the cases last cited require modification, perhaps, in view of the decision of the supreme court in the above-mentioned case of Bartholow, Lewis & Co.

Enforcement of Judgments upon Municipal Bonds —No Relief in Equity.

JAMES H. REES v. THE CITY OF WATERTOWN.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 219, October Term, 1873.

1. Municipal Bonds—Bill in Equity to Enforce Payment after Judgment.—The plaintiff had obtained judgments upon municipal railway-aid bonds in the proper federal court in Wisconsin against a municipal corporation therein, and three successive writs of mandamus had been rendered ineffectual by reason of the want of a quorum of the council, caused by resignations and by the refusal of the municipal officers to obey the writs: thereupon the judgment creditor brought a bill in equity, asking a decree subjecting the taxable property of the citizens to the payment of his judgments, and that the marshal of the district be authorized to seize and sell so much of it as might be necessary for that purpose. Held, that the court had no power to grant the relief prayed.

2. ——. ——. Appointment of Marshal to Levy Tax.—In the absence of a statute authorizing it, the court has no power on a bill in equity to appoint its marshal a commissioner with authority to levy a tax upon the taxable property of the municipality, and on this point the case was distinguished from The Supervisors v. Rogers, 7 Wall. 175, which arose in Iowa, where there was such a statute.

3. Municipal Debts—Personal Liability of Inhabitants.—There is no personal liability on the part of the citizens or inhabitants of an ordinary municipal corporation outside of the New England states for corporate debts.

4. ——. Enforcing Payment after Judgment—The Remedy.—Mandamus is the appropriate legal remedy for the enforcement of judgments against a municipal corporation, and the fact that this remedy has proved fruitless by reason of the devices of the corporation debtor or its citizens does not constitute ground of equity jurisdiction to enforce payment of the judgment.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain bonds issued by the city of Watertown to the Watertown and Madison Railroad Company, and by them sold for their benefit. The plaintiff recovered three several judgments in the United States Court on these bonds, amounting to nearly ten thousand dollars. Afterwards he brought another suit in the United States Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, upon these several judgments, and on the 3d of February, 1871, recovered a judgment for $11,066.89.

Digitized by Google

In the summer of 1868 he issued executions upon the two judgments first obtained, which were returned wholly unsatisfied.

In November of the same year he procured from the United States Circuit Court a peremptory writ of mandamus, directing the city of Watertown to levy and collect a tax upon the taxable property of the city, to pay the said judgments; but, as the plaintiff alleges, before the writ could be served, a majority of the members of the city council resigned their offices. This fact was returned by the marshal, and proceedings upon the mandamus thereupon ceased.

In May, 1869, another board of aldermen having been elected, the plaintiff procured another writ of mandamus to be issued, which writ was served on all of the aldermen except one Holger, who was sick at the time of the service upon the others. No steps were taken to comply with the requisition of the writ. An order to show cause why the aldermen should not be punished for contempt, in not complying with its requirements, was obtained, and before its return day six of the aldermen resigned their offices, leaving in office but one more than a quorum, of whom the said Holger, upon whom the writ had not been served, was one. Various proceedings were had and various excuses made, the whole resulting in an order that the aldermen should at once levy and collect the tax; but before the order could be served on Holger, he resigned his office, and again the board was left without a quorum. Nothing was accomplished by their efforts in aid of the plaintiff, but fines were imposed upon the recusant aldermen, which were ordered to be applied in discharge of the costs of the proceedings.

In October, 1870, the plaintiff obtained a third writ of mandamus, which resulted as the former ones had done, and by the same means on the part of the officers of the city. A special election was ordered to be held to fill the vacancies of the aldermen so resigning, but no votes were cast, except three in one ward, and the person for whom they were cast refused to qualify. There is a very limited denial in the answer of some of these allegations, but their general truth is not denied. It is certain that no part of the debt of the plaintiff has ever been paid, and that with an accumulation of fourteen years' interest, the same remains wholly due, and that the plaintiff's efforts to obtain satisfaction of his judgments have failed.

The bill sets forth certain acts of the legislature of Wisconsin, which, it is alleged, were intended to aid the defendant in evading the payment of its debts, and which, it can scarcely be denied, have had that effect, whatever might have been the intent of the legislature passing them.

The plaintiff asks the aid of the court to subject the taxable property of the city to the payment of his judgments, alleging that the corporate authorities are trustees for the benefit of the creditors of the city, and the property of the citizens a trust fund for that purpose, and that it is the duty of the court to lay hold of the property and cause it to be justly applied. He asks specifically that a decree may be made subjecting the taxable property of the citizens to the payment of his judgments, and that the marshal of the district may be empowered to seize and sell so much of it as may be necessary, and to pay over to him the proceeds of such sale.

This case is free from the objections usually made to a recovery upon municipal bonds. It is beyond doubt that the bonds were issued by the authority of an act of the legislature of the state of Wisconsin, and in the manner prescribed by the statute. It is not denied that the railroad, in aid of the construction of which they were issued, has been built, and was put in operation.

Upon a class of the defences interposed in the answer and in the argument it is not necessary to spend much time. Thus it is alleged that the city of Watertown contains a population of but 7,553 inhabitants; that the value of its property is assessed at but little over a million of dollars; that the debt of the city is $750,000; that it is impossible for the city to pay this debt; that it was expected and provided that the railroad company would pay the bonds in question, but the roads have been foreclosed and sold; that the city has compromised and settled a portion of its indebtedness; that it has levied the taxes necessary to effect such compromise; and that it is ready to compromise all outstanding bonds and judgments at as high a rate as can be collected of the people of Watertown; that there is no law to compel the retention of the office by aldermen to levy taxes; that the plaintiff took his chance of its being voluntarily done, and that, not being voluntarily done, there is no violation of law.

These theories are vicious. They are based upon the idea that a refusal to pay an honest debt is justifiable because it would distress the debtor to pay it. A voluntary refusal to pay an honest debt is a high offence in a commercial community, and is just cause of war between nations. So far as the defence rests upon these principles we find no difficulty in overruling it.

There is, however, a grave question of the power of the court to grant the relief asked for.

We are of the opinion that this court has not the power to direct a tax to be levied for the payment of these judgments. This power to impose burdens and raise money is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and is exercised, first, to raise money for public purposes only; and, second, by the power of legislative authority only. It is a power that has not been extended to the judiciary. Especially is it beyond the power of the federal judiciary to assume the place of a state in the exercise of this authority, at once so delicate and so important. The question is not entirely new in this court.

In the case of Supervisors v. Rogers (7 Wall. 175), an order was made by this court appointing the marshal a commissioner, with power to levy a tax upon the taxable property of the county, to pay the principal and interest of certain bonds issued by the county, the payment of which had been refused. That case was like the present, except that it occurred in the state of Iowa, and the proceeding was taken by the express authority of a statute of that state. The court say: "The next question is as to the appointment of the marshal as a commissioner to levy the tax in satisfaction of the judgment. This depends upon a provision of the code of the state of Iowa. This proceeding is found in a chapter regulating proceedings in the writ of mandamus, and the power is given to the court to appoint a person to discharge the duty enjoined by the peremptory writ which the defendant had refused to perform, and for which refusal he was liable to an attachment, and is express and unqualified. The duty of levying the tax upon the taxable property of the county to pay the principal and interest of these bonds was specially enjoined upon the board of supervisors by the act of the legislature that authorized their issue, and the appointment of the marshal as a commissioner, in pursuance of the above section, is to provide for the performance of this duty where the board has disobeyed or evaded the law of the state and the peremptory mandate of the court.

The state of Wisconsin, of which the city of Watertown is a municipal corporation, has passed no such act. The case of Supervisors v. Rogers, is, therefore, of no authority in the case before us. The appropriate remedy of the plaintiff was and is a writ of mandamus. (See Riggs v. Johnson County, 6 Wall. 193.) This may be repeated as often as the occasion requires. It is a judicial writ, a part of a recognized course of legal proceedings. In the present case it has been thus far unavailing, and the prospect of its future success is, perhaps, not flattering. However this may be, we are aware of no authority in this court to appoint its own officer to execute the duty thus neglected by the city in a case like the present.

Digitized by Google

In Welch v. St. Genevieve (10 Am. Law. 512), at a circuit court for the district of Missouri, a tax was ordered to be levied by the marshal under similar circumstances. We are not able to recognize the authority of the case. No counsel appeared for the city (Mr. Reynales as amicus curiæ only); no authorities are cited which sustain the position taken by the court; the power of the court to make the order is disposed of in a single paragraph, and the execution of the order suspended for three months to give the corporation an opportunity to select officers and itself to levy and collect the tax, with the reservation of a longer suspension if it should appear advisable. The judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, states that the case is without precedent, and cites in support of its decision no other cases than that of Riggs v. Johnson County, 6 Wall. 166, and Lansing v. Treasurer, 9 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 415. The case cited from 6 Wallace does not touch the present point. The question in that case was whether a mandamus having been issued by an United States court in the regular course of proceedings, its operation could be stayed by an injunction from the state court, and it was held that it could not be. It is probable that the case of Supervisors v. Rogers (7 Wall. 175), was the one intended to be cited. This case has already been considered.

The case of Lansing v. Treasurer (also cited), arose within the state of Iowa. It fell within the cass of Supervisors v. Rogers, and was rightly decided because authorized by the express statute of the state of Iowa. It offered no precedent for the decision of a case arising in a state where such a statute does not exist.

These are the only authorities upon the power of this court to direct the levy of a tax under the circumstances existing in this case to which our attention has been called.

The plaintiff insists that the court may accomplish the same result under a different name; that it has jurisdiction of the persons and of the property, and may subject the property of the citizens to the payment of the plaintiff's debt without the intervention of state taxing officers, and without regard to tax laws. His theory is that the court should make a decree subjecting the individual property of the citizens of Watertown to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment; direct the marshal to make a list thereof from the assessment rolls, or from such other sources of information as he may obtain; report the same to the court, where any objections should be heard; that the amount of the debt should be apportioned upon the several pieces of property owned by individual citizens; that the marshal should be directed to collect such apportioned amount from such persons, or in default thereof to sell the property.

As a part of this theory the plaintiff argues that the court has authority to direct the amount of the judgment to be wholly made from the property belonging to any inhabitant of the city, leaving the citizens to settle the equities between themselves.

This theory has many difficulties to encounter. In seeking to obtain for the plaintiff his just rights, we must be careful not to invade the rights of others. If an inhabitant of the city of Watertown should own a block of buildings of the value of $20,000, upon no principle of law could the whole of the plaintiff's debt be collected from that property. Upon the assumption that individual property is liable for the payment of the corporate debts of the municipality, it is only so liable for its proportionate amount. The inhabitants are not joint and several debtors with the corporation, nor does their property stand in that relation to the corporation or to the creditor. This is not the theory of the law even in regard to taxation. The block of buildings we have supposed is liable to taxation only upon its value in proportion to the value of the entire property, to be ascertained by assessment, and when the proportion is ascertained or paid it is no longer or further liable. It is discharged. The residue of the tax is to be obtained from other sources. There may be repeated taxes and assessments to make up delinquencies, but the principle and general rule of law are as we have stated.

In relation to the corporation before us, this objection to the liability of individual property for the payment of a corporate debt is presented in a specific form. It is of a statutory character.

The remedies for the collection of a debt are essential parts of the contract of indebtedness, and those in existence at the time it is incurred must be substantially preserved to the creditor. Thus a statute prohibiting the exercise of its taxing power by the city to raise money for the payment of these bonds would be void. (Van Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 535.) But it is otherwise of statutes which are in existence at the time the debt is contracted. Of these the creditor must take notice, and if all the remedies are preserved to him which were in existence when his debt was contracted, he has no cause of complaint. (Cooley Const. Lim. 285 287.)

By section 9 of the defendant's charter (Priv. Laws, ch. 237, p. 667) it is enacted as follows: "Nor shall any real or personal property of any inhabitant of said city, or any individual or corporation, be levied upon or sold by virtue of any execution issued to satisfy or collect any debt, obligation or contract of said city."

If the power of taxation is conceded not to be applicable, and the power of the court is invoked to collect the money as upon an execution to satisfy a contract or obligation of the city, this section is directly applicable and forbids the proceeding. The process or order asked for is in the nature of an execution; the property proposed to be sold is that of an inhabitant of the city; the purpose to which it is to be applied is the satisfaction of a debt of the city. The proposed remedy is in direct violation of a statute in existence when the debt was incurred and made known to the creditor with the same solemnity as the statute which gave power to contract the debt. All laws in existence when the contract is made are necessarily referred to in it, and form a part of the measure of the obligation of the one party and of the right acquired by the other. (Cooley Const. Lim. 285.)

But independently of this statute upon the general principles of law and of equity jurisprudence, we are of opinion that we cannot grant the relief asked for. The plaintiff invokes the aid of the principle that all legal remedies having failed, the court of chancery must give him a remedy; that there is a wrong which cannot be righted elsewhere, and hence the right must be sustained in chancery. The difficulty arises from too broad an application of a general principle. The great advantage possessed by the court of chancery is not so much in its enlarged jurisdiction as in the extent and adaptability of its remedial powers. Generally its jurisdiction is as well defined and limited as that of a court of law. It cannot exercise jurisdiction when there is an adequate and complete remedy at law. It cannot assume control over that large class of obligations called imperfect obligations, resting upon conscience and moral duty only, unconnected with legal obligations. Judge STORY says "there are cases of fraud, of accident and of trusts which neither courts of law or of equity presume to relieve or to mitigate," of which he cites many instances. (1 Story Eq. Jur., § 61.) Lord Talbot says "there are cases, indeed, in which a court of equity gives remedy where the law gives none, but where a particular remedy is given by law, and that remedy is bounded and circumscribed by particular rules, it would be very improper for this court to take it up where the law leaves it and extend it further than the law allows." (Heard v. Stanford, Cas. Temp. Talbot, 174, cited Story, sup.)

Generally its jurisdiction depends upon legal obligations, and its decrees can only enforce remedies to the extent and in the mode by law established. With the subjects of fraud, trust or accident when properly before it, it can deal more completely than can a court of law. These subjects, however, may arise in courts of law and there be well disposed of. (1 Story Eq. Jur. § 60.)

A court of equity cannot, by avowing that there is a right, but no remedy known to the law, create a remedy in violation of law or even without the authority of law. It acts upon established principles not only, but through established channels. Thus assume that the plaintiff is entitled to the payment of his judgment, and that the defendant neglected its duty in refusing to raise the amount by taxation, it does not follow that this court may order the amount to be made from the private estate of one of its citizens. This summary proceeding would involve a violation of the rights of the latter. He has never been heard in court. He has had no opportunity to establish a defence to the debt itself, or, if the judgment is valid, to show that his property is not liable to its payment. It is well settled that legislative exemptions from taxation are valid, that such exemptions may be perpetual in their duration, and that they are in some cases beyond legislative interference. The proceeding supposed would violate that fundamental principle contained in chapter 29 of Magna Charta, and embodied in the constitution of the United States, that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law—that is, he must be served with notice of the proceeding and have a day in court to make his defence. (Westervelt v. Greig, 12 N. Y. 209.)

Digitized by Google

"Due process of law (it is said) undoubtedly means in the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." (Ib.) In the New England states it is held that a judgment obtained against a town may be levied upon and made out of the property of any inhabitant of the town. The suit in those states is brought in form against the inhabitants of the town, naming it; the individual inhabitants, it is said, may and do appear and defend the suit, and hence it is held that the individual inhabitants have their day in court, are each bound by the judgment, and that it may be collected from the property of any one of them. (See the cases collected in Cooley Const. Lim. 240 to 245.) This is local law peculiar to New England. It is not the law of this country generally, or of England. (Russell v. Men of Devon, 2 T. R. 667.) It has never been held to be the law in New York, New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, nor, as stated by Mr. Cooley, in any of the Western states. (See Emeric v. Gilman, 10 Cal. R. 408, where all the cases are collected.) So far as it rests upon the rule that these municipalities have no common fund, and that no other mode exists by which demands against them can be enforced, he says that it cannot be considered as applicable to those states where provision is made for compulsory taxation to satisfy judgments against a town or city. (Cooley Const. Lim. 246.)

The general principle of law to which we have adverted is not disturbed by these references. It is applicable to the case before us. Whether, in fact, the individual has a defence to the debt, or by way of exemption, or is without defence, is not important. To assume that he has none, and therefore that he is entitled to no day in court, is to assume against him the very point he may wish to contest.

Again, in the case of Emeric v. Gilman, before cited, it is said: "The inhabitans of a county are constantly changing; those who contributed to the debt may be non-residents upon the recovery of the judgment or the levy of the execution. Those who opposed the creation of the liability may be subjected to its payment, while those by whose fault the burden has been imposed may be entirely relieved of responsibility. * * * To enforce this right against an inhabitant of a county would lead to such a multiplicity of suits as to render the right valueless." We do not perceive, if the doctrine contended for is correct, why the money might not be entirely made from the property owned by the creditor himself, if he should happen to own property within the limits of the corporation of sufficient value for that purpose.

The difficulty and the embarrassment arising from an apportionment or contribution among those bound to make the payment, we do not regard as a serious objection. Contribution and apportionment are recognized heads of equity jurisdiction, and if it be assumed that process could issue directly against the citizens to collect the debt of the city, a court of equity could make the apportionment more conveniently than could a court of law. (1 Story Eq. Jur., § 470 and onwards.)

We apprehend, also, that there is some confusion in the plaintiff's proposition, upon which the present jurisdiction is claimed. It is conceded, and the authorities are too abundant to admit a question, that there is no chancery jurisdiction where there is an adequate remedy at law. The writ of mandamus is, no doubt, the regular remedy in a case like the present, and ordinarily it is adequate and its results are satisfactory. The plaintiff alleges, however, in the present case, that he has issued such a writ on three different occasions; that by means of the aid afforded by the legislature, and by the devices and contrivances set forth in the bill, the writs have been fruitless; that, in fact, they afford him no remedy. The remedy is in law and in theory adequate and perfect. The difficulty is in its execution only. The want of a remedy and the inability to obtain the fruits of a remedy are quite distinct, and yet they are confounded in the present proceeding. To illustrate: the writ of habere facias possessionem is the established remedy to obtain the fruits of a judgment for the plaintiff in ejectment. It is a full, adequate, and complete remedy. Not many years since there existed in central New York combinations of settlers and tenants, disguised as Indians, and calling themselves such, who resisted the execution of this process in their counties, and so effectually that for some years no landlord could gain possession of his land. There was a perfect remedy at law, but through fraud, violence or crime, its execution was prevented. It will hardly be argued that this state of things gave authority to invoke the extraordinary aid of a court of chancery. The enforcement of the legal remedies was temporarily suspended by means of illegal violence, but the remedies remained as before. It was the case of a miniature revolution. The courts of law lost no power, the court of chancery gained none. The present case stands upon the same principle. The legal remedy is adequate and complete, and time and the law must perfect its execution.

Entertaining the opinion that the plaintiff has been unreasonably obstructed in the pursuit of his legal remedies, we should be quite willing to give him the aid requested if the law permitted it. We cannot, however, find authority for so doing, and we acquiesce in the conclusion of the court below that the bill must be dismissed.

DECREE AFFIRMED.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD.—I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case upon the ground that equity will never suffer a trust to be defeated by the refusal of the trustee to administer the fund, or on account of the misconduct of the trustee, and also because the effect of the decree in the court below, if affirmed by this court, will be to give judicial sanction to a fraudulent repudiation of an honest debt. For which reasons, as it seems to me, the decree of the subordinate court should be reversed.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE concurring.

The Louisiana Funding Bill—The Federal Courts have no Power to Coerce a State into the Payment of its Supposed Obligations.

MACAULEY ET AL. v. CLINTON, AUDITOR OF LOUISIANA.

STERN BROS. ET AL. v. THE SAME DEFENDANT.

Circuit Court of the United States, District of Louisiana, March 21, 1874.

Before Hon. W. B. WOODS, Circuit Judge.

1. Injunction Against State Officers.—An injunction will not lie against the officers of a state government to restrain them from hindering or delaying the estimate, levy and collection of taxes. Such an injunction is in its nature mandatory, and a mandatory injunction for such a purpose will not lie. If there were any remedy at all, it would be by mandamus.

Digitized by Google

2. ——. For the same reason an injunction will not lie to restrain an officer of a state government from receiving delinquent taxes in auditor's warrants.

3 Remedy against State to Compel Payment of its Debt—Jurisdiction of Federal Courts.—No power exists in the federal courts to compel the officers of a state government to proceed with the execution of the laws of the state which prescribe means of raising revenue for the payment of the state's obligations. Any proceeding of this kind is, in effect, a suit against the state, and is prohibited by the 11th amendment to the federal constitution.

The following is the substance of the opinion:

WOODS, J.—[After stating the case.]

It is obvious to remark that there are insuperable objections to so much of the prayer for relief as asks that the defendants may be decreed to comply with and specifically perform the contracts of the state by estimating and collecting the interest and sinking fund taxes and applying it to the payment of the principal and interest on the bonds. The objection is, that if there is a remedy at all, it is a remedy at law, namely, by the issuance of the writ of mandamus. If this suit were brought against a municipal corporation and its officers to compel the collection of a tax to pay the interest on its bonds, the plain, adequate and complete remedy would be the legal writ of mandamus. It is true that before the writ could issue the bondholders must have received a judgment at law on their bonds. Bath County v. Amy, 13 Wallace, 247. It may be replied to this that the bondholders cannot lay the necessary foundation for the writ of mandamus in the United States courts, because they are prohibited from suing the state by the eleventh amendment to the constitution of the United States. But this fact may prove that there is no remedy for the complainants in the United States courts. It certainly does not follow that because there are obstacles to the adoption of the plain legal remedy that therefore the remedy is in equity. It might as well be claimed that because the bondholder could not go into a court of law and secure a judgment against the state upon his bonds, he might therefore go into equity and seek a decree against the officers of the state for the amount due on his bonds. Where the eleventh amendment to the constitution declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit at law or in equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or subjects of any foreign state," the purpose is clear to exempt states from suits upon their contracts, either at law or in equity, and the fact that this amendment interposes an obstacle to a suit at law against a state does not give a court of equity jurisdiction to enforce the same contract on the pretext that there is no remedy at law. Suits in both forms against a state are prohibited. It is evident, therefore, that should this bill come on for final hearing the decree prayed for could not be granted.

We may, however, consider the bill as one for injunction only, and the question now presented is, can or ought the court to allow the injunction to go as prayed for? It is claimed by the bill, and conceded by the counsel for defendants, that the bonds of the state of Louisiana held by the complainants are contracts; that the laws under which the bonds were issued, and which provide for the levy and collection of taxes to pay the interest and reduce the principal, and declaring that the same should be annually continued until the principal and interest of said bonds were fully paid—that these provisions of law entered into and formed a part of the contract between the state and the bondholder, just as completely as if the laws themselves were entered in the body of the bonds. The state has, therefore, contracted that at a certain date named in the bonds she would pay the principal; that in the meantime she will pay the interest semi-annually to the holders of the bonds; and as an assurance that this part of her contract will be performed, she promises further that she will levy and collect an annual tax to make these payments, and that the revenue raised by this tax shall be set apart for the purpose of paying said interest and principal. It is conceded that the state has made this contract with the complainant in this case.

Now to what ends is the injunction sought for in this case? They are two-fold. First, to compel the officers of the state to execute the contracts of the state by estimating, levying, collecting and applying to the payment of the bonds the tax originally provided by law for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal. It is true the prayer for injunction is that the officers of the state may be restrained from hindering or delaying the estimate, levy and collection of the tax, etc. But as the defendants are the officers whose duty it is to estimate, levy and collect, it is clear that such an injunction from this court would be mandatory, and compel the performance of affirmative acts. Second, to restrain the state officers from receiving delinquent taxes in auditor's warrants instead of lawful money of the United States. The first question presented by the prayer for injunction is: Can the officers of the state be compelled by injunction to do an affirmative act? The complainant claims that the funding bill and the act of March 14th, 1874, which in effect prohibits the collection of taxes for the payment of the principal and interest of the outstanding bonds of the state, are unconstitutional and therefore void. If this be conceded, then the case is in the same plight as if these acts just named had never been passed, and as if the officers of the state, without pretence of warrant of law, were refusing to levy and collect the taxes which the state had agreed should be levied and collected and applied to the payment of these bonds. Has this court the power, by injunction, to do an affirmative act? The authorities are adverse. The case of Walkley v. City of Muscatine, 6th Wallace, 483, was a bill in equity to compel the authorities of the city of Muscatine to levy a tax upon the property of the inhabitants for the purpose of paying the interest on certain bonds issued by the city. It appeared that a judgment had been rendered in the same court against the city for $7,666, interest due on bonds held by plaintiff; that execution had been issued and returned unsatisfied, no property being found liable to execution; that the mayor and aldermen had been requested to levy a tax to pay the judgment, but had refused; that the city authorities possessed the power, under their charter, to levy a tax of one per cent. on the valuation of the city property, and had made a levy annually, but had appropriated the proceeds to other purposes, and had wholly neglected to pay the interest upon the bonds. The bill prayed that the mayor and aldermen might be decreed to levy the tax and appropriate so much of the proceeds as might be sufficient to pay the judgment, interest and costs. Upon this case the supreme court say: "We are of the opinion that complainant has mistaken the appropriate remedy in the case, which was by writ of mandamus from the circuit court. We have been furnished with no authority for the substitution of a bill in equity and injunction for the writ of mandamus. An injunction is generally a preventive writ, not an affirmative remedy. It is sometimes used in the latter character, but this is in cases where it is used by the courts to carry into effect its own decrees, as in putting the purchaser under a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage into posession of the premises. Even the exercise of this power was doubted till the case of Kershaw v. Thompson, 4th Johnson, 609, in which the learned chancellor, after an examination of the cases in England on the subject, came to the conclusion he possessed it—not, however, by the writ of injunction, but by the writ of assistance."

A consideration of the second branch of the injunction asked, namely, to restrain the state officers from receiving delinquent taxes in auditor's warrants, will show that this is an indirect way of praying for an injunction to compel the state officers to receive the delinquent taxes in lawful money of the United States, according to the contract of the state as claimed by complainants. The complainant would not be satisfied should the state officers suspend the receipt of state warrants. The evident purpose of this part of the injunction is to compel them to receive lawful money; for, unless the officers, after declining to receive auditor's warrants, proceed to collect the taxes in lawful money, the complainant would take no advantage from his motion. But the fatal objection to the motion of complainant is found in the character of his bill: it is either a suit in effect against the state of Louisiana, or if not, the parties defendant are merely nominal parties having no interest in the controversy. In either case no decree can be made.

Digitized by Google

In the case of Kentucky v. Denison, Governor, 24th Howard, 109, it was held that neither the congress nor the courts of the United States could coerce a state officer, as such, to perform any duty imposed upon him by act of congress. Does it not follow a fortiori that a court of the United States cannot compel the governor of a state to execute a law passed by the state?

In the view I have herein taken of the case, I have conceded what the complainants claim, that the funding bill and the act of March 14, 1874, are both unconstitutional and void, and have regarded the case just as if those acts had never been passed, to-wit: a bill to compel the defendants, officers of the state, to execute its laws. This may be done in the case of officers of municipal corporations, but the sovereign power of a state cannot be so coerced. To do so would be to substitute this court for the executive officers of the state, to supplant their views of duty and the obligations imposed upon them by their official oaths, by the discretion of this court and its official oath. In other words, it would be an undertaking upon the part of this court to administer the state government. This the court has no power and no inclination to do. In my judgment this is, to all intents and purposes, a suit against the state. The officers of the state, including the chief executive, are sued in their official capacity to compel them to execute the laws of the state. It is a suit to enforce the contract of the state to pay money; the officers are not sued as individuals who happen to be in public offices, to prevent them from doing some act to the prejudice of complainant not warranted by law, as was the case of Osborne v. The Bank and Davis v. Grey. If a suit like this can be maintained, then the 11th amendment to the constitution of the United States is waste paper..

Bankrupt Act—Fraudulent Preference by Insolvent.

THOMAS J. BARTHOLOW, JAMES W. LEWIS, BENJAMIN W. LEWIS, JR., AND JOHN D. PERRY, PLAINTIFFS IN ERROR, v. WILLIAM C. BEAN, ASSIGNEE OF CHARLES S. KINTZING, BANKRUPT.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 171, October Term, 1873.

1. Bankrupt Act—Fraudulent Preference.—A payment by an insolvent, which would otherwise be void as a preference under sections thirty-five and thirty-nine of the bankrupt law, is not excepted out of that provision because it was made to a holder of his note over-due, on which there was a solvent endorser whose liability was already fixed by protest and notice.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Districts of Missouri.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs in error were bankers in the city of St. Louis, with whom Kintzing & Co. kept a bank account, and they had discounted the note of Kintzing & Co. for $2,500, dated January 15th, 1869, payable in sixty days, endorsed by J. B. Wilcox. Before its maturity Wilcox, who was solvent, waived protest and notice, and the note remained unpaid until August 9th, when Kintzing paid the amount to plaintiffs in error.

In the meantime Kintzing & Co. failed in business, and in February attempted a composition with their creditors at seventy cents on the dollar, in notes payable in six, twelve, and eighteen months. Plaintiffs in error did not sign this agreement, though they knew of it, and that effort seems to have failed. It must be conceded that Kintzing was utterly insolvent when he paid the note, and this must have been known to plaintiffs in error.

A petition in bankruptcy was filed against Kintzing within less than four months after the payment of the note, and Bean, the defendant in error, having been appointed assignee, brought the present suit to recover the money so paid, as being a preference of a creditor forbidden by the bankrupt law.

If it were a transaction solely between Kintzing and the bankers there seems to be no reason to doubt that the payment was such a preference as would enable the assignee to recover it back. But the case is not a little embarrassed by the fact that the endorser, Wilcox, was solvent, and was liable on the note to the bankers; and the question arises whether, under such circumstances, they were at liberty to refuse to receive payment of the principal without losing their claim upon the endorser, who was probably a mere accommodation surety. It is a question not without difficulty.

It is very true that an ingenious argument is made to show that by an arrangement between Kintzing and his partner the former assumed all the debts under the attempted compromise, and took all the property of the former, and that, by reason of the partial success of the compromise, Kintzing was no longer insolvent. But the facts in the finding of the court leave no room to doubt that Kintzing was, after the failure, always insolvent, in the sense of being unable to pay his current over-due debts, and of this plaintiffs could not be unaware, since they held the note, on which they received the money now sued for, about five months after its maturity, without payment, and without their signing the compromise paper. They must, therefore, have known that, in the sense of the bankrupt law, Kintzing had been insolvent for months before they received payment.

Does the fact that Wilcox, the endorser, was solvent, and was liable, change the rule as to payment as a preference?

The statute in express terms forbids such preference, not only to any ordinary creditor of the bankrupt, but to any person who is under any liability for him; and it not only forbids payment, but it forbids any transfer or pledge of property as security to indemnify such persons. It is therefore very evident that the statute did not intend to place an endorser or other surety in any better position in this regard than the principal creditor, and that if the payment in the case before us had been made to the endorser, it would have been recoverable by the assignee. If the endorser had paid the note, as he was legally bound to do, when it fell due, or at any time afterwards, and then received the amount of the bankrupt, it would certainly have been recovered of him. Or if the money had been paid to him directly instead of the holder of the note, it could have been recovered; or if this money or other property had been placed in his hand to meet the note or to secure him instead of paying it to the bankers, he would have been liable. He would not, therefore, have been placed in any worse position than he already occupied if the holders of the note had refused to receive the money of the bankrupt. It is very obvious that the statute intended, in pursuit of its policy of equal distribution, to exclude both the holder of the note and the surety or endorser from the right to receive payment from the insolvent bankrupt. It is forbidden. It is called a fraud upon the statute in one place and an evasion of it in another. It was made by the statute equally the duty of the holder of the note and of the endorser to refuse to receive such a payment.

Under these circumstances, whatever might have been the right of the endorser, in the absence of the bankrupt law, to set up a tender by the debtor and a refusal of the note-holder to receive payment, as a defence to a suit against him as endorser, no court of law or equity could sustain such a defence, while that law furnishes the paramount rule of conduct for all the parties to the transaction; and when in obeying the mandates of that law the endorser is placed in no worse position than he was before, while by receiving the money the holder of the note makes himself liable to a judgment for the amount in favor of the bankrupt's assignee, and loses his right to recover either of the endorser or of the bankrupt's estate.

Digitized by Google

We are of opinion, therefore, notwithstanding the hardship of the case, which is more apparent than real, that the payment must be held to be a preference within the bankrupt law, and that the judgment of the court below, that the assignee should recover it, must be affirmed.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

The Indiana Liquor Law.

What is called the "Baxter Law" of Indiana is said to provide that the commissioners of any county shall not allow a man to sell liquor unless he first obtains the signatures to his petition of a majority of the voters of the county. Suits for damages may be brought against a liquor seller who has sold liquor to an habitual drunkard, by a variety of persons, friends or relatives, of the drunkard, or even, in some cases, by the township trustee. None of the permissions granted to saloon keepers permit liquor selling on Sundays or holidays. In many of the large towns the law is a failure. In such places no dealer finds it difficult to procure the requisite number of signers to his petition; but the country press generally supports the law, and in the country towns the majority of the voters refuse to lend their names to those who are petitioning for permission to sell. It is said that the law has thus far stood the test of judicial examination except that the supreme court has declared unconstitutional the 9th section, which declares it to be unlawful to become intoxicated, and which provides that all intoxicated persons may be arrested and forced to disclose the name of the dealer who sold the liquor.

The Fourteenth Amendment and the State Liquor Laws.

The liquor sellers of Iowa have been reduced to such straits by the recent temperance legislation of that state, that they not long since got up a test case and took it to the Supreme Court of the United States, to see if they could not get some relief under the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution. The case was argued at the same time with the Louisiana slaughter-house cases (16 Wall. 36), but a decision was not rendered until March 4th. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice MILLER. It will be found in full in the Washington Chronicle of March 17th. The court express, in substance, the view that the right to sell such liquors is not one of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which by the fourteenth amendment the states are forbidden to abridge; but they say that if a case were presented in which a person owned liquor, and while so owning it a law was passed by the state absolutely prohibiting any sale, it would be a very grave question whether such a law would not be inconsistent with the provisions of that amendment which forbids the state to deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.

But the court further say, in substance, that while the court below attempt to present this question, the record fails to raise it; first, because the plea which is taken as true does not state in due form, by positive allegation, the time when the defendant became the owner of the liquor sold; and secondly, because the court are satisfied, from an examination of the record, that the case is but a moot case, made up to obtain the opinion of the court on a grave constitutional question without the existence of facts necessary to raise that question. In such a case, where the supreme court of the state from whence the cause comes has not considered the question, the Supreme Court of the United States will not feel at liberty to go out of its usual course to decide it.

Mr. Justice FIELD and Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered concurring opinions, in which they took occasion to restate the grounds of their dissent from the opinion of a majority of the court in the slaughter-house cases, in order to correct some apparent misapprehension of their views as to the fourteenth amendment. We have not seen these separate opinions; but from a note in the Albany Law Journal, we learn that Mr. Justice FIELD says that the judges who dissented in those cases never contended that the fourteenth amendment interferes, in any respect, with the police power of the state, but that, on the contrary, "they recognized the power of the state in its fullest extent, observing that it embraced all regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace and safety of society; that all sorts of restrictions and burdens were imposed under it, and that, when these were not in conflict with any constitutional prohibition or fundamental principles, they could not be successfully assailed in a judicial tribunal. But they said that, under the pretence of prescribing a police regulation, the state could not be permitted to encroach upon any of the just rights of the citizen, which the constitution intended to guard against abridgment; and because, in their opinion, the act of Louisiana, then under consideration, went far beyond the province of a police regulation, and created an oppressive and odious monopoly, thus directly impairing the common rights of the citizens of the state, they dissented from the judgment of the court. * * * It was because the act of Louisiana transcended the limits of police regulation and asserted a power in the state to farm out the ordinary avocations of life, that dissent was made to the judgment of the court sustaining the validity of the act." The judge continues: "The amendment was not, as held in the opinion of the majority, primarily intended to confer citizenship upon the negro race. It had a much broader purpose; it was intended to justify legislation extending the protection of the national government over the common rights of all citizens of the United States, and thus obviate objections to the legislation adopted for the protection of the emancipated race. It was intended to make it possible for all persons, which necessarily included those of every race and color, to live in peace and security wherever the jurisdiction of the nation reached. It therefore recognized, if it did not create, a national citizenship, and made all persons citizens, except those who preferred to remain under the protection of a foreign government, and declared that their privileges and immunities. which embrace the fundamental rights belonging to citizens of all free governments, should not be abridged by any state. This national citizenship is primary and not secondary. It clothes its possessor, or would do so if not shorn of its efficiency by construction, with the right, when his privileges or immunities are invaded by partial or discriminating legislation, to appeal from his state to his nation, and gives him the assurance that, for his protection, he can invoke the whole power of the government." The views of Mr. Justice BRADLEY were to the same effect, and were concurred in by Mr Justice SWAYNE.

Supreme Court of Missouri—Abstract of Decisions at the March Term, 1874.

Interpretation—Charter of Missouri Loan Bank.—Missouri Loan Bank v. John Haw and Giles F. Filley. This case involves the interpretation of the charter of the Missouri Loan Bank, which provides that the bank shall have power "to loan money upon personal security and the pledge of goods and chattels," etc. The question comes up in this way: The defendant Haw borrowed $4,000 from the bank and executed his note for that amount to Filley, who, for the accommodation of Haw, endorsed it to the bank. The note having been dishonored, the bank brings this action jointly against the maker and endorser. The endorser, Filley, alleges that he is an endorser for the accommodation of Haw merely, and further alleges that the bank by the terms of its charter had no power to lend money upon personal security merely, and that the note is hence wholly void and he not liable. But the court hold otherwise. The provision of the bank's charter is interpreted as though it read "the association shall have power to lend money upon personal security, and shall also have power to lend money upon the pledge of goods and chattels." The case of North River Insurance Company v. Lawrence, 3 Wendell, 482, is examined and distinguished. The judgment below, that the plaintiff recover on the note, is here affirmed. VORIES, J., delivered the opinion. NAPTON, J., having been of counsel, did not sit. SHERWOOD, J., absent. The other judges concurred.

Action on Account Stated—Impeachment of Account.—Dominic Kronenberger v. Stephen Kinz. This was an action on an account stated. Upon the facts the court hold: 1. That there was no error in excluding the evidence offered to impeach the settlement, no foundation for the introduction of such evidence having been laid in the pleadings. 2. That the amount found in favor of the plaintiff by the settlement was due from the time of the settlement. But the defendant had a right to extend the time by the execution of his notes to the plaintiff in payment of the amount found due; and having agreed to do so, and then having failed to comply with his agreement, the right of action accrued immediately to the plaintiff. Judgment affirmed. ADAMS, J., delivered the opinion. The other judges concur.

Digitized by Google

Wife's Separate Estate Charged by Executing Note.—John Meyers v. Adaline H. Van Wagoner et al. In this case Mrs. Van Wagoner, a married woman, executed to the plaintiff her promissory note in lieu of a note which the plaintiff held against her son by a former marriage, who was insolvent. She at the same time took up and destroyed her son's note. This note, thus given by Mrs. Van Wagoner, was renewed by her by giving a second note, she thus procuring an extension of time. In these transactions nothing was said about charging her separate estate. The second note having been dishonored, suit was brought upon the same. Mrs. Van Wagoner pleaded want of consideration, and on the trial testified that in these transactions she had no intention of charging her separate estate. But the court hold: 1. That the note is supported by a good consideration. 2. That by executing her promissory note, the law implies that she intended to charge her separate estate; otherwise the doing of it would be entirely nugatory. The court cite Metropolitan Bank v. Taylor, 53 Mo. Judgment for the plaintiff is affirmed. ADAMS, J., delivered the opinion. SHERWOOD, J., absent. The other judges concurring.

Open and Notorious Adultery—The Missouri Statute Expounded.—State v. John D. Crowner and Nettie Gordon. The defendants were indicted under the Missouri statute for open and notorious adultery. The Missouri statute is as follows: "Every person who shall live in a state of open and notorious adultery, and every man or woman, one or both of whom are married and not to each other, who shall lewdly and lasciviously abide and cohabit with each other, and every person married or unmarried, who shall be guilty of open, gross lewdness or lascivious behavior, or of any open and notorious act of public indecency, grossly scandalous, shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor," etc. The indictment pursued the statute. The proof was that the defendant, Crowner, a married man, and the defendant, Nettie Gordon, a single woman, took a private room in St. Louis, paid a month's rent in advance, and lived there for three days, apparently as man and wife, the man being away part of the time. The trial was before the court, a jury being waived. The defendants asked, among others, the following declaration of law: "That if the court, sitting as a jury, shall find from the evidence that the defendants were not living together in a state of open and notorious adultery, but were simply, at the time charged in the information, stopping together in the same room occasionally, and were only guilty of occasional acts of illicit intercourse, then the court should find the defendants not guilty." This declaration the court below refused, and this refusal is here assigned as error.

J. G. Lodge. for the appellants, cited and argued from the cases quoted by the court, infra. J. C. Normile, prosecuting attorney, contra.

The court hold that the refusal of the declaration of law above set forth was error, and also that under the facts proved the conviction cannot be sustained. The court say: "The statute contemplates three different classes of offences. The first, and the one for which the defendants in this case are prosecuted, applies only to persons who live in a state of open and notorious adultery, and the offence under that clause of the statute can only be committed by a married person. The second class of offences can only be committed by a man or woman, one or both of whom are married and not to each other, and who shall lewdly and laciviously abide and cohabit with each other, etc. The third class of offences provided for may be committed by any person, either married or unmarried. The defendants in this case are charged with living in a state of open and notorious adultery. The offence consists of an open and notorious living or cohabitating together. Occasional illicit intercourse will not constitute the offence. The statute was intended to provide against persons who, in defiance of morality and the good or well being of society, should openly live together. They must reside together publicly in the face of society, as if the conjugal relation existed between them. Their illicit intercourse must be habitual. (Wright v. State, 5 Blackf. 358; Seares v. People, 13 Ill. 597; State v. Gartrell, 14 Ind. 380; Dameron v. State, 8 Mo. 494.) I would not be understood to say that the cohabiting and abiding together must be for any great length of time. Perhaps a short time would do. But the parties must live together in an open and notorious manner, to the evil example of society. Simply having occasional illicit intercourse, without a public or notorious living together, as the evidence in this case tends to prove, is certainly not sufficient."

Judgment reversed; VORIES, J., delivering the opinion. SHERWOOD, J., absent. The other judges concurring.

Recent Reports.

MISSOURI REPORTS, VOL. 53. Reports of Cases Argued and Adjudged in the Supreme Court of Missouri. By TRUMAN A. POST, Reporter. Vol. 53. Embracing part of the June term, 1873, at Jefferson City, and part of the October term, 1873, at St. Louis. St. Louis: W. J. Gilbert. 1874 Price $4.

Hons. DAVID WAGNER, WASH. ADAMS, H. M. VORIES, T. A. SHERWOOD, E. B. EWING, and W. B. NAPTON, Judges.

In size and appearance this volume does not differ from its predecessors. The editorial and mechanical work are very fairly done—certainly as well done as the meagre compensation allowed by the state will admit of. We note the following cases of interest:

Bills and Notes—Conditional Acceptance.—The acceptance of an order for money stated therein to be against sums due on a pending contract, is a conditional acceptance, and a subsequent breach of the contract by the drawer may be a good defence to a suit on such acceptance. Crowell v. Plant, 145.

———. Liability of Surety who Signs with Particular Agreement as to Co-surety.—Where one becomes surety on a non-negotiable promissory note on the express condition that another shall be procured as co-surety, and the latter fails to sign, the surety will not be liable, although the note is in the hands of a holder having no notice of the agreement. As to the surety, while the condition remains unperformed, the instrument is merely an escrow and there is no delivery. Ayres v. Milroy, 516.

———. Agreement to Obtain Co-surety—Maker Agent of Surety.—Although a surety upon a note is induced to sign upon the promise of the maker that a co-surety shall be joined, yet if nothing on the face of the paper imparts notice to the holder, or puts him on enquiry as to such agreement, no fault attaches to the latter, and the surety must run the risk of the fraud of his own agent. Per NAPTON, J.; SHERWOOD, J., concurring. Id.

———. Notice to Endorser—Due Diligence, what is.—A notary public not knowing the residence of an endorser, on the day of protest made enquiry at the bank in St. Louis, where the note was payable, and at the place of business of another endorser, and examined the city directory to ascertain the residence, but without success. He thereupon placed the notice in the city post-office. The evidence showed that other endorsers could have given the desired information, and that one of them lived in East St. Louis, immediately across the river. Held, that it was the duty of the notary to enquire at least of all the parties to the note, if accessible, and that he might have prosecuted his enquiries for that purpose for several days; that there was no search made such as the law requires, and that putting the notice in the post-office, under the circumstances, amounted to nothing. Gilchrist v. Donnell, 591.

———. ———. Residence—Presumption as to Service of Notice Must be Made, How.—There is no presumption that an endorser resides in the town or city where the bill or note is made payable. If such be the fact, notice cannot be served by depositing it in the post-office, but the service must be personal, or by leaving it at the usual place of business of the endorser, or with his family at his domicile. Id.

Criminal Law—Association with Thieves.—An individual may associate with thieves, &c., without being guilty of any offence, for it is not the business of the legislature to keep guard over individual morality; but if such person so associate with a design to aid, abet or promote, or in any way assist the parties charged with, or suspected of, being thieves, prohibitory legislation may be applied, not to correct the evil consequences which such association may bring on the individual, but to protect society from actual or anticipated breaches of law. City of St. Louis v. Fitz, 582.

———. ———. St. Louis Ordinance.—The ordinance of the city of St. Louis (City Ord. chap. 20, art. 4, § 1), prohibiting the "knowingly associating with persons having the reputation of being thieves and prostitutes," is void, as invading the right of personal liberty. Per SHERWOOD, J., concurring. Id.

Evidence—Surgical Examination at the Trial.—The proposal of counsel in a damage suit, to have surgeons called in during the progress of the trial to examine plaintiff as to the extent of his injuries, is unknown to the law, and the court has no power to enforce such an order. Loyd v. H. & St. Jo. R. R. Co., 509.

Female Suffrage—Fourteenth Amendment.—There is no conflict between the constitution of the state and the registration laws restricting the right of voting to male citizens, and the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States. Minor v. Happersett, 58.

Husband and Wife—Married Women as Witnesses—Missouri Statute.—Section 5 of the statute concerning witnesses (W. S 1373), holding married women incompetent to testify as to admissions and conversations of their husbands, was intended to apply to all cases, whether the husband was a party or not. Moore v. Wingate, 398.

Municipal Corporations—Special Taxes—Streets—Re-paving—Assessment of Benefits.—The power to grade and improve streets is a legislative power, and is a continuing one unless there is some special restraint imposed in the charter of the corporation. It may be exercised from time to time as the wants of the municipal corporation may require, and of the necessity or expediency of its exercise the governing body of the corporation, and not the courts, is the jndge; and it follows that the power to compel the property-owners to pave generally, extends to compelling them to re-pave when required by the municipal authorities. If the first paving of a street is a special benefit to the front proprietor, justifying the imposition on him of a portion of the expense, so the removal of an insufficient pavement and the making of a new and sufficient one in its stead, is a matter of special benefit to the front proprietor, although it may be also of general utility. McCormack v. Patchin, 33.

———. Improvement of Streets—Personal Judgments.—Personal judgments against the owner of property in a city, on account of assessments for improvements of streets, &c., are null and void, and statutes authorizing such judgments are unconstitutional and void. City of St. Louis v. Clemens, 36 Mo. 467, and Id. 49 Mo. 552, overruled. City of St. Louis to Use, etc., v. Allen, 44.

———. Judgments—Interest—Assessments for Street Improvements in City of St. Louis.—The 15 per cent. interest in suits on assessments for street improvements should be allowed to the time of the verdict, but the judgment rendered thereon should bear six per cent. interest. Id.

———. Liability for Losses by Fires.—A grant by the legislature to a city of power to establish a fire department, confers a legislative or discretionary power, and does not render the city liable, if the power is exercised, for losses occurring through fires. Heller v. The Mayor, &c., of Sedalia, 159.

———. Liability for Damages in Changing Grade of Streets.—A city is not liable for the damages which may accrue to a property-owner merely from a change in the grade of the streets. Schattner v. The City of Kansas, 162.

———. ———. Charter of Kansas City.—The charter of the city of Kansas required the city council, as soon as practicable, to establish the grades of all the streets in the city, to prepare and exhibit to public view a map thereof, and thereafter only to change such grade after due public notice, etc. Held, that the city could not be held liable in damages at the suit of a private party for not obeying this provision of its charter. Id.

Railway Law—Refusal of Passenger to Surrender Ticket.—A passenger on a railroad train, who exhibits his ticket and demands a seat, need not surrender the ticket till the seat is furnished. Davis v. K. C., St. Joe and Council Bluffs R. R. Co., 317.

———. ———. Damage, for Expelling Passenger—Failure to Furnish Seat, etc.—A. buys a ticket from Winthrop to Bigelow on the K. C. and St. J. R. R. The cars are crowded. He refused to surrender his ticket till provided with a seat, and is ordered to leave the train when it shall arrive at Forest City. At this point he procures a seat, and subsequently tenders his fare from thence to Bigelow; but refuses to pay fare from Winthrop or to give up his ticket. Thereupon the conductor declines the amount offered, and not receiving his ticket, ejects him from the train.

In an action for damages by A., based on the original contract for transportation entered into at Winthrop, held, that under the contract, A. would not be entitled to ride from Forest City to Bigelow without surrendering his ticket, or tendering his full fare from Winthrop, and could not maintain his action; although the case might be different where plaintiff set up a new contract entered into at Forest City, and based his action thereon. Id.

Township Law of Missouri.—The act of March 24, 1873, was not designed to interrupt the continuity of the act of March 24, 1872, so as to avoid or annul proceedings under it. The act of 1873 must be construed as a continuation of the act of 1872, both relating to the organization of counties into municipal corporations, the former being designed to correct supposed defects in the latter. State v. County Court Vernon County, 128.

Negligence—Liability of Owners of Real Property.—The owne or occupant of real property is bound, so far as he may be able to do so by the exercise of ordinary care, to keep it in such condition that it will not, by any insufficiency for the purpose to which it is put, injure any passer-by; and he is bound also to use care and diligence to keep the premises in a safe condition for the access of persons who come thereon by his invitation, expressed or implied, for the transaction of business. But he is not bound to make the land or buildings thereon safe for any purpose which is unlawful or improper, or for which he could not reasonably anticipate that they would be used, or for which they obviously were never designed. A mere passive acquiescence on the part of the owner or occupant in the use of real property by others, does not involve him in any liability to them for its unfitness for such use. No duty is imposed upon the owner or occupant to keep his premises in a suitable condition for those who come there solely for their own convenience or pleasure, and who are not either expressly invited to enter, or induced to come upon them by the use for which the premises are appropriated and occupied, or by some preparatory adaptation of the place for use by customers or passengers, which might naturally and reasonably lead them to suppose that they might properly and safely enter. Straub v. Soderer, 38.

———. Liability of Municipal Corporations for Damages caused by Defective Streets.—Municipal corporations are bound to keep their streets in a reasonably safe condition. Failing to do so, they will be liable for all injuries resulting from their negligence. Bassett v. City of St. Joseph, 290.

———. ———. Excavations Bordering on Streets.—The liability of municipalities for damages caused by excavations is not restricted to cases where they actually extend into the street; if travel is thereby rendered dangerous, the authorities are equally bound to protect the public, whether they encroach on the highway or not. And the city is bound for damages resulting from neglect of proper precautions, even though the excavations were not made by its own agents, provided it had received due notice of the existing facts. Id.

———. ———. ———. In a suit against a city to recover damages for injuries caused by plaintiff's falling into an excavation adjacent to a market place, where it appeared that the authorities were notified of the dangerous condition of the thoroughfare, and took no steps to guard the public from accident, and the evidence showed that plaintiff, at the time of the casualty, was exercising ordinary care and prudence, plaintiff would be entitled to recover, although it further appeared that the primary cause contributing to the injury was the attempt of a mule to kick plaintiff, and that in avoiding this peril, he fell or jumped into the excavation. Id.

———. ———. ———. Allegations—Aider by Verdict.—In a suit against a municipal corporation for damages caused by plaintiff's falling into a cellar adjacent to a public street, where the petition charged that the excavation was unlawfully permitted to extend into the street, but the evidence showed that it was not unlawful per se, but became unlawful only in event that it was unlawfully permitted to remain without protection; held, that the petition was good after verdict, notwithstanding such variance. Id.

———. Liability of Railway Companies for Damages from Fire Kindled by Locomotive.—Where grass is set burning by fire escaping from a locomotive, and the owner sues the company, negligence on the part of defendant will be presumed from the escape of the fire, and it devolves upon it, in order to rebut this presumption, to show that proper and safe locomotives and engines were used, and were conducted by the servants of the company in a proper and safe way. In such case the damages claimed would not be held too remote or speculative, although the property consumed was separated from the track by a strip of ground forty or fifty yards wide where the plat was covered with dry grass and other combustible matter. Clemens v. H. and St. J. R. R. Co., 366.

———. Liability of Railway Company for Damages Sustained by Passenger from Jumping from Train while in Motion.—In a suit against a railroad company to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff in getting from the platform of the car upon that of the depot, the evidence showed that the train stopped at the station only a minute; that during that time plaintiff's little child alighted; that plaintiff followed without delay, but after the train was in motion, and received her injuries in consequence of jumping from the train. Held, that the plaintiff would not be barred of recovery by the fact that she jumped from the train while in motion. Id.

Book Notices.

AMERICAN CORPORATION CASES. Edited by THOMAS F. WITHROW, late Reporter of the Supreme Court of Iowa. Vol. 2. Municipal Corporations. Chicago: E. B. Myers. 1874.

The design of this series is to embrace the decisions of the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the United States, and the courts of last resort in the several states since January 1, 1868, of questions peculiar to the law of corporations. The ability with which this volume, as well as the previous one relating to Private Corporations, is edited, admits of no question. Mr. Withrow commenced his professional life as the Reporter of the Supreme Court of Iowa, and as such justly acquired distinction. We do not know of any reporter who surpassed him in the excellence of his work. His power to make a condensed and clear statement of a case, and to put in fewest words the exact point in judgment, is a marked characteristic and results from the logical cast of his mind. The volume before us exemplifies the truth of these observations. Though only of the usual size, it contains about twice as many cases as are ordinarily embraced in a single volume. Mr. Withrow has given much study to corporation law, and is actively engaged in an extensive practice having almost exclusive reference to it, and this adds to his other qualifications to edit acceptably a series of Reports of this character. While we give merited praise to the manner in which his plan is carried out, we nevertheless take the liberty to suggest the wisdom, if not the necessity, of a modification of the plan itself. If the learned editor would hereafter give only the leading cases, or those of general interest, in full, and the rest, if given at all, in a brief and condensed shape, the profession would get in the same space several times as much really valuable matter as at present. We are aware of the objections to which the plan suggested is open, but we think they would soon vanish if Mr. Withrow should demonstrate how possible it is to give the substance of a decision turning on the construction of a statute in the average compass of one or two pages. He would set out the statute, give the point decided, and in a few lines the arguments advanced by the judge in support of the conclusion. The volume before us contains cases for the year 1868, and is published in excellent style.

Digitized by Google

THE BENCH AND BAR REVIEW. January, 1874. Vol. 1. No. 1. Baltimore: ATKINSON SCHAUMBURG. Terms, $5 per annum.

We have before us the first number of this new legal quarterly, containing 200 pages. It is under the editorial management of Atkinson Schaumburg, Esq., of Baltimore. In its general character it is like the American Law Review and the Southern Law Review, a leading feature being essays upon legal topics, and an abstract of recent decisions of the higher courts in Great Britain, and of the federal and state courts of this country. This number contains a portrait of Caleb Cushing and an outline of his life and public and professional career, which we would have been glad to have seen filled up and rounded into more complete proportions. This number is, on the whole, a very excellent one, and the magazine will, in our opinion, prove a valuable addition to our periodical legal literature. We cannot but regard the name selected for it as unfortunate and liable to lead to confusion, since there has been in existence for some years a quarterly publication in Chicago by Callaghan & Co., entitled the "Bench and Bar." One or the other of our contemporaries should be re-christened. As the Chicago magazine has the older and therefore better right to its name, it would seem that the other journal would secure a distinctive name by here after calling itself the Baltimore Law Review.

Legal News and Notes.

—MR. MCCRARY'S bill to regulate inter-state commerce has passed the house of representatives, after a hard contest, by a majority of five. The main feature of this bill is that it provides for the appointment of a board of nine commissioners, who have power to regulate the maximum charges on inter-state railways for the carriage of freight and passengers. It is very doubtful whether it will pass the senate.

—THE Missouri legislature has passed what is known as the "female virtue bill." It makes seduction, under promise of marriage, a felony. We have not seen a text of this act. It is to be hoped it interposes some checks upon the conviction of persons accused of this crime on the testimony of the prosecutrix alone. The value of such evidence and the danger to which men, not more guilty than the injured female, may be subjected to in prosecutions for offences of this kind, are strongly illustrated by the case of State v. Burgdorf, 53 Mo. 65.

—THE house committee on the codification of the laws, treaties, etc., of the United States, of which Mr. Poland, of Vermont, is chairman, has about completed the arduous duty assigned to it of revising these laws. This committee has held regular evening sessions, and its chairman especially has always attended these and worked most assiduously. He has been greatly aided, too, by such members of the committee as Judge HOAR. The comprehensive code of United States laws will all be contained in a single volume of general laws, the treaties and other old matters having a separate volume devoted to them.

—IN Chicago a case has recently been tried involving the following point: A man who had over one thousand dollars stolen from him while travelling in one of the Pullman Company's sleeping cars, sued that company, and pressed his demand on the ground that they were liable both as carriers and hotel-keepers. The company contended that inasmuch as they did not receive pay for carrying passengers, but only for furnishing them with beds, they were not common carriers, and were not to be regarded in any sense as a "railway company." Furthermore, they insisted that they were not hotel-keepers, inasmuch as they supplied passengers with lodging only, and not with board. The plaintiff gained a verdict, though for only part of what he claimed, and the case has been taken to the supreme court.

—THE social evil law, just passed the Missouri legislature, prohibits the enforced examination and surveillance of prostitutes, but requires physicians to report to the board of health any venereally-diseased women they may prescribe for, whom they have reason to suspect to be prostitutes. As there is no penalty affixed to this requirement, no physician will make such reports, as it will injure his practice in such cases. It prohibits the police, under heavy penalties, from entering houses of prostitution without a warrant. It provides for the maintenance of the Social Evil Hospital and House of Industry, at the public expense, instead of at the expense of the class of women who are benefited by it, as heretofore, and provides that diseased prostitutes may voluntarily go there, and that those who are certified to be diseased, by physicans, may be confined there at the discretion of the board of health. In short, this law most effectually removes this class of persons from public surveillance. Every house of prostitution may be turned into a gambling den, and the police are powerless to break it up. In fact, the police being prohibited from entering such houses, unless armed with a warrant, cannot in many cases know where they are. Relieved from police surveillance and board of health "regulation," the whole business of restraining and suppressing prostitution is left to the voluntary action of citizens in swearing out warrants against this class of persons. Take it as a whole, this is a most remarkable law. Its penalties are all against the police officials; its immunities and benefits are almost entirely in favor of the prostitutes, while the expense involved by the iniquity which it shields, is borne by the general public.

—LOOK to your statute books. We mean this word of advice to our Missouri subscribers. The legislature just adjourned passed a large number of acts amending various chapters of the general statutes. Among the acts passed we note amendments to the general statutes by chapter and section as follows: Ch. 5, § 15; ch. 32, §§ 25, 26; ch. 36, § 7; ch. 63; ch. 63, § 39; ch. 70, § 1; ch. 80; ch. 143, § 51; ch. 169, § 6.

We also notice amendments to chapters of the general statutes which relate to the following subjects: Administrators; Corporations, religious and benevolent; Constables; County Treasurers; Deaf and Dumb; Dower; Dramshop Keepers; Drawing of Warrants; Education of Blind; Elections; Foreign Insurance Companies; Guardians and Curators; Inspection of Liquors; Members of General Assembly; Penitentiary; Revenue; Treasury Department; Trustees.

We also notice acts relating to the following subjects: The Practice of Pharmacy; authorizing Cities, Towns, etc., to organize for School Purposes; Fees of Witnesses and Jurors in St. Louis county; for the better protection of Rights of Minority Stockholders in Railroad Companies; to quiet Land Titles in Certain Cases; to provide for the Transcribing of Records from one county to another; Concerning Graduates of Law Department of Saint Louis University; to abolish Board of Guardians; to provide for the taking of Recognizances in certain cases; relating to Roads and Highways; relating to Juries in St. Louis county; concerning Bribery at Elections; prohibiting Railroads from charging over four cents per mile fare; Pay of Members of General Assembly; Appointment of Probate Clerks; relating to Conveyance of Personal Property; to Coroners' Inquests; Dramshop-keepers; Insurance Companies other than Life; Fees of Auction Sales under securities for Debt; to compel Clerks, Sheriffs, etc., to keep account of and pay over witnesses' fees; to prevent non-residents from grazing or herding cattle upon certain lands; for relief of Collectors of Revenue; to reorganize and provide for support of Public Schools; to prevent destruction of fish; to punish the carrying of concealed weapons; restricting the liabilities of counties, cities, towns, etc., in matters of contract; regulating the Practice of Medicine and Surgery; to destroy Gophers; to punish abuses of public trust; cost of assessing in counties having township organization prior to election in 1872; method of assessing tax on consolidated bridge companies; management of local Insurance Companies; False Receipts and Bills of Lading and Fraudulent transfers by Warehousemen; Ditches and Drains of Railroads; to regulate Traffic in Dead Animals; to regulate costs in Criminal Cases; Summoning jurors in Courts of Record; to promote the Science of Medicine and Surgery; amending Township Organization Law.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, APRIL 9, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3 PER ANNUM, in Advance

Effect of War upon the Contract of Life Insurance—Decision by the Supreme Court of the United States.

We had occasion some time since, in a note to Smith v. Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. (ante, pp. 79 et seq.), to go over the cases on this subject pretty thoroughly. Among the cases mentioned in that note were two in which the question had been determined in federal courts of first instance, namely, Hamilton v. New York Mutual Life Ins. Co., 9 Blatchford, 234, in which it was held by BLATCHFORD, J., in the United States District Court at New York City, that the war merely suspends but does not invalidate such contracts, and Tait v. New York Life Ins. Co., determined by Judge EMMONS in the United States Circuit Court at Memphis, Tennessee, in which the contrary principle is asserted. These two cases were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the questions involved in them have recently been argued at great length; and the result is, that both decisions are affirmed by a divided court. Thus, the anomalous result is produced of affirming two decisions substantially the same in their facts, and precisely opposite in their conclusions upon those facts. What is right before Judge BLATCHFORD is wrong before Judge EMMONS, and vice versa; while the life insurance companies and their Southern policy-holders are left in the same state of perplexity as before. It is thought, however, that a way out of this wilderness may be found in the fact that the Chief Justice did not sit in these cases, and that a re-hearing will be granted in which he will take part, when his views will be decisive of the question.

Iron Mountain Railroad Tax Case—Exemption from Taxation by Legislative Contract.

We publish in this number the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by Mr. Justice FIELD, in the Iron Mountain Railroad tax case. It is a case of great interest and importance to the state of Missouri. The Iron Mountain company asserted a perpetual exemption from taxation by virtue of an irrepealable legislative contract granting this immunity to the prior company by that name, to whose rights the present company claimed to have succeeded. It will be observed that the court decide that the first company did possess the exemption. It will also be observed that the court say that the legislature, in 1867, undertook to transfer this exemption or immunity to the present company as an unextinguished or unmerged franchise. But the court hold that the exemption from taxation in favor of the original company ceased when the state foreclosed its lien, under the act of 1866, and purchased the property. Mr. Justice FIELD puts the point clearly. He says: "When the state became the purchaser the immunity ceased; the property stood in its hands precisely the same as any other unencumbered property of the state, exempt from taxation, not by virtue of any previous stipulation with the company, but as all property of the state is thus exempt."

Under the view of the Supreme Court, nothing but the provision of the new constitution of 1865 (art. 11, sec. 16), which wisely prohibited future legislative exemptions from taxation, prevented the Iron Mountain company from being perpetually exempt from taxation. Other companies in the state claiming a similar exemption have taken a deep interest in the Iron Mountain case, for which reason, as well as for the public interest in the controversy, we publish at this early day the full text of the opinion of the Supreme Court.

Railway Negligence—Killing Child of Tender Years—Negligence of Parent in Suffering Child to be at Large.

In Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company v. Long (Legal Chronicle; s. c., 4 Pittsburgh Law Jour. N. S. 122), determined in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Feb. 24th, a child two years and two months old ran upon the defendant's track, where it passes through the populous town of Manayunk, and was killed by a train which was running at the rate of eight miles an hour. The court below, among other things, instructed the jury that "the fact that the child is found in the streets affords a strong presumption of negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. You will therefore consider whether the mother took reasonable care of the child; if she did not, it was negligence."

Commenting upon this instruction, AGNEW, Ch. J., said: "To suffer a child to wander on the street has the sense of permit. If such permission or sufferance exists, it is negligence. This is the assertion of a principle. But whether the mother did suffer the child to wander is a matter of fact, and is the subject of evidence, and this must depend upon the care she took of her child. Such care must be reasonable care, dependent on the circumstances. This is a fact for the jury. If she did not exercise this care she was negligent. What more than this can be demanded of her? When a railroad runs through a populous city has the company a right to exact a harder measure, and are we to say, as a matter of law, that the citizens are to be imprisoned in their houses, or their children caged like birds, otherwise it is negligence? Is it negligence for the poor who congregate these crowded streets, unless, even in the summer's heat, they live shut up in the noisome vapors of their closed tenements, without a breath of healthy air? Is this the life they must lead, or be adjudged to be negligent? This mother gave her child a piece of bread to satisfy it, closed the kitchen door to keep it in, and went to the next room to scrub the oil-cloth on the floor, and before her labor was finished, and in less than five minutes, the mangled body of her little one was brought in and laid before her. We have no reason to believe that her love for her child was less than that of the more favored of her sex, having servants at their beck. Because the child managed to lift the latch and momentarily disappeared, are we to say that this was negligence per se, and that she suffered her child to wander into the street? What sort of justice is that which tells the mother agonizing over her dying child, 'Your negligence caused this. You suffered your child to run into the jaws of death; we can not perceive any fault in the railroad company; a speed of eight miles an hour along this populous thoroughfare was all right.' We can endorse no such cruel doctrine; but we must say, as was said in Kay v. Railroad Co., that the doctrine which imputes negligence to a parent in such a case is repulsive to our natural instincts, and repugnant to the condition of that class of persons who have to maintain life by daily toil. 15 P. F. Smith, 276."

Digitized by Google

This case is but one of several which have been before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, involving the same question: Kay v. Penn. R. R. Co., 65 Penn. State, 269; Smith v. O'Connor, 48 Penn. State, 218; Philadelphia and Reading R. R. Co. v. Spearen, 47 Penn. State, 300; Rauch v. Lloyd, 31 Penn. State, 358; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Kelly, ibid, 372. The subject is fruitful of nice distinctions, and the decisions, whether in this country or in England, are by no means uniform. In Ihl v. The Railway Co., 47 N. Y. 317, it was held that sending a child a little more than three years old across the track of a street railroad, attended only by another child nine and one-half years old, was not necessarily such negligence on the part of the parents as would defeat a recovery in an action brought by the child's administrator against the railroad company for damages for causing its death by negligently running over it while crossing the track. The court say (RAPALLO, J.) that all the cases in which the negligence of parents or custodians of infants not sui juris, is held to preclude a recovery by such infants or their representatives, necessarily assume that the conduct of the infant was such as would, in the case of a person sui juris, have amounted to contributory negligence, and hold that the negligence of the parent or the custodiant, but not the personal conduct of the infant, constitutes the bar. The law in such cases makes the infant responsible through others. (Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615, 619.) The conduct of the infant may have an important bearing on the question of the defendant's negligence; but when the latter is clearly negligent, contributory personal negligence on the part of an infant obviously not sui juris can not be alleged, unless negligence on the part of his guardian or custodian has brought about the situation, or in some manner contributed to the injury. (Mangam v. Brooklyn Railroad Co., 38 N. Y. 460, 461.)

Law of Homicide—Character of the Slain for Violence.

We cheerfully give place in another column to a communication from Thomas G. Jones, Esq., Reporter of the Supreme Court of Alabama, in which he criticises an article which appeared in this journal for January 15th, wherein we took occasion to examine the case of Fields v. The State, 47 Ala. 603. We do this the more readily when we consider that our article was a criticism upon the performance of a judge, who from the nature of his position is himself precluded from making a reply. For this reason we recognize the rule that when a writer in a legal or other publication feels called upon to criticise an adjudicated case, he should proceed with great caution and candor. We may therefore be permitted to say, in vindication of our own good faith in making that criticism, that it was not written until we had thoroughly studied every case which it is believed the American books contain upon the subject of the admission of evidence of the character of the deceased in trials for homicide. This examination of cases convinced us so clearly that Fields' case embodies an extraordinary ruling upon this question and gives extraordinary reasons for such ruling, that we felt obliged to couch our dissent in clear language, and not to overwhelm the subject with doubts and conjectures such as serve only to perplex and task the patience of the reader.

The juncture of circumstances which warrants the admission of such evidence in trials for homicide has nowhere been more clearly defined than by the Supreme Court of Alabama in earlier cases. Thus, it was said in Quesenberry v. State, 3 Stew. & Port. 308, that "if the killing took place under circumstances that could afford the slayer no reasonable grounds to believe himself in peril, he could derive no advantage from the general character of the deceased for turbulence and revenge. But if the killing were such as to leave any doubt whether he had been more actuated by the principle of self-preservation than that of malice, it would be proper to admit any testimony calculated to illustrate to the jury the motive by which he had been actuated." So it is said in Pritchett v. The State, 22 Ala. 39, that "an act performed by a quick, impulsive, bloodthirsty, abandoned man may afford much stronger evidence that the life of the party assailed was in imminent peril than if performed by one known to possess an entirely different character and disposition, and might very reasonably justify a resort to more prompt measures of self-preservation." Again, in Franklin v. The State, 29 Ala. 14, the court say: "To avoid detriment in the practical application of the rule, it must be understood neither, on the one hand, to excuse the taking of one's life because he is a bad man, nor, on the other, to be limited to those cases where the facts are such as to make it doubtful whether the homicide was committed se defendendo. The law can not apportion the criminality of the homicide to the character of the deceased, and it can not confine the rule to cases of doubt, because, in such cases, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal; and therefore, so to limit it would be to deny to it all practical effect. When the conduct of the deceased, although in itself innocent, is such that, illustrated by his character, its tendency is to excite a reasonable belief of imminent peril, the evidence ought to be admitted, and the question of its effect left to the determination of the jury. It will be for the court to determine, in every case, whether the facts are such as will justify the admission of the evidence." In all of these cases it was held proper, under the facts in proof, to exclude such evidence.

How different the juncture of facts indicated by the above language is from that in Fields' case, the reader has only to glance at that case to perceive. In that case there was, according to the report, no pretence that the killing was done "from a principle of self-preservation;" but, instead of this, the defendant prepared a weapon for the occasion, and for the purpose of avenging an insult which had occured six hours before, deliberately shot and killed the deceased, who was going his own lawful way, peaceably and unarmed, and afterwards declared that he had killed him to avenge the insult. He had "shot the d—d devil, and would kill any man who would charge him with burning his gin-house and call him a thief."

We are willing to concede what we understand our correspondent to argue, that the ground on which the court in Fields' case held this evidence ought to be admitted was not for the purpose of guiding the jury in fixing the technical degree of the crime, but for the purpose of guiding them in the exercise of the discretion, which the law had reposed in them within certain limits, of fixing the quantum of punishment. We are willing to concede this, since it is urged by our correspondent, although it involves the court in the nonsense of reversing a judgment for the purpose of admitting evidence to guide the jury in doing what they had already done; for they had already fixed the punishment of the accused at the lowest limit allowed by law for the degree of crime of which they found him guilty. Conceding, then, this to be the ground of the ruling on this point, what result does it necessarily involve? It necessarily involves the conclusion—and this seems to us the doctrine which, under this view, the case necessarily decides—that where a man deliberately kills another out of revenge for a previous insult, if it turns out that the "general character of the deceased for turbulence, violence, bloodshed and recklessness of human life" was bad, the slayer ought not to be punished as severely as though the general character of the slain in these particulars was good. We can not see but that this result is substantially the same as that stated by us in our previous observations upon this case. Mr. WHARTON says—and his language has been many times quoted by judges with approbation—that "it would be a barbarous thing for A. to give as a reason for killing B., that B.'s disposition was savage and riotous." 1 Whart. Crim. Law, 7th ed., § 641. We think it would be equally barbarous to allow a man who has deliberately killed another out of revenge to urge in mitigation of his punishment that the deceased was a man of "general bad character for turbulence, violence, bloodshed and recklessness of human life." Such a man, until he is convicted of crime, is entitled to the same measure of protection before the law as the best or most exemplary citizen; and any rule of law which punishes the murderer of such a man less severely than the murderer of a good man, makes him unequal with the latter before the law, in respect of the right to live, and correspondingly diminishes that protection which the laws of his country promise to every citizen, without respect of persons.

Digitized by Google

But we apprehend that every judge and criminal practitioner is aware that questions of this kind are generally sprung as mere devices to excite the sympathies of ignorant jurors and to distract their attention from the real issues of the case. In England and in some of the American states where the rights of society in criminal trials are guarded, and where judges are accustomed to hold juries well in hand, we apprehend that no advocate of repute would attempt to get in such testimony under the circumstances of Fields' case. But where an unchecked rein is given to the advocate, he is never wanting in devices to perplex the judgment and excite the emotional nature of the ignorant and weak juror. He plays upon him as he would upon a musical instrument, and brings forth any desired sound. "Govern the ventages with your fingers and thumb; give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music."

We may be permitted to note, in conclusion, that in running over the 47th volume of Alabama Reports a second time, we find in it no less than ten murder cases. Of these, one comes up on a point of practice—a motion for a discontinuance. The other nine are appealed from judgments of conviction of felonious homicide in some of its degrees; and of these nine, eight are reversed. We shall not undertake to draw any inference from this fact. At this distance we could not justly do so. It would seem, however, to argue most forcibly that where such a state of things exists, the barriers which the common law has erected for the safety of society should be by the courts vigiantly guarded and preserved.

Upon the second point adverted to by our correspondent, we cheerfully concede, upon a re-examination of the case, that the language of the learned Chief Justice that the "circumstances of the killing should be viewed in connection with the good or bad character of both the defendant or the deceased," probably had reference to the circumstance of the particular case, the good character of the deceased having been put in evidence; although this remark was not made in connection with that part of the opinion which discusses the error of the court below in charging upon evidence of the good character of the defendant.

The Validity of Exemption Laws which Operate upon Existing Contracts.

We publish elsewhere a brief opinion of the Supreme Court of South Carolina in the case of Cochran v. Darcy, the importance of which consists in the threefold fact that it reverses a well-considered decision of the same court in the case of Re Kennedy, 2 South Car. N. S. 216; that it interprets the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610, as going to the extent of holding that exemption laws which operate upon contracts in existence at the time of their passage are void; and that, in following this interpretation of that case, it runs counter to the weight of adjudications in other states.

With respect to Gunn v. Barry, there seems to be room to question whether it goes to the extent of holding that exemption laws which operate retroactively upon contracts in existence at the time of their passage are to that extent unconstitutional and void. It does hold that where a person has obtained a judgment, which by the law of the state is a lien upon the realty of the judgment debtor, a homestead law enacted subsequently to the rendition of such judgment and before the levy of execution, which seeks to discharge the debtor's property from such lien, is so far unconstitutional and void, and does not abridge the jurisdiction of the state courts to afford the judgment creditor satisfaction out of such property. This was the precise point in judgment, and this is what the learned reporter, in writing his head-note to the case, manifestly understood to be the scope of the question decided. But while this is true, it is possible that Mr. Justice SWAYNE, in pronouncing the opinion of the court, used language strong enough to warrant the deduction which the Supreme Court of South Carolina make as to what the case decides. He says: "The effect of the act in question, under the circumstances of this judgment, does not merely impair, it annihilates the remedy. There is none left. But it reaches still further. It withdraws the land from the lien of the judgment, and thus destroys a vested right of property which the creditor had acquired in the pursuit of the remedy to which he was entitled by the law as it stood when the judgment was recovered. It is, in effect, taking one person's property and giving it to another without compensation. This is contrary to reason and justice and to the fundamental principles of the social compact. * * * The legal remedies for the enforcement of a contract, which belong to it at the time and place where it is made, are a part of its obligation. A state may change them, provided the change involve no impairment of a substantia right. If the provisions of the constitution or the legislative act of a state fall within the category last mentioned, they are to that extent utterly void. They are, for all the purposes of the contract they impair, as if they had never existed. The constitutional provision and statute here in question are clearly within that category, and are therefore void."

Digitized by Google

If from this language, taken in connection with the facts of the case, Gunn v. Barry is to be understood as deciding that homestead laws which by their terms operate upon contracts in existence at the time of their passage, are, so far as they thus operate retroactively, void, without reference to the question whether a judgment lien has attached to the property prior to the passage of the exemption law, it is contrary to the understanding of several of the earlier judges of the same court, as expressed in dicta which have been quoted and relied on by the state courts in numerous instances. Thus, in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 311, 318, Chief Justice TANEY said: "A state may regulate at pleasure the modes of proceeding in its courts in relation to past contracts as well as future. * * * It may, if it think proper, direct that the necessary implements of agriculture, or the tools of a mechanic, or articles of necessity and household furniture, shall, like wearing apparel, not be liable to execution on judgments. Regulations of this description have always been considered, in every civilized community, as properly belonging to the remedy, to be exercised or not by every sovereignty according to its own views of policy and humanity. It must reside in every state to enable it to secure its own citizens from unjust and harassing litigation and to protect them in those pursuits which are necessary to the existence and well-being of every community. And although a new remedy may be deemed less convenient than the old one, and may in some degree render the recovery of debts less tardy and difficult, yet it will not follow that the law is unconstitutional." In the later case of The Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 301, 330, Mr. Justice WOODBURY enumerates laws exempting tools or household goods from seizure as an example of legislation respecting the remedy which might be applied to existing contracts. And so in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 291, Mr. Justice JOHNSON says that "it is equally the duty and right of governments to impose limits to the avarice and tyranny of individuals, so as not to suffer oppression to be exercised under the semblance of right and justice."

The same views have been taken by the courts of last resort in several of the states. Bigelow v. Pritchard, 21 Pick. 169; Rockwell v. Hubbell, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 197; Morse v. Goold, 11 N. Y. 281 (overruling Quackenbush v. Danks, 1 Denio, 128, 3 Denio, 594, and 1 N. Y. 129); Cusic v. Douglas, 3 Kansas, 123; Maxey v. Loyal, 38 Ga. 531; Hardiman v. Downer, 39 Ga. 425; Hill v. Kessler, 63 N. C. 437; Farley v. Dowe, 45 Ala. 324; Sneider v. Heidelberger, ibid, 126; Stephenson v. Osborn, 41 Miss. 119. In the case in Alabama the exemption law of that state (Code of Ala., § 2955) is held to be retroactive and to divest the lien of an attachment levied before its passage, but is, nevertheless, held to be constitutional and valid. Sneider v. Heidelberger, supra. The Court of Appeals of Virginia, however, has, in a recent exhaustive opinion by CHRISTIAN, J., in which all the judges concur, decided that the provision in the constitution of that state and the act of the general assembly passed in pursuance thereof, known as the homestead exemption law, so far as they apply to contracts entered into or debts contracted before their adoption, are in violation of the constitution of the United States, and therefore void. The Homestead Cases, 22 Grattan, 266. And the same conclusion appears to have been reached in Kentucky with reference to an exemption law of that state, in Kibbey v. Jones, 7 Bush, 243.

Some of the cases, however, which affirm the validity of the retroactive features of such laws, contain language limiting the legislative power to the enacting of exemption laws which are reasonable, and which go no farther than to make an exemption consistent with the humane grounds of public policy in pursuance of which such enactments are sustained. Thus, in Stephenson v. Osborne, 41 Miss. 119, 130, ELLET, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The legislature exercises this power according to its own views of humanity and sound policy. But it is not without its proper limit, and it may be abused. Every party is entitled to an adequate and available remedy for the enforcement of his contract, and any legislation which impairs the value and benefit of the contract, though professing to act on its remedy, would impair its obligation. It is not competent for the legislature, under color of an exemption law, so to obstruct the remedy upon contracts as to render it nugatory or impracticable. An abuse of the legislative discretion in this respect would demand the interposition of the court. We do not undertake to intimate what would amount to such abuse; such a question would be one of great delicacy and difficulty. We only mean to say that the power of the legislature over this subject is not unrestricted by the constitution, and that cases may arise in which it will be the duty of the judiciary to arrest its exercise." So in the case in Kansas, the court say, per CROZIER, Ch. J.: "It must not be inferred that a state is omnipotent upon this subject, and that if it can fix the amount at one acre in a town, it may increase it to ten or twenty acres, and in a like proportion in the country. Its action will not be constitutional if it be apparent that its object was not so much to secure the well-being of the citizens as to enable them to hold large amounts of property with a view of making it available to their own aggrandizement for other purposes than that of homesteads. The state is the sole judge of the proper extent of the exemptions within the limits above indicated; and so long as the extent of the exemption shall be in accordance with sound policy and humanity, and no greater than shall be reasonably necessary to protect the citizens in their pursuits necessary to their existence and well-being, its action must be sustained, although it may here and there work an individual hardship." Cusic v. Douglas, supra. So in Re Kennedy, supra, the court (WILLARD, J.) assert that "it is within the power of the state to exempt the lands and personal property of a debtor, to a limited amount, from liability on account of an existing indebtedness, so long as such exemption does not, in effect and intention, impair the obligation of such contract."

For the opinion in Cochran v. Darcy, which we elsewhere publish, we are indebted to William Stone, Esq., counsellor at law, of Charleston, South Carolina.

—JUDGE R. B. WARDEN, one of the biographers of Chief Justice Chase, threatens to sue the Cincinnati Commercial for libel, on account of some criticism of his conduct by that journal in connection with the use made by him of certain papers of Chief Justice Chase.

Digitized by Google

Legislative Exemption of Railway Property from Taxation—The Iron Mountain Railroad Case.

SPENCER TRASK v. CONSTANTINE MAGUIRE, THE ST. LOUIS AND IRON MOUNTAIN RAILROAD COMPANY, THOMAS ALLEN, S. H. LAFLIN, G. B. ALLEN, SAMUEL COPP, S. GANDY, A. TRASK, AND H. G. MARQUAND.

Supreme Court of the United States, No. 106, October Term, 1873.

1. Iron Mountain Railroad—Exemption from Taxation.—The property of the present Iron Mountain Railroad Company, created in 1867, is not exempt from the power of state taxation; but it was otherwise as to the property of the first corporation by that name, created in 1851.

2. ——. ——. When the Exemption ceased.—The exemption in favor of the original company from taxation ceased when the state foreclosed its statutory mortgage or lien, under the act of February 19, 1866, and purchased the property.

3. ——. ——. New Constitution of Missouri.—Effect of its Prohibition against Exemptions from Taxation.—In July, 1865, the new constitution of Missouri went into effect, by which (art 11, sec. 16) the legislature is absolutely prohibited to grant to railroad companies an immunity from taxation; and under this prohibition the legislature, although it undertook to confer upon the present company all the immunity from taxation which the old company enjoyed, had no power to do so.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Districts of Missouri. A brief report of the case in the court below will be found in 2 Dillon C. C. R. 182, note.

Mr. Rombauer, for the collector; Messrs. Dryden & Dryden, for the Iron Mountain Railroad Company.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

The question presented for our determination in this case is, whether the property of the present St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Company, a corporation created under the laws of Missouri, is, by an irrepealable legislative grant, forever exempted from all state and county taxes. Two corporations bearing that name have existed in Missouri, the second succeeding the first in the possession and ownership of its road and property. The first was created by an act of the legislature of the state, passed in March, 1851; the second was formed in July, 1867, under an act of the previous year authorizing the incorporation of the purchaser or purchasers of any railroad, or any part, section, or branch thereof, which had previously been, or might thereafter be, forfeited to or sold by the state.

The property of the first corporation was undoubtedly exempt from state and county taxes. The act of incorporation adopted as part of it a provision of another act, which declared in terms that the stock of the company should be thus exempt. (Laws of Missouri of 1851, p. 479.) It is true that at this time a statute was in existence, passed in 1845, which declared that the charter of every corporation subsequently granted should be subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal at the discretion of the legislature. But from the operation of this provision the company was expressly exempted by an act amendatory of its charter, passed in 1853. (Laws of Missouri, of 1853, p. 296.) From that time at least the exemption of its stock from state and county taxation was placed beyond legislative interference. The amendatory act also declared that all the engines, cars, wagons, machines, and other property belonging to the company should be deemed a part of its capital stock, and be vested in its respective shareholders, according to their respective shares. All the property of the company was thus placed within the exemption which attached to the original stock; that designated was to be deemed a part of such stock, as well as that originally embraced by this term.

On the argument some attempt was made from the use of the term stock in the original act, and the language of the amendatory act that the property should be vested in the respective shareholders, according to their respective shares, to establish the position that the exemption extended only to the separate shares of the individual stockholders. But the argument does not strike us as possessing much force. The terms "stock of the company" imported the capital stock of such company, the subscribed fund which the company held, as distinguished from the separate interests of the individual stockholders. The language of the amendatory act did not qualify this meaning; that only declared that other property of the company should also be deemed capital stock, and the additional provision that it should be vested in the respective shareholders, according to their respective shares, only meant that they should have the interest of shareholders in the property, according to their respective shares.

The corporation in question was created to constuct a railroad from a point in the city of St. Louis to the Iron Mountain and Pilot Knob, in Missouri, with liberty to extend the road to the Mississippi river, or to the southern part of the state. The road was constructed from St. Louis to Pilot Knob, a distance of about eighty-seven miles, with a branch to Potosi. During the progress of the work, and in order to aid in its construction, the legislature of the state, previous to 1860, passed various acts providing for the loan of the bonds of the state to the company. All the acts referred for the terms of the loans to an act passed in 1851 to expedite the construction of the Pacific railroad and of the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad. (Laws of Missouri of 1851, p. 267.) That act provided that no part of the bonds should be delivered to the company until it signified its acceptance of them to the secretary of state, by filing in his office a certificate of such acceptance under the corporate seal of the company and the signature of its president; that such acceptance should be recorded, and upon its record should become to all intents and purposes a mortgage of the road of the company, and every part and section thereof, and its appurtenances, to the people of the state, to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds. That act authorized the governor, in case default was made in the payment of either the interest or principal of the bonds, to sell the road and its appurtenances at auction to the highest bidder, or to buy in the same at such sale for the use and benefit of the state, subject to such disposition in respect to the road or its proceeds as the legislature might thereafter direct.

Under the different acts, bonds of the state to a large amount were issued to the company; its acceptance of them in proper form was given to the secretary of state, and the acceptance was duly recorded, and from the date of such record the state acquired, for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds, a lien upon the road and every part and section thereof and its appurtenances.

The company failed to pay the interest on these bonds. It does not appear for how long a period the company was thus in default, nor is this material. It is sufficient to say that in 1865 the right of the state, under the provisions of the acts cited, to interfere and sell the property, had become complete. Before a sale, however, was made the legislature passed another act for the sale of this and other railroads by the govenor, and the foreclosure of the state lien thereon. This act, which was approved in February, 1866, among other things required the governor to advertise for sale the different railroads, with their appurtenances, rolling stock, and property of every description, and all the rights and franchises thereto belonging; and to sell the same at auction to the highest bidder, in pursuance of the several acts creating a lien thereon. It also provided for the appointment of three commissioners to attend the sale of the different roads as advertised, and to bid in the same for the use and benefit of the state for an amount not exceeding the respective liens thereon; and in case the roads were struck off and sold to them, to take possession of and hold the same, with their appurtenances and property, and again, after due advertisement, inviting proposals for the purchase of the different roads, their lands, appurtenances, and franchises, to resell the same. Under this act the St. Louis and Iron Mountain railroad was advertised for sale, with its rights and privileges, and at the sale was bid in by the commissioners for the state. However broad the terms of the advertisement, the interest sold could not extend beyond the property upon which the state at the time held a lien, and this was the entire road of the company and its appurtenances. But as the property was sold to the state, it is unnecessary to determine whether, if the sale had been made to a third party, the immunity from taxation possessed by the company would have passed to the purchaser. When the state became the purchaser the immunity ceased; the property stood in its hands precisely the same as any other unencumbered property of the state, exempt from taxation, not by any virtue of any previous stipulation with the company, but as all property of the state is thus exempt. Subsequently the road and its appurtenances, and all the franchises, which, under the new constitution of Missouri, adopted in 1865, were transferable by the state, were sold by the commissioners to McKay, Vogel and Simmons, who conveyed the same to Thomas Allen, who with others, in July, 1867, became incorporated under the name of the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Company. That company is still in existence, and is one of the defendants herein. To it Allen transferred all the rights and privileges acquired by him from his vendors, and all of which they acquired from the state. The acts under which the sale was made provided that purchasers of the road should have all the rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities which were enjoyed by the defaulting company under its charter and laws amendatory thereof, subject to the limitations and conditions therein contained, and not inconsistent with the act authorizing the sale. The new company thus acquired all the immunity from taxation which the original company originally possessed, if it were competent for the legislature at the time, under the new constitution, to confer this privilege. The question, therefore, is whether the legislature was competent to grant the immunity claimed, under that constitution, which went into operation on the 4th of July, 1865, previous to the passage of any of the acts authorizing the proceedings under which the new company acquired its rights.

Digitized by Google

The 16th section of the 11th article of that instrument provides that "no property, real or personal, shall be exempt from taxation, except such as may be used exclusively for public schools and such as may belong to the United States, to this state, to counties, or to municipal corporations within this state;" and the 27th section of the 4th article declares that "the general assembly shall not pass special laws * * * exempting any property of any named person or corporation from taxation."

These provisions require no explanation; they are absolute prohibitions against the grant of any new immunity from taxation, unless railroad companies of the state existing at the time are excepted from their operation. Such exception is claimed under the "Ordinance for the payment of state and railroad indebtedness" which accompanied the constitution and was adopted with it. That ordinance first provides for the levy and collection from different railroads, and among others from the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Company, an annual tax of ten per cent. on all their gross receipts for the transportation of freight or passengers (not including amounts received from and taxes paid to the United States) from the first of October, 1866, to the first of October, 1868, and fifteen per cent. thereafter; and then enacts that the tax shall be collected from the companies only for the payment of the principal and interest on the bonds of the state issued for their benefit, or on bonds guaranteed by the state; that if any of the companies refuse or neglect to pay the tax thus required, and the principal or interest of any of the bonds, or any part thereof, remain due and unpaid, the general assembly shall provide by law for the sale of the railroad and other property and the franchises of such company under the lien reserved to the state; and that whenever the state becomes the purchaser of any railroad or other property, or the franchises thus sold, the general assembly shall provide by law in what manner the same shall be sold for the payment of the indebtedness of the company; that no railroad, or other property or franchises purchased by the state, shall be restored to the defaulting company until it shall have first paid the interest due from it, and that no sale or other disposition of any such railroad or other property, or its franchises, shall be made without reserving a lien upon the property and franchises thus sold or disposed of for all sums remaining unpaid.

Now, the argument of the appellants is that as the ordinance authorizes the legislature to provide for the sale of the franchises of a defaulting corporation, it can transfer under that designation immunity from taxation, if the company ever possessed such immunity; and that this was the effect of the sale of the St. Louis and Iron Mountain railroad and its franchises to McKay, Vogel and Simmons. And authority for this position is supposed to be found in the answers given by the judges of the Supreme Court of Missouri, in November, 1865, to certain questions propounded by the governor under a provision of the constitution authorizing him to take their opinion on important questions of constitutional law. The questions propounded were substantially these:

1st. Whether the provisions of the ordinance operated to suspend the right of the state to sell the roads named, or either of them, until there was a refusal or neglect to pay the tax imposed by the ordinance; or whether the state might order the sale of the railroads, or either of them, prior to such refusal or neglect;

2d. If the judges were of opinion that a sale of the railroads might be ordered before such refusal or neglect, whether such sale could be made "without reserving a lien upon all the property and franchises thus sold for all sums remaining unpaid," or, in other words, whether this clause constituted a condition of all sales of railroads ordered by the state, or referred only to sales made under the ordinance for refusal and neglect to pay the tax;

3d. If the judges should be of opinion that all sales of railroads by authority of the state were subject to the restriction mentioned, whether the words "all sums remaining unpaid" referred to the sums for which the railroad sold was in default, or to that portion of the purchase money not paid in cash at the time of sale; and

4th. Whether upon a sale of a railroad under a lien of the state the constitution authorized the state to receive, in payment of the purchase money, preferred or other shares of stock issued by a corporation purchasing the road.

None of these questions, as will be perceived, call for any opinion as to the effect of the sale of the franchises of a road, or the meaning of that term. They call only for an opinion upon the power of the legislature to order a sale of the roads, the liens to be reserved, the payments to be made, and the right to receive shares of stock of a purchasing corporation. The answer of the judges stated that the 5th section of the ordinance related to all sales of railroads, whether in default for not paying the interest on the bonds of the state or not paying the tax levied; that when the state had become the purchaser of any railroad sold under the lien of the state, the general assembly could provide in what manner such railroad could again be sold for the payment of the indebtedness which the state had incurred on account of bonds loaned to it or guaranteed for its benefit; that it would have had this power without the aid of the ordinance, but that no sale or other disposition of any such railroad, or other property, could be made by the state without reserving a lien upon the property sold for all sums remaining unpaid, and that the purchaser was required to make all payments therefor in money or in bonds or other obligations of the state; and then adds that the "legislature is left unrestricted further as to the time, terms and conditions of the sale." This language is supposed to determine that in the sale of such property the legislature is not bound by the provisions of the constitution we have cited.

But we do not think the language used justifies any such conclusion, but was rather intended to indicate that the ordinance imposes no other restrictions than those designated, and has no reference whatever to the clauses of the constitution in respect to which no opinion was asked.

Digitized by Google

It seems to us that the plain meaning of the ordinance, when it says that the general assembly shall provide by law in what manner the railroad and its franchises may be sold, is that they shall be sold in conformity with such law as the legislature may constitutionally pass, not by any law which it could devise if it had unlimited discretion in the matter. It would conflict with well-settled rules of construction to hold that the language used authorizes any legislation regardless of the provisions of the constitution. And there is nothing in the authority conferred to provide for the sale of its franchises with the road of the defaulting company, which requires immunity from taxation to be embraced within them. The language evidently refers to such franchises as are essential to the operation of the road sold, without which the ownership of the road would be comparatively valueless, such as the franchise to run cars, to take tolls, and the like.

But if we are mistaken in this particular, we are clear that it never was intended by the ordinance to sanction, by the sale of the franchises of a defaulting corporation, the renewal of an exemption which had once ceased to exist, and which the constitution had declared should never thereafter be created. The inhibition of the constitution applies in all its force against the renewal of an exemption equally as against its original creation; and this inhibition the legislature could not disregard in providing for the sale of the property which it had purchased.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Railway-Aid Bonds—Legislative Authority—Recitals in Bonds—Previous Election.

F. W. HUIDEKOPER v. BUCHANAN COUNTY.

United States Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, November Term, 1873.

Before DILLON and KREKEL, JJ.

1. Railway-Aid Bonds—Defences in Hands of Bona Fide Holders—Irregularities in Holding Election.—Where legislative authority is conferred upon a municipal or public corporation to issue bonds on the sanction of the voters to be given at an election, and the officers of the corporation are by the law to decide whether the requisite sanction has been given, and they issue bonds which recite it, no irregularity in the manner of appointing the judges of the election, or in submitting the question, is a defence to the bonds thus issued, when in the hands of bona fide holders for value, without actual notice.

This is an action upon coupons to bonds issued by the county court of the county of Buchanan in payment for stock subscribed to the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad Company. The answer sets out all the orders of the county court, from which it appears that on the 21st day of February, 1868, the county court ordered to be submitted to a vote of the qualified voters, at an election to be held on a specified day in April, 1868, the proposition whether the county court "should subscribe for 4,000 shares of the capital stock of the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad Company, amounting, in the aggregate, to $400,000, upon the terms following: said subscription to be paid for in the bonds of the county at par, payable twenty years after the date of their issue," etc.

Then follow conditions that the bonds shall only issue in installments as the work on the road within the county shall progress. The county court appointed certain persons named "judges of the election to be holden on, etc., for the purpose of submitting to a vote of the taxable and qualified voters of the county the question of the subscription of $400,000 to build a railroad known as the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad."

The record shows that the clerk of the county court "brought into court the returns of the votes cast, certified according to law," showing "that there were cast for the subscription to the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad, 1,968, and against it, 520 votes."

On the 13th day of April, 1868, the county court made an order of record reciting that "whereas, it appears, to the satisfaction of the court, that two-thirds of the qualified voters of Buchanan county, at said special election held therein as aforesaid, did assent to said subscription of 4,000 shares to the capital stock of the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad Company; therefore, it is ordered by the court that the county court of Buchanan county subscribe for and take 4,000 shares, to be paid for according to the order of this court, made on the 21st day of February, 1868." Subsequent orders of the court recite that the subscription was made, that the company complied with the terms and conditions which would entitle it to the bonds, and that the bonds were accordingly, from time to time, executed and delivered to the company to the full amount, in all, of $400,000. The record also shows that taxes were levied to raise the means to pay the interest on these bonds from time to time, and interest ordered to be paid until January 21, 1873, when the county court directed the treasurer "not to pay the interest due on the bonds of the county issued to the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad Company until further orders from this court."

To this answer the plaintiff demurs.

Joseph Shippen and T. K. Skinker, for the plaintiff; Ensworth and Young, for the county.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—The answer shows that there was an election held to enable the voters of the county to determine whether the county court should subscribe to the stock of the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad Company, and pay therefor in the negotiable bonds of the county; that more than two-thirds of the voters voting at such election were in favor of the proposition; that the county court thereupon made the subscription, and from time to time issued the bonds as the railroad company became entitled thereto by the terms of the submission. It is not denied in the answer that the plaintiff is a bona fide holder of the coupons in suit.

The counsel for the county contends that the bonds in question are void for three reasons:

1. That the county court had no power to appoint judges of the special election to be held on the 7th day of April, 1868, to decide upon the question of subscription, but that such power, under the act of March 21, 1868 (Laws 1868, p. 131, sec. 15), belonged to the board of registration.

2. That the question was ordered to be submitted to the "taxable and qualified voters" of the county, instead of the "qualified voters," as required by the constitution. (Art. II, sec. 14.)

3. That the submission was not an unqualified one, but contained conditions. These conditions related to the manner in which the bonds should be issued in case the proposition carried, and required work to a specified amount to be done by the company before it should become entitled to the delivery of an installment of the bonds. These conditions were in the interest of the county, and the orders of the county court show that they were complied with by the company.

It will be perceived that all of these objections relate to irregularities in the submission of the question to a vote of the people, and in the manner of appointing the judges of the election. It may be remarked that the record of the county court does not sustain the position of counsel of the county that the submission was to the "taxable and qualified voters." On the contrary, the submission was to the qualified voters. The use of the words "taxable and qualified voters" occurs in that portion of the order appointing the judges of the election, and is recitative only of the order of submission, and its mis-recital is a matter of no importance.

There is, therefore, really but one objection to the validity of these bonds left to be considered, and that is whether, if the defendant's counsel be right, that the judges of election should have been appointed by the board of registration, this is a fatal defect.

It is not necessary in this case to inquire whether, if there had been no election whatever, the bonds could have been enforced against the county, notwithstanding the constitutional provision. (Art. II, sec. 14.)

Digitized by Google

Here there was an election, and the proposition received, according to the determination of the county court entered upon its records, the assent of more than requisite two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county.

Counsel have differed as to whether the decisions of the United States Supreme Court have gone so far as to hold valid bonds issued by the municipal or public officers without any election whatever having been held, when such an election is required as a condition precedent to the exercise of the power to subscribe for stock and issue bonds to pay therefor, and we are not required to examine or discuss that question. But beyond all doubt that court has time and time again decided that no such defect or irregularity as that which is here set up is available as a defence to the bona fide holder of such securities. The well known doctrine of that court is that bonds, such as those here in question, are commercial paper, and when in the hands of an innocent holder no defence is available to the maker except the want of power from the legislature to issue them.

It is not needful to examine the decisions of that court upon this subject. To show, however, that the doctrines announced in the early case of The Commissioners of Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 5 ,9, and often re-affirmed, are still adhered to, we content ourselves by referring to the yet unreported cases of St. Joseph Township v. Rogers [16 Wall. 644], and Kennicott v. Wayne County [16 Wall. 644], both decided at the December term, 1872.

In the case first cited, Mr. Justice CLIFFORD, summarizing the doctrines of the court on this subject, says:

"Bonds payable to bearer, issued by a municipal corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad, if issued in pursuance of a power conferred by the legislature, are valid commercial instruments; but if issued by such a corporation which possessed no power from the legislature to grant such aid, they are invalid even in the hands of innocent holders. Such a power is frequently conferred to be exercised in a special manner, or subject to certain regulations, conditions or qualifications, but if it appears that the bonds issued show by their recitals that the power was exercised in the manner required by the legislature, and that the bonds were issued in conformity with those regulations and pursuant to those conditions and qualifications, proof that any or all of those recitals are incorrect will not constitute a defence to the corporation in a suit on the bonds or coupons if it appears that it was the sole province of the municipal officers who executed the bonds to decide whether or not there had been an antecedent compliance with the regulation, condition or qualification which it is alleged was not fulfilled."

In the case last cited (Kennicott v. Wayne County), Mr. Justice HUNT, delivering the judgment of the court, said:

"The following propositions may be considered as settled in this court:

"1. If an election or other fact is required to authorize the issue of the bonds of a municipal corporation, and if the result of that election or the existence of that fact is by law to be ascertained and declared by any judge, officer or tribunal, and that judge, officer or tribunal, on behalf of the corporation, executes or issues the bonds, with a recital that the election has been held, of that the fact exists or has taken place, this will be sufficient evidence of the fact to all bona fide holders of the bonds. Authorities infra.

"2. If there be lawful authority for the municipality to issue its bonds, the omission of formalities and ceremonies, or the existence of fraud on the part of the agents of the municipality issuing the bonds, cannot be urged against a bona fide holder seeking to enforce them. (Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 355; Commissioners of Knox County v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 539; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 203; Moran v. Miami County, 2 Black, 722.)

"3. There must, however, be an original authority by statute to the municipality to issue bonds. Municipal corporations have not the power, except through the special authority of the legislature, to issue corporate bonds which will bind their towns; neither have they the power to sell or mortgage the lands belonging to such towns, without special authority. (Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676.)"

To the same effect see also Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall., and the recent decision of the supreme court of the state of Missouri in Smith v. Clark County, November term, 1873.

The demurrer to the answer is sustained.

JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

Does the Bankrupt Law Embrace Executors of a Deceased Person's Estate?

TURNER GRAVES et al. v. R. H. WINTER AND W. A. STEELE, EXECUTORS OF RICHARD WINTER, DECEASED.

In the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi, January Term, 1874.

Before Hon. ROBERT A. HILL, District Judge.

1. Bankruptcy—Limited Executors.—Limited executors, appointed in pursuance of the will of a testator who was a private banker, for the purpose of winding up his banking business, cannot, in the event of such banking business becoming insolvent under their management, be proceeded against under the bankrupt law.

F. B. Pratt, Esq., for petitioners; Messrs. Johnstons, for defendants.

HILL, J.—The questions presented for decision arise upon defendants' motion to dismiss the petition praying to have them declared bankrupts as such executors, and the assets in their hands administered under the bankrupt law.

Several grounds, insisted upon as sustaining the motion, are stated and relied upon, only one of which need be noticed; and that is whether or not the defendants, under the powers conferred upon them, are subject to the provisions of the bankrupt act.

Richard Winter made and published his last will, which has been admitted of record, in which he devised and bequeathed to his widow, Sallie F. Winter, his estate, real and personal, and nominated her as executrix, who qualified as such. Being a private banker, he made a codicil nominating the defendants his executors for the limited purpose of winding up his banking business, and clothing them for that purpose with such powers as were necessary to carry on the business to effect that object without injury either to his estate or to those dealing with him as such banker, authorizing them to receive and pay out deposits, draw drafts and checks, collect what was due to him, and pay those to whom he was indebted as such banker. This codicil was also admitted to record, and the defendants qualified as such limited executors, and they continued the business until the panic last summer or fall, when, as is alleged, they suspended and have not resumed, failing to pay their depositors and other liabilities as bankers. It is also alleged that they have made preferred payments to different individuals.

The bankrupt act embraces individuals, co-partnerships, joint stock companies and corporations of almost every class, but does not in general, embrace trustees, such as executors, administrators and guardians, and others acting strictly in a fiduciary capacity.

This is the first case, so far as I am aware, in which executors as such have been proceeded against under our bankrupt act, either the present or former acts, or who have applied for its benefits. Under the English bankrupt law there are instances in which executors who were directed by the will of the testator to carry on trade in partnership with others, or in which a specific sum has been in the hands of the executors to be employed in trade, and was so employed, and acts were committed falling under the bankrupt laws of individuals, co-partnerships or corporations, that the executors were held amenable to the bankrupt law, and the estate so employed distributed under the bankrupt law; but in all such cases the business was conducted, not for the purpose of winding up the business, but for the purpose of employing the capital for the acquisition of profits and benefit of the beneficiaries under the will.

Digitized by Google

A fair construction of the powers conferred upon the defendants under the will did not authorize them to continue the business longer than they might deem necessary to a fair liquidation and settlement of the business, and no power was intended to be conferred that did not tend to that object. The reception and use of deposits might be necessary for the purpose of paying off acceptances and other obligations for which the testator, in his capacity of banker, was liable; the drawing of drafts or checks on funds in the hands of others, due the testator as banker, might be necessary; also the drawing of such drafts or checks on such funds in favor of creditors might become the most convenient and easy mode of settling up and liquidating the debts and credits of this banking business. The banking machinery was intended only for purposes of liquidation and settlement. This was right and proper, and not inconsistent with their duties as executors under the powers conferred by the will, and though more extended than the powers usually conferred upon executors, was not inconsistent with the main object of the usual powers and duties conferred upon and intended to be attained by the appointment of and duties performed by executors.

It is insisted by petitioner's counsel that the depositors and other creditors of this banking establishment have no other sufficient remedy. In this I am of opinion there is a mistake. They are trustees, and as such are liable to be proceeded against under a creditor's bill in the chancery court of Madison county by any creditor, or if a non-resident creditor, and his demand is over five hundred dollars, in the circuit court of the United States for this district, in either of which having jurisdiction, the assets can all be marshaled and paid according to the rights of the parties, and in which every discovery may be had necessary to a full and fair collection and appropriation of the assets. This is certainly so as it relates to the banking assets and liabilities; how far the estate, in the hands of Mr. Winter, may be reached, it is not necessary now to determine.

In considering the whole case as presented by the petition and exhibits, I am satisfied that this is not one of the class of executorships designed to be administered under the bankrupt act, and therefore feel constrained to sustain the motion, and dismiss the petition at petitioner's cost.

PETITION DISMISSED.

Effect of Homestead Exemptions on Existing Debts.

JOHN C. COCHRAN, EXECUTOR, v. MICHAEL DARCY.
MICHAEL DARCY v. JOHN C. COCHRAN.

Supreme Court of South Carolina, March 12, 1874.

Hon. F. J. MOSES, Chief Justice.
" A. J. WILLARD, } Associate Justices.
" J. J. WRIGHT, }

1. Homestead Exemption Acts—Existing Debts not Affected by—A state constitutional ordinance and a legislative act in pursuance thereof, which create a homstead exemption, do not affect debts in existence at the time of their adoption. To give them such effect would impair the obligation of contracts.

2. Cases Criticised.—Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610, and Cook v. Moffat, 5 How. 308, followed. Re Kennedy, 2 South Car. N. S., 216, overruled.

Opinion of the court, by MOSES, Ch. J.

These cases involve the judgment of this court in Re Kennedy, 2 S. C. 216, and seek to reverse it under the authority of Gunn v. Barry, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States at the December term, 1873. 15 Wall. 610.

It is true, as submitted by the respondent, that in Gunn v. Barry the question directly made was as to the effect of a homestead exemption on a judgment obtained before its allowance by the constitution and act of the general assembly of the state of Georgia; still it is so apparent that, in the view of the court, the retrospective operation of such provision against all previous contracts was void, because in violation of the tenth section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, which declares "that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," that we feel bound to regard the opinion as expressive of the views of the court to the full extent to which the reasons which it assigns may carry it.

A respect to the duty which we owe to the highest tribunal of the country, as well as to ourselves, requires that we should not only give to the decision all proper effect in the case as presented by the facts, but that we should accept the argument of the opinion as it affects the general question involved in its judgment.

We yield a ready assent to what Mr. Justice GRIER says in Cook v. Moffat et al., 5 How. 308: "The constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and binds every forum, whether it derives its authority from a state or from the United States. When this court has declared state legislation to be in conflict with the constitution of the United States, and therefore void, the state tribunals are bound to conform to such decision."

The constitution of Georgia declared that each head of a family should be allowed a certain amount of realty as well as personalty, and that no court or ministerial officer should ever have jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree or execution against such property except for taxes, and so forth. The legislature of the same state, in October, 1868, passed "An act to provide for setting apart the homestead as required by the constitution." In the cases before us the exception was claimed under the constitution and acts of the general assembly of this state, which, except as to the amount of homestead allowed and the prohibition of jurisdiction by the courts, were of the same character as those provided by the constitution and laws of Georgia. In the application of the principles which are to govern their enforcement, as proposed by the two states, no difference can be found to exist. The emphatic language of the opinion bears directly upon the general powers of the state to withdraw from a contract any substantial right which attached to at its inception, and must be viewed and accepted as the expression of the court in regard to all homestead exceptions. It is in these words: "The legal remedies for the enforcement of a contract, which belong to it at the time and place where it is made, are a part of its obligation. A state may change them, provided the change involve no impairment of a substantial right. If the provision of the constitution or the legislative act of a state fall within the category last mentioned, they are to that extent utterly void. They are, for all the purposes of the contract which they impair, as if they had never existed. The constitutional provision and statute here in question are clearly within that category and are therefore void."

The contracts on which these actions are founded were entered into before the adoption of our constitution, and we can perceive in them no element in regard to the homestead law which withdraws them from the principles announced in Gunn v. Barry.

The motions are granted and the cases remanded to the circuit court.

Correspondence — Fields' Case—Audi Alteram Partem.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., March 31, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Your number of the 15th of January last contains a comment upon the decision in Fields v. The State, 47 Ala. 603, which, it is believed, is not justified by the decision there made. Confident that you would not intentionally do an injustice, and that you will readily correct any error into which you may have fallen, if it be pointed out, I propose, with your permission, to show wherein your comment is not supported by the case criticised.

Digitized by Google

1. You say that you have read and re-read the opinion several times, and, as nearly as you can comprehend it, "it affirms distinctly that, in Alabama, it is not as much of a crime to kill a man whose general character for turbulence, violence and bloodshed is bad, as to kill one whose general character in these particulars is good." With all due deference it is submitted that that was not the decision!

It will be readily admitted by you that in construing the language of a judge, or in extracting from his opinion the legal principles controlling a decision, we must always take the expressions used in connection with the particular law and facts governing the case. It is equally well settled that the judge must enforce the law as he finds it, not as he thinks it ought to be, and that a court (in this instance one of appellate jurisdiction) is bound only by its ruling on points required to be decided to dispose of the case, or, if it be remanded, to guide the lower court in the further progress of the cause.

Judged by these rules, the court enunciated but two principles of law in Fields' case. The first question passed on was this: Was the general bad character of the deceased, as a violent, turbulent, bloodthirsty man, who had, but a few hours before the killing, outraged the person of his slayer, admissible and proper evidence for the consideration of the jury, under the facts in that case? The court (for that is the effect of its judgment) say that it was, for the reason that the jury, under the Alabama law, were vested with power not only to determine the guilt or innocence of defendant, but, if guilty, to fix the degree of his guilt and the character, extent and severity of the punishment to be inflicted, and therefore must necessarily have evidence to guide and control that discretion; and that not only the facts of the killing itself, but those immediately connected with it, and which may reasonably be supposed to have led to the killing, are proper to be considered by the jury in exercising the discretion vested in them by law.

The second point ruled by the court was this: The defendant having proved his character as a peaceable and law-abiding man to be good, was it proper for the court below to refuse to charge the jury that "such good character may be sufficient to create or generate a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, although no such doubt would have existed but for such good character"? The court ruled that the charge should have been given.

This is a fair statement of what was decided in that case, and the legal mind will see from it that nowhere did the court decide that it was not as great a crime to kill one man as another. In speaking of the discretion of the jury in assessing the punishment, PECK, Ch. J., says: "Who is prepared to say that the punishment should be the same where a turbulent, bloodthirsty, dangerous man, reckless of human life, has been slain—who had recently, and only a few hours before, outraged the person of his slayer—as though the party slain had been a man of good character and peaceable disposition?" He was not then speaking of the technical magnitude of the offence, or the technical difference between the killing of a good man or a bad man, but merely as to the punishment. And, as if to leave no doubt as to what reasoning the court was bound by, he continues, "for myself, I can not conscientiously say so" [that is, that the punishment should be the same in the cases mentioned by him]. Immediately he adds, speaking for the court, "yet we hold it (the evidence offered) clearly proper for the consideration of the jury in determining the turpitude of the crime, and what should be the measure of the punishment to be inflicted." He further adds, that although the evidence may not be sufficient to reduce the grade of the offence from murder to manslaughter in the particular case, yet it was clearly proper to enable the jury intelligently to exercise the discretion vested in them by law. See, in this connection, Flannagan v. The State, 46 Ala. 705, which you will doubtless call a more remarkable case than Fields'.

It is difficult to see from this statement how you arrived at the conclusion that either the court or the Chief Justice expressed the opinion that "it is not so much of a crime" to kill a turbulent man, etc., as to kill a good one, or as you express it in another place, "that it may not be so heinous a crime to kill a bad man as a good one," unless you hold that the punishment meted out, not the act denounced by law, makes the crime. And for this, if it be so, the court can not be held responsible. If this were so, there should be but one certain and unvarying penalty for each crime, and no power lodged anywhere to vary it according to the circumstances of the particular case. The court can not take away from the jury that discretion which permits them in the one case to hang a murderer, and in the other to imprison him for life, when both have done an act which the law denounces as murder in the first degree. Neither can court nor judge refuse to enforce the law which reduces a killing (which was murder at the common law and punishable by death) into grades of murder, allowing the jury to affix the death penalty in the one case, and to imprison for as short a term as ten years in the other.

What does the law mean when it says to a jury, you may take a murderer's life, or imprison him for life, if you find that he has committed murder in the first degree, and if you find it to be in the second degree you may imprison him as long as you please, or for as short a term as ten years? Clearly, the law "in Alabama" means that under some circumstances murder in the first degree ought to be punished with more severity than the same crime under different circumstances. It meant not only that some murders should be punished with more severity than others of the same degree of crime, but also that one class of killing denominated murder should not be as heinous an offense, nor of as high a grade, as another class of killing denominated murder. There can be but one answer when we seek the reason of this law, and it is this: common sense and the experience of mankind have long since taught that although two offences may be technically the same, yet in point of fact they differ in heinousness; that one does not deserve so severe a punishment as the other; that the turpitude of the one may be far blacker than that of the other; that the circumstances attending a particular case may demand for its punishment the most rigid execution of the law, while another may hardly merit the lightest punishment of the technical grade of crime to which the two offences equally belong. If the crime of murder in the first degree, at least so far as punishment is considered, is always equally heinous, why should the law provide two punishments for it, one of less severity than the other?

Speaking in a legal and technical sense, it is no "greater crime" for an able-bodied son to maliciously brain his helpless mother, or poison or starve her for the purpose of inheriting her property, than it would be for that same son, smarting under a desire for revenge, to kill one who had injured him, under circumstances constituting murder in law. For a hired nurse deliberately to drown an infant out of hatred to its parent, is murder in the first degree. For a brother deliberately to lie in wait for his sister's seducer, long after he has had cooling time, and maliciously to kill him, is also murder in the first degree. In the eye of the law the life of the mother and that of the man killed in the rencontre, the life of the murdered child and that of the seducer, are all alike equally sacred and equally protected. One has as much right, in the eye of the law, to life as the other—no more, no less. Yet who will say that, morally speaking, the assassin of his mother is not more guilty than he who kills his enemy in the rencontre? Who will deny that the one murderer ought to be visited with severer (human) punishment than the other? Who can conscientiously say that the slayer of his sister's seducer ought to be punished as severely or is guilty of "as heinous a crime" (as far as punishment goes) as the murderer of the helpless infant?

And yet all the cases put are equally murder in the first degree, and all, legally and technically speaking, the same crime. When, therefore, we contend that there should be less severe punishment in the case of the slayer of the seducer than of the assassin of the mother, we can not be said to hold in any legal, proper sense, that it is less "a crime," under our laws, to kill one person than another.

The law permits the good character of a defendant, especially in capital cases, to be considered by the jury in determining guilt or innocence, and even in clear cases, by the power that fixes the punishment (be it judge or jury), to determine oftentimes the extent of the punishment. Such, at least, is the principle of law in many states of the Union. Yet will any one contend that it is law in those states, because defendant can give in evidence his good character, that it is a less crime for a man of good character to violate the law than it is for a bad man to break the same law? And yet such a comment would seem to be as legitimate as the one made on the decision in Fields' case! Most assuredly, when the law gave such large discretion to the punishing power (the jury) it intended to afford them all proper means and evidence for the intelligent exercise of that discretion; and the court say that the character of the deceased is a fit thing to be considered by them in determining which of the several punishments allowed by law they will affix to the grade of guilt in the particular case. Besides all this, if the law permits the good character of a defendant to be given in evidence in all capital cases, even to generate a doubt of guilt, by what sound logic ought the character of the deceased to be excluded, if the defendant wishes to introduce it, when it tends to throw any light whatever on the circumstances, animus, or situation of the parties at the time of a homicide?

Digitized by Google

I submit that the language of PECK, Ch. J., when he asks whether the punishment (not the crime) in the two cases put by him should be the same, is not fairly susceptible of the meaning that, technically and legally speaking, the crime itself is any less in the one case than the other. He does not so argue, nor does he contend that where the same circumstances occasion a homicide, the bare fact that the person slain was a bad man would reduce a killing from murder to manslaughter, etc., when, if the person slain was a good man, it would be murder. His language must be construed with reference to the statute itself, which says the circumstances of the killing (which at the common law was murder with the death penalty attached) may reduce it from murder in the first degree to murder in the second, and measurably lessen the punishment, and to those cases which from their very nature make it proper to consider the character of the deceased. The language thus construed does not militate against the admitted law as stated by you, "that all men * * stand on an equal footing in the eye of the law in respect to the right to live, * * * and that it is as much murder to kill one man as the other," be he heathen, outlaw, infidel, Indian or negro.

2. Your other criticism on the language that the circumstances attending the killing "should be viewed in connection with the good or bad character of both defendant and deceased" is not exactly fair, in this, that it omits to state that in the case under discussion the defendant had voluntarily put his character in issue and asked a charge, which was refused, as to the effect of proof of good character, and that it was in discussing this that the Chief Justice used the language quoted. Certainly where defendant's character is thus lawfully in issue, it is a fit matter to be considered by the jury in deciding upon his guilt and affixing the punishment. One of the first questions asked when a bloody crime is spoken of is, "what was the character of the participants?" As far as possible, juries, in deciding capital cases of this kind, should place themselves in the situation of the parties at the time of the homicide. No such question arose in the case as whether a defendant's character could be attacked by the prosecution unless the defendant first voluntarily raised the issue, and the language of the Chief Justice can not fairly be interpreted even as an intimation of opinion on that point. The law has been long settled to the contrary in Alabama. In Brown v. The State, 46 Ala. 184, PECK, Ch. J., combated the doctrine laid down in the case of Com. v. Sackett, 22 Pick. 394, holding that "it is not permissible, in a criminal prosecution, for the state to enquire into the general character of a defendant until he has voluntarily put it in issue, and [contrary to the Massachusetts case] that the enquiry must be confined to a time antecedent to the time when the offense charged is alleged to have been committed."

Knowing that your legal instincts would make you desirous of "giving the other side a hearing," I have (as you will see) rather hastily written out my views in support of what most of our Bar deem to be sound law, probably taxing your patience and columns to an unwarrantable extent.

Respectfully, THOMAS G. JONES.

Book Notice.

THE DOCTOR AND STUDENT: or, Dialogues between a Doctor of Divinity and a Student on the Laws of England. Containing the grounds of those laws, together with questions and cases concerning the equity thereof. Revised and corrected by WILLIAM MUCHALL, Gent. To which are added two pieces concerning suits in chancery by Subpena. 8vo., pp. 401. Cincinnati: R. Clarke & Co. 1874.

If we were asked to name one treatise on English law of more interest than any other in the long series that extends through the seven centuries from Glanvil to our own day, with reference to the development of that law and the history of legal doctrine, we should certainly select The Doctor and Student. Bracton is no doubt more instructive upon the origin and first forms of the common law; Coke's First Institute covers a wider field, to say nothing of Blackstone and other modern writers upon the entire system. But as marking an epoch in the life of the law, and throwing light upon the modes of thought and reasoning, upon the accepted principles and the unconscious tendencies of doctrine, no one of them seems better worth the careful study of a scientific lawyer than the modest little dialogues of St. Germain. It is no credit to our profession that it has of late years passed so completety out of use as to become one of the rarest of law books. Its title was kept familiar to the profession by two or three well-known quotations, but many of our younger members of the bar will no doubt see it for the first time in this neat edition.

The work was first printed in 1523 (not 1518, as erroneously stated in the preface), and its early repute may be judged from the fact that it went through no less than seventeen editions before the end of 1787. From that time we believe there has been but one printed in England, in 1815; and that, like the present, was a verbatim reprint from the edition "revised and corrected by William Muchall, Gent," in 1787. Muchall showed a good taste, none too common in his time, in leaving the fine old English of the author's own day unchanged (except in spelling) as he found it in the earlier editions; and to the lovers of good idiomatic sixteenth-century English this handsome reprint will have scarcely less interest than it has for the professional reader. Between the two classes of readers we may hope for a demand which at no far-off day will give us a well-edited critical edition, such as European lawyers love to bestow on their legal classics. The present notes (from Muchall's edition) are of the most trivial kind. But if some of the accomplished lawyers who are now busy with the improvement of our law by importing all kinds of novelties from other systems would spare a little time to study the history of our own, and embody the results in appropriate notes to books like this upon such topics as we have already referred to in speaking of the value of the work, they would indeed be "visiting and strengthening the roots and foundation of the science itself," in the impressive words of Lord Bacon.

So we cannot help thinking that if Lord Holt had spent the same labor in illustrating and extending the excellent sketch of the law of bailments (Dialogue second, chapter 38) that he did in importing cumbrous Latin phrases and fragments of civilian doctrine in his famous opinion in Coggs v. Bernard; and if, comparing this work with Bracton, he had shown the remarkable development of the common law on that subject, instead of going back to recast the law of his own day into the form of those sources from which Bracton borrowed—in that case our law of bailments would be far simpler, more harmonious, more logical than it is at present. Other passages to illustrate the same point may be found almost at random through the work. The discussion of a lawyer's duty in cases of doubtful morality (pp. 115–121), of the duties of executors (pp. 128–135), of the origin of uses (pp. 165–175), of the consideration of promises (pp. 174–181), of ignorance of law and fact (pp. 248–255), are exceedingly instructive and would repay careful annotation, showing by what regular and logical processes the law of our own day has for the most part been developed from purely indigenous sources. We have no space for extracts, but must quote a brief one from the chapter first above referred to, because it states in the most distinct and pithy form a doctrine to which our highest courts have but recently returned, after a long conflict and confusion of decided cases, as to the right of a carrier to limit his liability by notice or contract:

"And if [the carrier] would percase refuse to carry it, unless promise were made unto him that he shall not be charged for no misdemeanor that should be in him, the promise were void, for it were against reason and against good manners, and so it is in all other cases like. And all these diversities be granted by secondary conclusions derived upon the law of reason, without any statute made in that behalf. And peradventure, law and the conclusions therein be the more plain and the more open. For i any statute were made therein, I think verily more doubts and questions would arise upon the statute than doth now when they be only argued and judged after the common law." (p. 221).

Even for the mere practitioner, who cares for nothing in any book except the quotable "points" that may be used to garnish a brief, The Doctor and Student has its own value. It abounds with pithy, clear expressions of those fundamental doctrines of the common law which have been so long recognized that it is almost impossible to find a modern decision affirming them, or a modern treatise expressing them in their original form—e. g., that the heir or next of kin, as such, shall have no meddling with the goods of deceased (p. 225); that the essence of a consideration lies in the charge to the promisee, not in the profit to the promisor (p. 177); that no prescription in lands maketh a right (p. 27); that no manner of chattel, neither real nor personal, shall, after the law of the realm, descend unto the heir (p. 137). True, these are mingled with a great deal of obsolete matter—questions about fines and entails, villeins and neifs, abbots and courts christian

Digitized by Google

Mr. Muchall was careful to note all that was obsolete in his day, but we are thankful that he did not venture to omit it; for many of these passages are among the most valuable in the book to a thorough student. The work, as a whole, its purpose, method, spirit and effects, will be seen as much in these chapters as in those of modern application. The author's purpose in writing such a work is of itself a question of much interest, and worthy a careful examination. But we have already far exceeded the proper limits of a notice.

Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co. have produced the volume in a handsome dress, with clear white paper and an open, legible page. But the proof-reader has been very careless. W. E. H.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE bill for compulsory education has been defeated in the Illinois legislature, after an exciting contest.

—THE Supreme Court of the United States will hear no arguments after the 24th inst., and will adjourn for the term on the 28th of May.

—THE president has nominated William J. Wallace United States district judge for the northern district of New York, in place of the late Judge Hall.

—JUDGE CALDWELL, of the federal district court at Little Rock, has ruled that a single member of a firm who are the petitioning creditors is competent to depose to the act of bankruptcy.

—THE Supreme Court of Arkansas has recently decided, in Pinson v. State, that a suit on a bail bond is a common action to enforce a civil contract, and that the law applicable to it will not be more strictly construed than that relating to any other class of civil contracts.

—WE are greatly indebted to J. B. F. Thomas, Esq., of Boston, Mass., for a recent decision of Judge LOWELL, of the federal circuit court for Massachusetts, expounding the recent shipping law. We are also indebted to an unknown friend in New York city for a decision of Judge WOODRUFF in the federal circuit court for that district, expounding the same act. These we shall endeavor to publish next week.

—A DISPATCH from Forest City, Arkansas, states that Judge John W. Fox, judge of the eleventh judicial district, was shot, on the 22d ult., by J. R. Aldrich, a lawyer, and died in the afternoon. Judge Fox was passing along the street, when Aldrich stepped out and said, "Now, Judge Fox," and fired. Aldrich fired the second barrel after Fox had fallen. Aldrich delivered himself up to the sheriff. The origin of the difficulty is not known, though it is thought it grew out of some remarks to Aldrich by Fox while the latter was on the bench.

—THE Daily Register says of the Sanborn trial: "We cannot understand by what process of reasoning the United States district attorney in Brooklyn arrived at the conclusion that Sanborn and his assistants, acting under authority of law, could conspire together to perpetrate frauds. His Honor Judge Benedict very properly dismissed the case after it was made clear that Sanborn was acting in pursuance of an act of Congress. There never was, perhaps, a more complete failure to establish a ground whereon he prosecution could stand in court. This looks bad for the district attorney. How can he explain to the law department at Washington this attempt to hamper the operations of an officer of the general government?"

—THE will of the late Lord WESTBURY has already been before the courts three times. At present it takes the shape of an amicable suit brough before the Master of the Rolls. It is claimed that this is not done on account of any obscurity in the will, but because it is deemed best, for reasons of a private nature, that the administration of the estate should be accomplished in the Court of Chancery. Singularly enough, however, the Master of the Rolls, Sir GEORGE JESSEL, has been obliged, by a decision of Lord WESTBURY himself, to put an interpretation upon his Lordship's will which is conjectural and probably contrary to the testator's intentions. If a Lord Chancellor of England cannot make a will which shall safely pass the gauntlet of judicial interpretation, who can?

—MR. ALBERT G. BROWNE, jr., who, since the year 1867, has been the reporter of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, has resigned his situation, and Mr. John Lathrop, of Boston, has been appointed in his stead. Mr. Browne's reports begin with the 97th volume. The 108th is published, and the 109th will soon appear. There will be five other volumes, making seventeen volumes of Browne's Reports, or from the 97th to the 114th Massachusetts Reports, inclusive. Mr. Browne has proved to be a most excellent reporter. We understand he goes on to the New York Evening Post. In the preparation of the unpublished reports he will be aided by Mr. John C. Gray, jr. Mr. Lathrop, the new reporter, is a lawyer of good repute, and withal, we learn, a fine writer.

—THE following is the order of the Supreme Court of the United States allotting the justices since the appointment of chief justice. It will be seen that the allotments remain unchanged, the chief justice being assigned to the circuit occupied by his predecessor:

There having been a chief justice of this court appointed since the commencement of this term, it is ordered that the following allottment be made of the chief justice and associate justices of said court among the circuits, agreeably to the act of Congress in such case made and provided, and that such allotment be entered of record, viz:.

For the first circuit, Nathan Clifford, associate justice; second circuit, Ward Hunt, associate justice; third circuit, William Strong, associate justice; fourth circuit, Morrison R. Waite, chief justice; fifth circuit, Joseph P. Bradley, associate justice; sixth circuit, Noah H. Swayne, associate justice; seventh circuit, David Davis, associate justice; eighth circuit, Samuel F. Miller, associate justice; ninth circuit, Stephen J. Field, associate justice.

—UNDER existing treaties with non-Christian powers, Christian governments exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the lives and liberties of their subjects in those countries. Thus, an American who commits a breach of the peace or other offence against the law in the streets of Cairo or Pekin is arrested by the native police and taken, not before one of their own courts, but before the proper American diplomatic agent, by whom he is tried. Under treaty arrangements of this kind have come into existence what are termed "consular courts," the jurisdiction of which is quite an interesting topic of the law. It is patent at a glance that this arrangement is all one-sided, in favor of the Christian powers and their citizens or subjects residing in "infidel" or "heathen" countries. The present Khedive of Egypt ranks in progressiveness and liberality of sentiment with the most enlightened princes of Europe, and this system of consular courts in his dominions has for some time been felt to be an injustice to him. A bill has recently passed Congress authorizing the president to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals established or to be established under the authority of the Sublime Porte and the government of Egypt, within the dominions of the Porte and those of the Viceroy. Under the new arrangement, courts will be established composed of two subjects of the Porte and five Franks or non-Turks, the latter being nominated to the sultan by the Christian powers consenting to this arrangement. The United States will probably nominate one of these commissioners.

—THE forthcoming volume of Alabama Reports will contain a memoir of Hon. ABRAM J. WALKER, formerly a Justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama. He was born in Davidson county, Tennessee, November 24th, 1819, and was graduated from the university at Nashville ere he reached his twentieth year. After his graduation he studied law in the office of John Trimble, Esq., until the fall of 1841, when, having been admitted to the bar, he removed to Benton (now Calhoun) county, Ala., and there commenced his professional career. In 1845, without any solicitation on his part, he was nominated and elected to the house of representatives in the general assembly of the state, and in 1848 was an elector on the Cass and Butler ticket. In the exciting canvass of 1851–2 he was elected state senator from Benton county.

In 1852 he formed a law partnership with John T. Morgan, and removed to Talladega, Ala. In 1854 he was elected Chancellor of the Northern Chancery Division of that state. His career as Chancellor won for him great reputation, and as the fruits thereof he was in 1856, on the resignation of Judge Chilton, elected Justice of the Supreme Court. In 1859 he was elected Chief Justice, vice Judge Rice, resigned. Judge WALKER continued upon the bench by successive re-elections until July, 1868, when, his office having been vacated by operation of the reconstruction acts, he returned to the bar. He died at Montgomery, April 25, 1872, in the 53d year of his age.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, APRIL 16, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $3 PER ANNUM, in Advance

Liability of Railroad Company for Injuries to Children Caused by an Unfastened Turntable.

The question as to the liability of a railroad company for injuries to children caused by an unsecured and unguarded turntable upon their own land, with knowledge that children are in the habit of playing with it, is before the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of Patrick Keffe v. The Milwaukee and St. Paul R. R. Co. The lower court decided in favor of the company, mainly on the ground that the children were trespassers. See Stout v. Railroad Company, 2 Dillon, C. C. 294, in which the company was held liable under the circumstances there disclosed by the circuit court, whose judgment was affirmed by the U. S. Supreme Court. CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL, ante, p. 76.

The Doctor and Student.

The review which was printed in our last issue of Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co.'s new edition of this legal classic, has attracted considerable attention, and we have been several times asked "who is W. E. H.?" We take the liberty of stating that that notice was written by Prof. William G. Hammond. of the law department of the Iowa State University—an able lawyer and a ripe scholar. Prof. Hammond modestly sent the manuscript to the JOURNAL without his initials attached, and by a painful error of the assistant editor they were written at the end of the manuscript, W. E. H., instead of W. G. H. The attention of the reader who peruses that notice will be struck no less by the familiar and easy acquaintance with the book itself which Prof. Hammond exhibits, than by the excellent sense and scholarly taste with which it is written. Prof. Hammond writes to us that although he has written nothing for publication for three years past, yet he esteems it an honor to be numbered among the occasional contributors of this journal. It is an honor to us, and not to him.

Chief Justice Waite's First Decision.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered his first opinion on the bench of the Supreme Court on the 13th instant in the case of Tappan, collector of taxes at Chicago, v. The First National Bank of Chicago, from the Circuit Court for Illinois. The members of the bar who heard it, and his brethren on the bench, speak of it in eulogistic terms. Reverdy Johnson was complimentary in his remarks, both as to the merits of the opinion and the manner of delivery. The case presented the question as to whether the legislature of Illinois could, in 1867, provide for the taxation of owners of shares of capital stock of a national bank in that state, at a place within the state where the bank was located, without regard to their places of residence. The court below decided that a tax could not thus be laid, and the decree was against the collector. The decree is reversed by the Supreme Court, this court holding that shares of stock in national banks are personal property, under the national banking act. They are a species of personal property, say the court, which is in one sense intangible and incorporeal, but the law which creates them may separate them from the person of the owner for the purpose of taxation.

Railway Transportation of Live Stock.

Railway companies transport for thousands of miles nearly all the live stock of the country destined for distant markets. In the case of The Louisville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Hedges, reported 13 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 145, March, 1874, the Kentucky Court of Appeals considers the peculiar liabilities of carriers of live stock. There is an instructive note to the case by Judge REDFIELD. 1. It would seem that the authorities have settled the doctrine that a stock carrier may by special contract with the owner protect himself from all liability except that which arises from the carrier's own negligence. 2. Without any special contract to that effect, the carrier of live stock is not an insurer of safe transportation to the same extent as in the case of ordinary merchandise, and is not liable for such accidents as are necessarily incident to the transportation of live animals, that is, for damages caused by the inherent nature or "proper vice" of the animal, such as kicking, goring, etc., if the carrier has taken every reasonable precaution to prevent such accidents and damages by providing proper cars and appliances, and keeping the same in safe and proper condition. 3. Loss or injury to the animals, according to the opinion of the Kentucky Court of Appeals, when in the custody of the carrier, is presumptive evidence of his negligence; but when, by agreement between the owner and carrier, the owner takes charge of his stock during transportation, negligence must be proved to establish a liability on the part of the carrier, but the latter is still bound to provide proper cars, chutes, etc.

The Late John W. Edmonds.

This distinguished jurist died at his residence in New York city on the 5th instant. Judge EDMONDS' name is doubtless familiar to most of the lawyers throughout the country, not only from the fact of his acknowledged ability and purity as a judge, but also from the fact that his name has been frequently brought before the public in connection with his peculiar religious belief. He was a firm believer in spiritualism, and, as he supposed, held constant communication with departed friends. So far as we are aware, there never was any complaint that these vagaries, if such we may be privileged to call them, influenced in any degree his professional conduct. The following brief sketch of his life we take from the Daily Register:

"He was born in Hudson, in March, 1799, was graduated at Union College, in 1816, and in 1820 began the practice of law in his native city. In 1831 he was a member of the assembly from Columbia county. In 1832 he was elected to the senate from the old third district and served four years. In the legislature he was prominent as a debater. In 1837 Judge EDMONDS came to this city and engaged in the practice of his profession. In 1843 he was inspector of state prisons, and was successful in reforming discipline, and the old system of corporal punishment was exchanged for the present. In 1845 Judge EDMONDS was appointed a circuit judge, in 1847 he was elected to the Supreme Court, and in 1852 reached the Court of Appeals. He retired from the bench in 1853, and has since practiced law."

Digitized by Google

We may add that he published in 1869 a volume of his decisions at nisi prius, entitled Edmonds' Select Cases. The great work of his life was, however, the edition of the Statutes at Large of New York, in five volumes, with elaborate notes.

Municipal Taxation of Rolling Stock.

The case of The City of St. Joseph against the Kansas City, St. Joseph & Council Bluffs Railroad Company, in which right was claimed to tax all the company's rolling stock in the city where the company's headquarters are, came up before Judge WAGNER, of the Missouri Supreme Court, for decision lately. The power was denied. Judge WAGNER said:

"The proposition is undoubtedly true that where a corporation has residence, their property of this description is liable to assessment and taxation if the law has prescribed no different rule and regulation on the subject. This notion of certain personal property following personal residence of a corporation is a legal fiction, but it is not an unbending and uncontrollable principle of law. It may be modified by the legislature. The rolling stock of the company is in a constant state of transit, and has no more real local existence in one county than another. A county through whose whole length it runs might well think that it had as much right to tax it as a city that it passed through but a mile or two at most, but both would have no right to levy tax, for that would be double taxation upon the same property. This machinery by which the road is operated is constantly passing from one to the other, the entire road, and to save all cavil and dispute in respect to it, it was perfectly competent for the legislature to say that it should become a part of the road itself and become property the same as the road, and that for purposes of taxation should be equally distributed through counties, cities or towns through which it passed, in proportion to its length in those respective localities."

As to the taxation of rolling stock and railroad property by municipalities, see cases cited, Dillon Munic. Corp. § 629, note.

Transfers of Municipal Subscriptions to Railroads.

The Supreme Court of Kansas has rendered a decision in the case of The Missouri River, Fort Scott & Gulf Railroad v. The County Commissioners of Miami County, reversing the decision of the lower court. The following is the syllabus:

1. Under the laws of 1862 the county commissioners could, without any specific legislation, and without any express authority of the voters, make a valid sale and transfer of stock in a railroad company belonging to the county and issued to it by such company in pursuance of a duly authorized subscription.

2. In making such sale the commissioners are the agents of the county.

3. Any sale may be avoided when accomplished by fraud on the part of the purchaser, or by collusion between the purchaser and agent.

4. Where both parties to an executory non-negotiable contract for the sale and transfer of personal property have failed to perform any of the stipulations of the contract, neither party can make the mere fact of non-performance ground for the interposition of a court of chancery to declare the contract null and void.

5. A court of equity will not declare a contract between two corporations, otherwise valid, void because the seals of the corporations are not affixed to it, but if necessary will rather compel the parties to affix their seals.

6. Mere inadequacy of price affords no ground to set aside a contract of sale, unless it be of so gross a nature and given under such circumstances as to afford a necessary presumption of fraud or imposition.

7. Where part of the consideration is money and part the doing of certain work within the specified time, proof that the cash consideration is grossly inadequate, without any showing as to the nature and value of the work to be done, raises no presumption of fraud or imposition.

Testimony of Defendants in Criminal Cases.

Chief Justice APPLETON, of Maine, is, it is well known, a warm advocate of the policy and justice of allowing defendants in criminal cases to testify in their own behalf. The law of Maine makes such defendants competent witnesses for themselves. In the Reed murder case, lately tried before him, the prisoner testified, and alluding to this circumstance the Chief Justice made, inter alia, the following remarks to the jury:

"The prisoner has been a witness. He is either innocent or guilty. If innocent, the truth is his only protection. Truth is one and eternal. All true facts are consistent with each other. There is no reason for his withholding the truth. There is every reason for its utterance. If guilty, if he utters truth, it necessitates his conviction. The resort of the criminal, then, in all cases, is or must ever be to falsehood, to evasion or silence. But falsehood to exonerate is evidence of crime. An innocent man does not resort to falsehood, for falsehood is evidence tending to show guilt. Each falsehood uttered by way of exculpation becomes an article of circumstantial evidence, of greater or lesser inculpatory force, as you may judge. The deceased, Ray, was last seen Tuesday night, 20th. His body was found on Wednesday, the 28th. The prisoner and Mrs. Ray were arrested. Were there any suspicions attaching to any one else? The prisoner was examined then under oath, at a time when every event was recent. His examination was reduced to writing, signed, and I suppose sworn to by him. With a charge of murder resting upon him, you will consider whether he would affix his signature to any paper, or whether his vigilant counsel would permit him so to affix it, without full knowledge of its contents. He has been on the stand before you. As before remarked, statements of untruth, by way of defence, when proved to be untruths, at once become articles of circumstantial evidence, probative in their tendency of guilt."

Chief Justice Chase and his Biographer.

The late Chief Justice CHASE kept a diary from early manhood to the time of his death, and his biography by Judge WORDEN contains copious extracts from it, published with a bad taste that justifies the relatives of the deceased Chief Justice in their attempt to prevent his use of it. It will, however, no doubt make the book a great success from the publisher's standpoint. Among the entries from this diary which a biographer who possessed a proper regard for the great trust committed to him by his departed friend would never have allowed to see the light, is one dated September 12, 1862, in which Mr. CHASE expresses his opinions in language which would indicate that his disposition to complain had become chronic:

Digitized by Google

"Expenses are enormous, increasing instead of diminishing, and the ill-successes in the field have so affected government stocks that it is impossible to obtain money except on temporary deposit, and these deposits very little exceed——. We are forced, therefore, to rely on the increased issue of the United States notes, which hurts almost as much as it helps; for the omission of congress to take any measures to restrict bank note circulation makes the issue of these notes a stimulant to its increase, so that the augmentation of the currency proceeds by a double action and prices rise proportionably. It is a bad state of things, but neither the president, his counsellors nor his commanding general seem to care. They rush on from expense to expense and from defeat to defeat, heedless of the abyss of bankruptcy and ruin which yawns before us. May God open the eyes of those who control us before it is too late!"

Perhaps, however, Judge WORDEN has proceeded with reference to the maxim suppressio veri suggestio falsi, and, like a witness upon the stand, has felt himself under obligations to the public and to the cause of impartial history, to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. The above extract would seem in some degree to corroborate what has frequently been asserted, that the chief justiceship was a sort of honorable exile resorted to by Mr. Lincoln in order to relieve Mr. CHASE from duty in his cabinet.

The Supreme Bench of Minnesota.

Just before going to press we learn that the Supreme Court of Minnesota has been reorganized by the appointment of Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN, one of the associate justices, to be chief justice, vice Chief Justice RIPLEY, resigned. Chief Justice MCMILLAN has been for a number of years an associate justice of the court, and his promotion will give general satisfaction. To fill the vacancy occasioned by the promotion of Mr. Justice MCMILLAN, the governor has appointed GEORGE B. YOUNG, Esq., of Minneapolis, to be an associate justice. This appointment created considerable surprise to the bar and to the public as Mr. YOUNG is quite a young man to be called to so exalted a position, being but thirty-five years of age. We are, however, informed by those who know him intimately, that he is a man of brilliant talents and of a judicial temperament, and that his conduct on the bench will justify the governor's choice. The only objection which has been made to his appointment, so far as we know, is his youth, and this is in his favor rather than otherwise. Many of the most brilliant and enduring achievements of the most noted men were performed in their youth. Examples like Alexander, Hannibal and Napoleon in arms, and Pitt and Patrick Henry in the forum, are only selections from a great multitude of like instances. Nor has it been on the field of battle or in the forum alone that great men have exhibited their greatness in their earlier years. The more tedious and plodding walks of the law have not been less prolific of such examples. BLACKSTONE wrote his great Commentaries when he was a young and briefless barrister. SMITH, author of the Leading Cases, died at thirty-six. Sir WILLIAM JONES wrote his famous work on Bailments when in his thirties. Coming nearer our own time, we find among the class-mates of Mr. Justice YOUNG, at Harvard University, or graduating at nearly the same time, MORSE, the distinguished author of Banks and Banking and of Arbitration and Awards; SCHOULER, author of Personal Property and Domestic Relations; BALCH, editor of Story's Equity Jurisprudence and of the second edition of Blackwell's Tax Titles; JOHN C. GRAY, Jr., late editor of the American Law Review and editor of Story on Partnership; and last, though not least, OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, Jr., editor of the American Law Review and of the last and best edition of Kent's Commentaries. To these we may add ISAAC GRANT THOMPSON, who edits with such consummate skill and success the American Reports, the New York Supreme Court Reports and the Albany Law Journal, who is quite a young man, and MELVILLE M. BIGELOW, author of the Law of Estoppel—a book which we have never heard spoken of except in praise—scarcely above thirty. The fact is, young men, or men not far advanced in life—other things being equal—make the best judges as well as the best soldiers. The desire of winning an honorable name is always greater in youth than in old age. If the accumulation of knowledge and experience is not as great, the intellect is clearer, while it is in early life alone that one possesses the physical vigor equal to the great labors of the judicial office. No one understood this better than Mr. WEBSTER when he recommended Mr. B. R. CURTIS, then about forty, as the successor of Mr. Justice STORY in preference to RUFUS CHOATE, and placed his preference upon the sole ground that Mr. CURTIS was a young man.

Removal of Causes from State to Federal Court under the Act of 1867—Time when Petition for Removal must be Filed.

The act of congress of 1867, in respect to the removal of causes from the state court to the federal court, contains the provision that upon filing the required affidavit of prejudice or local influence, the petition for the removal may be filed "at any time before the final hearing or trial of the suit." This language has been recently construed by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and viewed in the light of the anterior legislation of congress upon the same subject, the court reached the conclusion that under the act of congress of 1867, it was too late to apply to remove a cause after a trial in the state court on the merits, although such trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury. Chief Justice GRAY, who delivered the opinion of the court, says: "'Trial' appropriately designates a trial by jury of an issue which will determine the facts in an action at law; and 'final hearing,' in contradistinction to hearings upon interlocutory matters, the hearing of the cause upon its merits by a judge sitting in equity." "The whole effect of the change of the statute [of 1867] in this respect seems to us," he adds, "to have been to allow the defendant the same time to elect whether he will remove the cause into the federal court, as he has to prepare for a trial at law or a hearing upon the merits in equity in the state court; * * * but not to allow him, after the experiment of entering upon one such trial or hearing in the court in which the suit is commenced, to transfer the case to another jurisdiction." * * * "It follows that, when the plaintiff went to a trial upon the merits of this action in the

Digitized by Google

Superior Court, his right to remove the case into the Circuit Court of the U. S. ceased, and was not revived by the failure of the jury to agree, nor would it have been if a verdict had been returned by them and set aside by the court;" and by parity of reasoning it would not be if the judgment had been reversed by the Supreme Court of the state and the cause remanded for a new trial. This construction of the act of 1867 conflicts with that given by Mr. Justice MILLER in Johnson v. Monell, Wool. C. C. R. 390, who held that the cause might be transferred after a verdict had been returned and set aside by the court. The opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts will be found reported in the March number, 1874, of the Am. Law Register, 137, with a note from the pen of Judge REDFIELD. Judge REDFIELD seems inclined to the opinion that the application for the removal may be made at any time before the final trial, where more than one for any reason should occur. It seems to us that this is the fair and natural construction of the act, and we doubt whether the more restricted view of the Massachusetts court will be approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. In Waggener v. Cheek, 2 Dillon, C. C. 565, it was held that it was too late in an equity cause to apply in an appellate court for its removal, although in one sense the final hearing had not been had. See also upon the subject here discussed: Ackerly v. Vilas, 24 Wis. 165; Waggener v. Cheek, supra, and cases cited; Home Life Ins. Co. v. Dunn, 20 Ohio State, 175; Dart v. McKinney, 9 Blatchf. C. C. 359; Adams Express Co. v. Trego, 35 Md. 47; Johnson v. Monell, supra; Grover & Baker Sew. Mach. Co. v. Florence Sew. Mach. Co., Supreme Court U. S., Dec. 1873, and cases cited by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD.

Cases in this Number.

We publish in this number a well-considered opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee upon the question of the liability of an express company for goods captured by an armed force in time of war. The opinion is also important from the fact that it declares and illustrates the principle that in expounding contracts with common carriers the courts will look to the circumstances surrounding the transaction, and to the course of business of the company and the shipper, as well as to the contract itself. The statement of the facts as given in the opinion of the court involves the case in some obscurity, from the fact that it does not show who C. B. Buckly was. If, as seems probable, this name, which occurs twice in the opinion, is a clerical error for J. C. Buckles, then the whole case becomes clear. For this opinion we are indebted to Hon. Joseph B. Heiskell, attorney-general of Tennessee, and reporter of the supreme court of that state.

Our readers in the seaboard cities who practice in the courts of admiralty will be interested in the two opinions which we publish, expounding those provisions of the shipping act of 1872, which require contracts with seamen to be in writing and entered into with certain formalities through the intervention of a shipping commissioner, and which prescribe penalties for the shipment of seamen by parol contract. The act would not, perhaps, have been difficult of construction were it not for the act of 1873, which repealed the stringent provisions of sec. 12 of the act of 1872 so far as they relate to voyages to the British North American possessions, the West Indies and Mexico. It will be seen that the opinions take opposing views of these statutes so far as they relate to such voyages. For the opinion of Circuit Judge WOODRUFF in the case of The City of Mexico, we are indebted to some unknown friend in New York City. For the opinion of District Judge LOWELL in the case of The Grace Lathrop, we are indebted to J. B. S. Thomas, Esq., of the Boston bar.

We add four pages to the JOURNAL this week to lay before our readers a very important and elaborate opinion of the Supreme Court of Indiana, expounding the statute of that state with reference to the liens of mechanics, laborers and materrial-men upon the building or structure erected or improvement made, where the contract was entered into with or the materials were furnished to a sub-contractor. Two points are uled: 1. That the lien attaches notwithstanding the contract may have been made with or the materials furnished to a subcontractor. 2. That if the lien is asserted within the time prescribed by the statute, it binds the property, although the owner in the meantime may have paid the contractor in full before receiving notice of the intention of the mechanic or material-man to rely upon the lien. The questions thus determined have, it is thought, arisen in nearly every state in the Union, and the decisions are by no means uniform. The case which we print was determined after very full argument by counsel interested in a number of cases involving the same questions. It affirms Barker v. Buell, 35 Ind. 297. The result is concurred in by the full bench, and the case will be decisive of a large number of others pending in that state. This opinion was furnished by our traveling correspondent, G. I. Jones, Esq.

We also an publish abridgment of a valuable opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire, determining the important question of constitutional law that a fund granted by a state legislature to a municipal corporation can not be diverted or taken away by subsequent legislation.

Liability of Express Companies for Losses Incident to a Time of War—Power of Common Carriers to Limit their Liabilities.

L. OLWELL v. THE ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Nashville, Feb. 7, 1874.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK, } Judges.
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN,

1. Liability of Common Carriers, etc.—Case in Judgment.—During the late war the plaintiff resided in Nashville, Tenn. He purchased goods in New York and had them shipped by the defendant's company, marked as follows, according to the express company's receipt: "L. Olwell, Nashville, care of J. C. Buckles, Louisville, Ky., which it is mutually agreed is to be forwarded to our agency nearest and most convenient to place of destination." The goods were duly carried to Louisville and received by Buckles, who paid the freight to that point, and again shipped them to the plaintiff at Nashville by the defendant's company, taking a receipt which provided against liability on the part of the company "for any loss or damage arising from the damages of railroad, steam or river navigation, leakage, fire, or from the acts of God or of the enemies of the government, mobs, riots or insurrections; pirates, or from any of the damages incident to a time of war, unless specially insured by them and so specified in this receipt, which insurance shall constitute the limit of the liability of the Adams Express Company in any event." It also contained an agreement on its back, relieving the express company from all liability as carriers, forwarders or bailees. This agreement was signed by C. B. Buckly, "per Memp," who was his clerk. The receipt did not show that the goods were specially insured. It was in proof that before goods could be shipped to civilians living as far south as Nashville, it was necessary to procure a "permit" from the United States treasury agent at Louisville, the goods passing through his hands. This the express company did not undertake to procure; but it was its course of business to forward goods to Louisville only, where, upon the proper permit being obtained, the company forwarded them under a new contract to their destination. It was also in proof that Buckles acted as agent of the plaintiff to receive his goods at Louisville and forward them to Nashville. The train which carried the goods in question was attacked by a small band of armed men, and the goods were destroyed, and the plaintiff brings this action for their value. Upon these facts it is held:

Digitized by Google

(1.) Interpretation of Contracts a Question of Law.—That it was the duty of the court to determine the effect of the first contract of shipment, and not to submit its construction to the jury; but although the judge submitted the construction of the contract to the jury, yet as he afterwards, in charging the jury, expressed the correct view of its meaning, the error was thereby cured.

(2.) Interpretation—Ambiguity.—That the first contract being uncertain in its meaning, is not to be interpreted by its terms alone, but in view of the circumstances surrounding the whole transaction.

(3.) The Contract in Judgment Construed.—That, viewed in the light of these facts, the first contract of shipment was an agreement simply to carry the goods to Louisville, and that for the time being was their destination.

(4.) Loss of Goods by Robbery.—That the limitations and restrictions contained in the second contract are to be interpreted as relieving the express company from liability for a loss of the goods by a robbery such as that shown in the proof.

(5.) Power of Common Carriers to Limit Liability.—That it was in the power of the company to limit its liability against damages for a loss sustained in this way.

(6.) Contract with Carriers—Assent of Shipper's Agent.—That the assent of the agent, Buckles, to the stipulations on the face of the contract is to be presumed from the fact that these terms of the contract were in accordance with the course of business of the company, to which the shipper had assented in previous transactions, and also from the fact of his signing the agreement on the back of the receipt; but it is admitted that the shipper's assent to the terms of such a special contract would not probably be held binding if given under circumstances showing that he was so in the power of the carrier as to leave him no discretion.

(7.) ——. ——. That Buckles had authority as the plaintiff's agent to make any contract according to the usual course of business to procure the goods to be reshipped from Louisville, and that he had authority to release the company from their common-law liability according to the contract of reshipment, and that such a contract made by the clerk of Buckles in the course of business was equally binding upon the plaintiff.

(8.) Conclusion upon the Facts.—That the plaintiff could not recover in respect of the goods that were saved, and that the defendant is not liable for the goods that were lost.

McFARLAND, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of certain goods, which he alleges were delivered to the defendant as a common carrier in the city of New York, to be carried and delivered to him at Nashville, which was never done. He has appealed in error.

There are two counts in the declaration; one averring the delivery of the goods in New York, the other their delivery to the company at Louisville, Ky.; in both counts charging a contract to carry and deliver them to the plaintiff at Nashville.

The plaintiff only offered evidence under the first count. He proved by the testimony of certain witnesses simply that the goods in four boxes were shipped from New York to the plaintiff by the Adams Express Company. The plaintiff offered no receipts or bills of lading in evidence; but the defendant moved the court to compel the plaintiff to deliver up receipts in his possession, and under this order receipts for two of the boxes were delivered up, which were read in evidence by the defendant. They show the boxes were marked "L. Olwell, Nashville, care of J. C. Buckles, Louisville, Ky.," and the receipts contain limitations and restrictions upon the company's common law liability, particularly against loss from causes incident to a time of war.

The proof tends to show that the goods were duly carried to Louisville and were there received by J. C. Buckles, who acted as the agent of the plaintiff. He paid the freight up to that point, and reshipped the goods to the plaintiff at Nashville under a new contract, and took a receipt, on the back of which was an agreement in writing relieving the company from all liability and obligations as forwarders, carriers or bailees. This agreement was signed by C. B. Buckly, "per Memp," who was his clerk. It appears that at the time, which was in February, 1865, during the late war, the express company ran an express line between New York and Louisville. From Louisville to Nashville they had two lines, one by the passenger trains, the other by freight trains known as the army freight lines. Upon these two lines different freights were charged. At this time, by a regulation of the treasury department, goods could not be shipped to civilians living as far south as Nashville without a special permit, and this permit had to be obtained at Louisville from the agent of the department, the goods passing through his hands.

Buckles was the agent of the plaintiff for this purpose at Louisville. The plaintiff had previously shipped other goods in this way, and Buckles had made similar contracts for their shipment from Louisville, which do not appear to have been objected to by the plaintiff; on the contrary, his assent appears very manifest.

It is shown in the proof that between Louisville and Nashville the train was attacked by a small band of armed men and captured; a large amount of the goods taken or destroyed, and the remainder torn from the boxes and destroyed. There was a large amount of goods in the train belonging to other parties. The agents of the company on the next day gathered up all that could be found and brought them to Nashville, and after giving notice, no owner could identify them; they were then sold, and the company held the proceeds.

A large mass of testimony was heard upon the question whether the squad that captured the train was composed of Confederate soldiers, and therefore the "public enemy" in the sense of the law. On the part of the plaintiff it was maintained that they were simply robbers. Such is the general outline of the case. The case appears to have received in the court below, as it has here, an elaborate examination by the counsel. The charge of the judge is of great length, upon which very many criticisms have been made; and if each of these questions were taken up and discussed in relation to its various bearings upon the case, it would extend this opinion to an unreasonable length. It is deemed better to dispose of the vital questions as they are raised and presented by the facts of the record, and in this way determine whether any error affecting the merits of the controversy occurred in the court below.

A question very much discussed is whether or not the undertaking of the company in the first instance was to transport the goods from New York to Louisville; and upon this it is earnestly argued that the charge is erroneous. The circuit judge was of opinion that the meaning of these receipts, as to the place to which the goods were to be carried under this contract, was so indefinite that he could not determine the question, and he left it to the jury to determine this in the light of the surrounding circumstances; but the charge indicated that the opinion of the judge was that Louisville and not Nashville was the terminus.

As a general rule it is the province of the judge to construe and ascertain the meaning of a written contract. A receipt or bill of lading of this character has generally been held to be a written contract fixing the duties and liabilities of a carrier. 3 Wall. 107, and authorities. The difficulty as to the meaning of these contracts is in determining to what point the goods are to be carried. The language of these receipts as to this is, "Received of Paten & Co. one case of mdse., ——— value, marked L. Olwell, Nashville, Tennessee, care of J. C. Buckles, Louisville, Ky., which it is mutually agreed is to forwarded to our agency nearest or most convenient to destination," etc. But for the words "care of J. C. Buckles, Louisville, Ky.," we would have no difficulty in understanding that the destination was Nashville, and even with these words, ordinarily the same meaning would be given. If the point to which the goods were to be carried was clearly expressed in the receipt, it probably could not be changed by parol proof. As it is not clearly expressed, we may interpret the meaning in the light of surrounding circumstances. It was contrary to orders and regulations of the treasury department to ship goods from New York to a civilian at Nashville without a special permit. The permit was not obtained at New York in this instance. It was the uniform course of business of the company in such cases not to undertake to carry the goods further than Louisville. At this point, upon permit first being obtained, they would, under a new contract, undertake to carry the goods to their destination. This course of business was well known to the plaintiff. He had in former cases adopted this course. From Louisville to Nashville the company had two lines at different rates, and the shipper could take his choice.

Digitized by Google

In the light of these facts we should construe these receipts to be agreements to carry the goods to Louisville, and for the time being that was their destination. The previous course of business between the parties shows that this was their understanding of it. These facts would also fully authorize the jury to find that the two other boxes were carried under a similar contract, although no receipts are shown for these. The plaintiff failed to introduce these two receipts until called for by the defendant. Such transportation being prohibited without a permit, a contract to so transport without the permit would be illegal as against public policy, and the presumption is that such contract was not made.

We think the action of the court in leaving the construction of the receipt to the jury on this question was erroneous; but as we hold that he should have construed the contracts in this respect as he substantially told the jury to construe them, the error does not affect the plaintiff. He should have been more positive than he was.

It would seem that as the plaintiff rested his case upon the proof of a contract to carry the goods from New York to Nashville, which turns out to have been a contract to carry them from New York to Louisville, and that this undertaking was complied with, this might have ended the case.

Other questions, however, have been earnestly argued. The liability of the company under the contract for reshipment from Louisville next arises. As we have seen, the receipt given by the company at Louisville contains upon its face this provision: "It is further agreed, and is part of the consideration of this contract, that the Adams Express Company are not to be held liable or responsible for the property herein mentioned for any loss or damage arising from the damages of railroad, steam or river navigation, leakage, fire, or from the acts of God or of the enemies of the government, mobs, riots, insurrections, pirates, or from any of the damages incident to a time of war, unless specially insured by them and so specified in this receipt, which insurance shall constitute the limit of the liability of the Adams Express Company in any event." The receipt does not show that the property was specially insured.

It is now well settled by authority that common carriers may by special contract limit the measure of their liability. Such is the general current of American authority. See Story on Bailments, § 549; Angell on Com. Carriers, § 239; York Co. v. Central R. R., 3 Wall. 107; 48 N. Y. 498; 16 Wall. 318. The remark in Wormack v. Southern Express Co., 1 Heisk., is not authority against the proposition. The question, then, arises, is the receipt given at Louisville (leaving out of view for the present the agreement on the face of the receipt) a special contract relieving the company from loss occasioned by robbery, of character attributable to this transaction? There can be no question that the language we have quoted above is comprehensive enough to bear this meaning. None other can be given to it.

Was this assented to by both parties as the contract? It is settled that a general notice to shippers that the carrier will not be liable for certain dangers or losses, will not release the carrier. There must be a special contract. There are authorities holding that receipts thrust upon shippers in the hurry of business, containing printed conditions and restrictions upon the carrier's liability, under circumstances indicating that the shipper's attention was not called to these terms or his assent given, are not special contracts. See Southern Express v. Moore, 39 Miss.; Lumbager v. Westcott, 49 Barbour; Blossom v. Dodd, 3 Am. Rep. 701. And in a recent case before the Supreme Court of the United States it was held that a printed notice on the back of the receipt was not, upon the facts of the case, a part of the contract, although it was referred to in the face of the receipt. The court held that it not being expressly assented to, had no other effect than a general notice to shippers. The case, however, fully recognizes the doctrine that the carrier's liability may be limited by special contract. It has not been regarded as essential that the contract shall be executed or signed by the shipper as well as the carrier; it is sufficient if he assents to it. In the case of York Co. v. Central R. R. Co., 3 Wall. 107, it was held that a bill of lading by which the carriers agreed to deliver the property, "fire and the unavoidable dangers of the river only excepted," was a special contract, under which the carrier was not liable for loss accruing from fire, although the shipper proved that his attention was not called to the fire clause, and that the goods were shipped before the bills of lading were signed. The distinction between a stipulation made in the body of the receipt and one made upon the back of the receipt is not clear; but the latter is treated as a mere notice, which by the authorities is not sufficient to release the carrier unless it be expressly assented to as part of the contract. Ordinarily we would suppose that if there be nothing to raise a contrary presumption, the natural presumption would be that the shipper was apprised of the contents of the receipt and assents to its terms. This, we think, would certainly be so where the terms of the contract were in accordance with the course of business of the company, to which the shipper had assented in previous transactions. Such was the present case, as we think; and in this view the stipulations on the face of the receipt, if assented to, would be effectual to release the carrier, without regard to the agreement signed on the back of the receipt; but the signing of this endorsement would be evidence of assent to the terms of contract expressed in the face of the receipt as well as the back of the receipt, provided that Buckly, the agent, had authority to make the contract. As to how far a carrier may be released from his common-law liability, we think if he may stipulate not to be chargeable for loss by fire, as in the case in 3 Wallace, he may also stipulate not to be liable for loss by robbery. We do not hold, however, that the carrier could in any event be relieved from the consequences of fraud or the want of due diligence and good faith. We add, also, that the shipper's assent to the special contract would probably not be held binding if given under circumstances showing that he was so in the power of the carrier as to leave him no discretion.

But it is argued that Buckles had no authority to make a contract for shipment by which the company were released. Upon the assumption that the first contract was to carry from New York and deliver to Buckles, then Buckles having possession of the goods, for shipment, had authority to make any contract according to the usual course of business to procure these shipments; and we may add, a contract made by his clerk in the course of business would be equally binding. See Nelson v. Hudson River R. R., 48 New York, 498. And, again, if it be conceded that the first contract was to carry to Nashville, still this might be changed by the contract at Louisville, and the record contains ample evidence showing the plaintiff's authority to bind him by contracts of this character. His correspondence shows that the terms upon which the company made shipments were well known to him.

But it is again argued that the contract by Buckly at Louisville releasing the company from liability was without consideration. The authorities upon this question seem to be that if the company carry goods at one rate, holding themselves to the ordinary liability of carriers, then in a contract to carry at the same rate, the company being released from liability, the release is without consideration. To make the release binding it should be upon the condition of a lower rate, or something equivalent. See 48 New York, 512. It appears in this case that the rates were different; that the company charged higher rates when the goods were insured. The court correctly charged the jury that notwithstanding the contract, the company would not be released from the consequences of the fraud, or want of diligence or good faith, of its agents. And we think his charge in regard to the degree of diligence required of the company's agents is not subject to objection, and that the proof shows no fault upon the part of the company's agents.

Digitized by Google

We do not see any grounds on which the plaintiff could recover in respect to the goods that were saved. Prima facie the loss of the plaintiff's goods is fully shown by the proof. The goods recovered were in a loose condition, and the company could not be supposed to know that they belonged to plaintiff, especially as the plaintiff would not undertake himself to say that they did.

There are, perhaps, abstract errors in the charge, but upon a careful consideration of the case we think they do not affect the merits. It is a case where by the contract, as we construe it, the company would not be liable for any losses accruing from causes incident to a time of war, without regard to whether the parties destroying the goods were the "public enemy" or not. And we think there was nothing to show fraud or bad faith upon the part of its agents.

Upon the whole case we affirm the judgment.

The Shipping Act of 1872—Construction by District Judge Lowell—When Contracts with Seamen must be in Writing.

THE GRACE LATHROP.

Circuit Court of the United States, District of Massachusetts, 1874.

Before Hon. JOHN LOWELL, District Judge.

1. Shipping Act of 1872—Construction of § 13.—Section 13 of the act of June 7, 1872, 17 Stats. 262, requiring agreements of seamen to be signed in the presence of a shipping commissioner, refers only to the agreements mentioned in section 12 of that act.

2. ———. Construction of Clause 2 of § 14.—The second clause of section 14, which punishes taking on board of a merchant ship any seaman who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of the act, does not refer to seamen who have agreed to make a voyage not mentioned in section 12, and have not signed the agreement in presence of a shipping commissioner.

3. ———. Construction of § 8. Section 8 of the statute authorizes the master, owner or consignee of a ship about to make a voyage not mentioned in section 12 to be his own shipping commissioner; and this section is not controlled by anything in sections 13 and 14.

E. L. Barney, assistant district attorney, for the United States; S. J. Thomas, for the ship.

LOWELL, J.—This libel is brought by the district attorney in behalf of the United States, to enforce a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars for five seamen alleged to have been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of the act for the appointment of shipping commissioners, approved June 7, 1872, 17 Stats. 262, and to have been knowingly received on board the Grace Lathrop, by the master of said vessel, at Boston, on the eighteenth day of December last. The particular charge is that the agreement with the men was not signed in the presence of a shipping commissioner, although there was such an officer at Boston, duly qualified and ready to act. The voyage was from Boston to one or more ports in the West Indies and back to Boston.

The answer admits the shipment of the men, but denies that the voyage was one within that part of the statute requiring agreements to be signed before a shipping commissioner.

The first section of the shipping act which mentions agreements is section 12, which prescribes a particular form of agreement to be entered into by the master with his crew before he proceeds on any foreign voyage, or on one from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, or vice versa. This section was amended in January, 1873, 17 Stats. 410, so as to remove from its scope voyages to the West India Islands or to Mexico. Section 13 of the principal act then goes on to require that all agreements shall be signed in the presence of a shipping commissioner. Section 14 makes the ship liable to penalties; first, if any person shall be carried to sea as one of the crew on board of any ship making a voyage as before specified, "without entering into an agreement with the master in the form and manner and the place and time hereby in such cases required;" and secondly, if any master, mate or other officer of any ship knowingly receive to be entered on board of any merchant ship any seaman, who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of the act.

The argument of the United States is: That the language of section 13 is very broad, and is intended to include not only the agreements mentioned in the act itself, but all those which may be made under the act of 1790, which takes in all voyages of any importance excepting in the fisheries; that the first penal clause of section 14 punishes a non-compliance with the act of 1872, by carrying seamen to sea who have not signed an agreement in all respects as required by section 12; and the second penal clause punishing the taking on board seamen illegally engaged or supplied must refer to something, and why not, then, to seamen who come within the act of 1790, and have signed an agreement as required by that act, but not before a shipping commissioner? I shall presently show that neither of these sections has the meaning contended for, but my decision of the case is based largely upon section 8, which provides, in so many words, that nothing in the act contained shall be construed to prevent the owner, master, or consignee of any ship, except as described in section 12, from performing himself, so far as such ship is concerned, the duties of shipping commissioner under this act. This is a controlling section which governs sections 13 and 14 and all others, and explicitly declares that nothing contained in them, or any of them, shall be construed to prevent the master, in such a case as this, from shipping his own crew. Granting, therefore, that the construction of sections 13 and 14 contended for by the prosecution is sound, then all agreements not mentioned in section 12, must be signed in the presence either of the official commissioner or of the master, owner or consignee, and the libel in this case does not allege anything except the absence of the duly qualified official. It does not say that the master, owner or consignee did not act as shipping commissioner, and act fully and with all due form in that capacity. This was the point ruled on in argument before me.

Recurring now to section 13. It is as follows: "The following rules shall be observed respecting agreements: first, every agreement (excepting such cases of agreements as are hereinafter specially provided for) shall be signed by each seaman in the presence of a shipping commissioner;" secondly, they are to be signed in duplicate, one part of which shall be retained by the shipping commissioner, and the other shall contain a special form or place for the description and signatures of persons engaged subsequently to the first departure of the ship; thirdly, there is to be an acknowledgment and certificate, under the hand and official seal of the commissioner, endorsed on the agreement, testifying to all the acknowledgments, and to the intelligent and sober appreciation by the men of the contract they have signed.

Now, it is tolerably clear, I think, that all this apparatus was not intended to be brought into operation, four times a week, for voyages between this port and New York. This I say merely by way of illustration. It must apply to all coasting voyages, if it applies to any voyages not mentioned in section 12. I am not sure that I can express my opinion as clearly as I hold it, but it does seem to me that sections 12 and 13 are one enactment, concerning one and the same subject matter, and no other; that the former requires agreements to be made in certain cases, and the latter provides how they shall be signed and acknowledged. Any search for a further meaning is an unauthorized exercise of ingenuity.

It is said the expression "every agreement" is broad enough to cover all those required in coasting voyages by the act of 1790. This is true. But it is much broader than that. It will cover every agreement made by a seaman for any voyage, or indeed for anything else; there is nothing in section 13 itself to limit it to any subject matter. It is simply that every agreement shall be signed by the seamen in the presence of the shipping commissioner. It is confined to seamen signing agreements, and that is all. Of course it must be limited, and by the context, and the only context is section 12.

Digitized by Google

The well-known statute of July 20, 1790, § 1, 1 Stats. 131, requires the master of every ship or vessel bound on any sort of a voyage, coasting or other, with very trifling exceptions, before he proceeds on the voyage, to make an agreement in writing or print with every seaman, under a penalty of twenty dollars. This has been held not to include whaling and fishing voyages. The argument of the United States, as I have said, imports this statute into section 13 of the act of 1872, by the words "agreements and every agreement."

Another objection to this construction is that under it, if a master about to proceed on a coasting, Mexican, or West Indian voyage (which is admitted to come under the act of 1790, and not under section 12 of the act of 1872), makes no written agreement with any of his crew, he is liable to a penalty of twenty dollars for each seaman carried to sea; while if he makes one in strict and careful conformity with that statute, but not in presence of a shipping commissioner, the penalty is two hundred dollars for each seaman. For it has not been contended and can not be successfully maintained that the act of 1872 punishes the neglect to make any written agreement at all, except as required by section 12. Nay, more, the act of June 19, 1813, 3 Stats. 2, requires a written agreement for the cod fishery, and imposes no penalty for a breach; whaling voyages, and those for mackerel, are always made under written agreements, though no statute requires it. All these agreements are within section 13, if those under the statute of 1790 are included; for an agreement is an agreement. If this be the true construction of the act, it holds out a strong inducement against making written contracts in any of those cases, because the whole real and actual contest is a question of the fees of the shipping commissioner, and the trouble and formality attending the shipments before him.

It is said that it would operate beneficially if all agreements were signed before a commissioner. This may be so. As regards foreign voyages I agree to it most heartily. But the protection which the commissioner would afford is of comparatively little importance in the coasting trade, in which the crew have frequent opportunities to obtain a redress of any wrongs they may suffer, because they are never many days' sail from a home port, and in which they seldom suffer any wrongs. It is a fact well known to all judges in commercial ports, that there is very little complaint or litigation between officers and men, growing out of the voyages not mentioned in section 12. Scarcely a term passes that I do not try several indictments for offences said to have been committed on foreign voyages, and I can recall but one criminal case that I ever tried in which the complaint related to a coasting voyage. I doubt whether the supposed advantages of applying the section to coasting voyages would make up for the expense incurred by such a practice. The same sort of protection which would be afforded by shipping seamen for the coasting trade in presence of a commissioner, would be derived by discharging them before that officer; but the necessity for this is expressly negatived by section 22. I shall speak in a moment of the suggestion that there is no such express exception in section 13.

To me it is plain that Congress, as shown by sections 8, 12, 22, and many others, did not intend to hamper our enormous coastwise trade, with its constantly-recurring voyages, by the burden of paying the fees of shipping commissioners. And some one has prevailed on the legislature to class West Indian and Mexican voyages with the coasting trade in this respect.

It is said that if it was intended to limit the broad and general language of section 13, it would have been easy to say so in the section. It appears to me that the limitation is plain enough; but if not, the remark is quite as pertinent, and more so, that if Congress intended to include in section 13 agreements which are not mentioned in the act, it was not only easy but highly necessary to point them out.

I do not mean to be understood that section 13 is free of difficulty. The main question of its construction is now pending before the supreme court on a certificate of division of opinion from this circuit and district; and with whatever decision is made I shall not only be bound to be, but shall be entirely content.

The next point is whether the second clause of section 14 punishes the taking on board ship a seaman who has signed such an agreement as is required by the act of 1790, but has not signed it before a shipping commissioner. We here concede, of course, for the purposes of the argument, that section 13 requires such signing. I consider it tolerably certain that section 14 has no such intent. The offence is receiving on board seamen who have been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of the act. Now there is nothing in the act which regulates the engaging or supplying of seamen before they are taken on board ship. The acts of 1790 and 1872 require certain agreements to be made before the voyage is begun; but it is entirely consistent with those laws, and is the practice in some trades, to make the written agreements on board the ship after the seamen have been orally engaged. How, then, can this offence be committed? I do not know. But I do see that there is nothing in the act of 1872 contrary to which seamen can be received on board a merchant ship.

This penal clause, excepting in the amount of the penalty and the person who is to pay it, is taken literally from the merchant shipping act of Great Britain of 1854, section 147, in which it has a totally different sense from that now proposed for it. That statute provides not only for shipping commissioners (called shipping masters in that act) before whom agreements are to be signed and men discharged, etc., but also that a certain number of persons may be licensed in a certain way to procure and supply seamen for merchant ships, that is to say, to make the original and general oral engagement with them; and there is a penalty on any unlicensed person who shall procure or supply seamen, and on the master who receives on board persons unlawfully engaged or supplied, which is the clause now under review. The meaning in that act is plain and intelligible, and has nothing to do with the written agreements one way or another.

Now, I admit that our statute does not provide for any such licenses, and therefore can not have the meaning given to it in England, and I admit we must try to give a meaning to every part of every act of Congress; but I can not admit that I ought to exercise a great deal of ingenuity to find a secondary or conjectural sense for a set of words which have been taken bodily from a place where their intent is obvious, and put into one where there is no apparent meaning for them; because I know, in point of fact, that the act must have been adopted for what it might turn out to be worth in its new quarters. I agree, further, that the word "engagement" might include a written agreement, but when the defined offence is the receiving on board a ship seamen not duly engaged or supplied, and there is no law regulating their supply, and no law which requires the written engagement—if we choose to call it so—to be made before they are received on board, and when the natural and obvious and historical meaning of the word does not refer to any written agreement, and if it be construed to mean a written agreement, the offence must depend on whether the master chooses to make the written agreement on shore or on board. I conclude that "seamen engaged or supplied" does not mean seamen who happen to have signed one sort of contract or another before the time when there is any necessity for them to sign anything.

I have seen copies of the judgments of the district and circuit courts for the eastern district of New York, in the case of The City of Mexico, which sustain the position of the prosecution. It is hardly necessary for me to say that these judgments have received my most careful and respectful consideration; and were it not for those decisions I should not consider this case a very doubtful one. I venture to remark, however, that, as far as may be gathered from the opinions of the judges, the case was very imperfectly presented by the defence; and what argument there was took up the wholly untenable ground that the act of 1790, so far as Mexican voyages are concerned, had been repealed, and a great part of the opinions is occupied in an able and convincing refutation of this argument. No allusion is made to section 8, nor to any of the arguments which seem to me to have force in construing sections 13 and 14. It is impossible for me, therefore, to ascertain whether these arguments might not have had some weight, and even a controlling weight, in the case if they had been presented or suggested.

Digitized by Google

Sitting here under a responsibility which I cannot transfer, except when a decision has been made which is of binding authority upon this court, my best judgment is:

1. It is doubtful whether section 13 refers to any agreements not mentioned in section 12. In my opinion it does not.

2. It is doubtful whether section 14, second penal clause, has any reference to the signing of written agreements. In my opinion it has not.

3. Section 8 expressly declares that on a voyage of the kind now in judgment the master may be his own shipping commissioner, and the libel does not negative the master of the Grace Lathrop's acting as such commissioner on this occasion.

LIBEL DISMISSED.

The Shipping Act of 1872—Construction by Circuit Judge Woodruff—When Contracts with Seamen must be in Writing.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF MEXICO.

Circuit Court of the United States, Eastern District of New York, February 21, 1874.

Before Hon. LEWIS B. WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge.

1. Shipping Act of 1872—Contracts with Seamen.—The shipping act of 1872 expounded, and it is held that under this act the masters of all ships which are described in the navigation act of 1790 must, on shipping seamen for a voyage, make with them an agreement in writing or in print. Some of these agreements may still be made in the form prescribed by the act of 1790, while others must be made in the more detailed form prescribed by the 12th section of the shipping law of 1872; but no ship is permitted to go to sea without a written or printed agreement with the seamen.

3. ——. ——. Amendatory Act of 1873.—The amendatory shipping act of January 15, 1873 which exempts voyages to the British North American Possessions, Mexico and the West Indies from the operation of the 12th section of the act of 1872, does not do away with the necessity of entering into written contracts with seamen shipped for such voyages.

——. ——. Case in Judgment.—The steamship City of Mexico performed a voyage "from New York to Vera Cruz and one or more ports in Mexico, back to New York, with privilege of trading at intermediate ports." Seamen were shipped for this voyage without signing their names as required by the 13th section of the shipping act of 1872. Held, that the ship incurred the penalty declared in the second clause of the 14th section of the act of 1872, and decree was entered accordingly.

WOODRUFF, J.—The libel in this case is founded on the provisions of the fourteenth section of the act of congress entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners by the several circuit courts of the United States, to superintend the shipping and discharge of seamen engaged in merchant ships belonging to the United States, and for the further protection of seamen." (17 U. S. Statutes at Large, 262-265.)

That section imposes a penalty upon any ship, not exceeding two hundred dollars, for each offence therein specified, and it separately specifies offences which shall subject the ship to penalty, by two distinct clauses. First, if any person shall be carried to sea as one of the crew on board of any ship making a voyage as hereinbefore specified, without entering into an agreement with the master of said ship, in the form and manner and at the place and times hereby in such cases required, the ship shall be held liable, and for every such offence shall incur a penalty not exceeding $200. Provided always that the ship shall not be held liable for any person carried to sea," &c., &c. [describing certain cases of secretion on board without the knowledge of any officer of the ship, or false personation, &c.]

"Secondly, if any master, mate or other officer of a ship knowingly receives or accepts to be entered on board of any merchant ship any seaman who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this act, the ship on board of which such seaman shall be found shall, for every such seaman, be liable to and incur the penalty of a sum not exceeding two hundred dollars: Provided further, that in case of desertion or of casualty resulting in the loss of one or more seamen, the master may ship * * * and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring such penalty."

Here are described two separate penalties in distinct clauses of the section, and, as will presently be seen, the enquiry why both were inserted is very importont and significant, for the cases mentioned therein do not on their face seem to differ. Looking at the description of the cases, without consulting any other provisions of this or other statutes or requirements of law, it may well be suggested that no person can be carried to sea as one of the crew, with the knowledge of the officers of the ship, without being received, accepted or entered on board, and hence the two clauses would seem to be tautological or repetitions, prescribing two penalties for the same violations of law, one for each offence not exceeding two hundred dollars, and the other for every such seaman, not exceeding two hundred dollars. But this declaration in these separate clauses will, I think, be found a significant and important aid to the construction of the statute when the facts of this case, the other provisions of this statute and the former law and the claims here made by the counsel for the parties are more fully brought into view.

From as early as the year 1729 the statutes of England for the protection of seamen, as well as the security of ship-owners, have required under penalty that no master bound to parts beyond seas shall carry any seaman or mariner to sea without first coming to an agreement with such seaman or mariner for their wages, time of service and other particulars specified, which agreement shall be in writing, &c. (act of 2d Geo. II, chap 36, § 1), and providing expressly that the seaman shall sign such agreement (ib., sec. 2). By subsequent statutes having the interest and protection of seamen constantly in view, the provisions of the act referred to have been enlarged and carried into greater detail, and down to the present time the policy and even the necessity of such agreements has been recognized and this requirement kept in full force.

This subject very early engaged the attention of the Congress of the United States, and by act of July 20, 1790 (1 U. S. Statutes at Large, p. 131), it was enacted that from and after the first day of December then next, "Every master or commander of any ship or vessel bound from a port of the United States to a foreign port, or of any ship or vessel of the burthen of fifty tons or upward, bound from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state, shall, before he proceed on such voyage, make an agreement in writing or in print with every seaman or mariner on board such ship or vessel (except such as shall be apprentice or servant to himself or owners), declaring the voyage, term or terms of time for which such seaman or mariner shall be shipped. And if any master or commander of such ship or vessel shall carry out any seaman or mariner (except apprentices or servants as aforesaid) without such contract or agreement being first made and signed by the seamen or mariners, such master or commander shall pay to every such seaman or mariner the highest price or wages which shall have been given at the port or place where such seaman or mariner shall have been shipped, for a similar voyage within three months next before the time of such shipping; provided such seaman or mariner shall perform such voyage, or if not, then for such time as he shall continue to do duty on board such ship or vessel; and shall moreover forfeit twenty dollars for every such seaman or mariner, one half to the use of the person prosecuting for the same, the other half to the use of the United States; and such seaman or mariner not having signed such contract shall not be bound by the regulations nor subject to the penalties and forfeitures contained in this act." Other provisions follow, designed to secure both the seaman and the master or owners to the performance of their reciprocal duties. The act of April 14, 1792 (1 Statutes at Large, 254, chap. 24), among other things provides for the return of seamen, bound by agreement to serve, to their homes, in certain cases, through the consuls of the United States. Other and subsequent acts exhibit the desire of congress to watch over and protect the interests of seamen.

Digitized by Google

In 1872 the act under which this proceeding was instituted was passed. It provides for the appointment of a shipping commissioner, and makes numerous and extensive provisions for carrying out the intention expressed in its title above recited. Section 12 relates to ships bound from a port in the United States to a foreign port, or from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, and provides that the master of every such ship "shall, before he proceeds on such voyage, make an agreement in writing or in print with every seaman whom he carries to sea as one of the crew, in the manner hereinafter mentioned; and every such agreement shall be in the form as near as may be, as hereunto in table 'D' in the schedule annexed, and shall be dated at the time of the first signature thereto, and shall be signed by the master before any seaman signs the same, and shall contain the following particulars, that is to say." Here follow numerous particulars, including all that were contained in the act of 1790, and very many which were not required by the law of 1790, or otherwise, in respect to other vessels than those in this section specified and the form of agreement annexed. Table "D" contains many other specific details. Provisos to the section authorize the master to perform the duties of a shipping commissioner, as provided in a previous section, when in a port for which no shipping commissioner has been appointed; and further, that this section should not apply to masters of vessels where the seamen are by custom or agreement entitled to participate in the profits or results of a cruise or voyage; nor to masters of coastwise; nor to take-going vessels that touched at foreign ports. It will there be seen that the duty of the master to enter into written or printed agreement with seamen is continued, and that, as to ships bound on certain specific voyages, the agreement must contain the details specifically mentioned in this section, while the masters of other vessels not included in this section satisfied their duty by making an agreement in writing signed by the seamen, containing what was prescribed in the former law. The masters of all ships described in the act of 1790 must make the agreement with the seamen in writing or in print—some in the form prescribed by that act, and others in the much more detailed form prescribed in this twelfth section, but none were permitted to go to sea without a written or printed agreement with the seamen.

Hereupon follows section 13, which declares that the following rules shall be observed with respect to agreements:

First—Every agreement (except in such cases of agreements as are hereinafter specially provided for) shall be signed by each seaman in the presence of a shipping commissioner.

Second—When the crew are first engaged the agreement shall be signed in duplicate, and one part shall be retained by the shipping commissioner, and the other part shall contain a special place or form for the description and signatures of persons engaged subsequently to the first departure of the ship, and shall be delivered to the master.

Third—Every agreement entered into before the commissioner shall be acknowledged and certified under the hand and official seal of such commissioner, and shall be endorsed on or annexed to such "agreement" * * * [and the form of acknowledgment and certificate is given.] It is claimed that the words "every agreement" in the first clause of this thirteenth section mean only those agreements which masters of certain specified vessels named in the twelfth section are by that section required to make. But that is not the literal reading of the section. If that had been its intent, nothing was easier than to have so expressed it. Throughout the act, wherever it was intended to limit a provision to the voyages described in the twelfth section, the limitation is made in express terms. (Vide §§ 8, 22, 24, 35, 36, 40, 58, and others which are connected therewith in these provisions.) Nor is there anything in the design and object of the law which implies such a limitation. If there were no other provisions in the various sections of the statute except such as relate to the particular vessels included in the twelfth section, much plausibility would be given to the claim; but many of the sections—probably the greatest number of them—are general, referring alike to other seamen as well as to those named in the twelfth section. (§§ 9, 11, 23, 25, 26, 31, 32, 43 to 50, 51 to 54, 61 to 63 and others.) Section 15 is especially significant, and the special exceptions in section 13, of agreements hereinafter specially provided for, greatly strengthen this interpretation; for, when after the use of the terms "every agreement," congress declared certain agreements to be excepted, the presumption is against any other exceptions. Nor does the nature of the provisions in the 13th section indicate such an intent. The purpose of the act is fittingly declared in its title to be for the protection of seamen. They need protection against being compelled or reduced to sign agreements to serve without properly understanding the provisions of the agreement, the term of service, the nature of the voyage or voyages, the compensation they are to receive, and the time of payment. They are frequently in danger of being approached and led into engagements when intoxicated. All this congress knew, and wisely provided that every agreement should be signed by them in the presence of the commissioner and be duly acknowledged. Certainly this court can not say that this was not as important in reference to the agreements which are required by the act of 1790, as to those specified in the twelfth section. The two clauses of the fourteenth section above recited apply to this construction of the thirteenth section with especial significance. The first clause refers to the crew of a ship "making a voyage as hereinbefore specified," i. e. making the voyages mentioned in the twelfth section, and annexes the penalty to taking to sea without an agreement "in the form," &c., hereby "in such cases" required. The form hereby required is prescribed in the twelfth section, and is required only in the cases therein specified. The vessel here was not condemned under that clause. But the second part of the section is more general. It refers in terms to the officers of "any merchant ship," and to "any seaman" who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this act. There are several provisions relating to that subject, and probably none more important than the thirteenth section, which provides for their signing agreements to serve for a voyage, in the presence of a commissioner, and so guards them from imposition and deception therein, as the case may be, when they are in a condition wholly unfit to take care of themselves. Sailors are so often likened to children in reference to the ease with which they may be deceived or influenced, and their recklessness or inability to protect themselves, that the value of these provisions needs no further illustration.

Unless this second clause is to have such general scope and effect, extending beyond the twelfth section and to cases not within it, it is difficult to assign to it any useful meaning. The cases arising under the twelfth section are provided for in the first clause. These circumstances lead to the conclusion that not only the agreements mentioned in the twelfth section, but all other agreements with seamen required by law to be in writing (though not included in the twelfth section), must be signed by the seamen in the presence of the commissioners, or the penalty declared in the second clause of the fourteenth section is incurred by the ship.

Digitized by Google

To apply this conclusion to the case now under consideration:

By an act of congress passed on the 15th of January, 1873 (17 Statutes at Large, 410), the act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners, now under consideration, was amended by adding to the above mentioned twelfth section a further proviso, namely: "Provided, further, that this section shall not apply to masters of vessels when engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West India Islands, or the Republic of Mexico." By this proviso the number or class of vessels whose master is required to make with seamen the written or printed agreement specified in that section, is greatly reduced. The voyage of the steamship City of Mexico, for which seamen were shipped without their signing the same, as required in the thirteenth section of the said act, was so proved on the trial of this cause, "from the port of New York via Vera Cruz, and one or more ports in Mexico, and back to New York, with privilege of trading at any intermediate ports." This was a case within the proviso, introduced by the amendment of 1873, so that section twelve of the act has no application thereto. "So far as this voyage is concerned, the act and the amendment are to be read together, and the master of the City of Mexico was under no duty to make with his seamen an agreement in the form and with the numerous details of its contents and time of signing by the master, which the twelfth section prescribes. But applying to the case the conclusion herein above stated, the master was within the section which requires that every agreement shall be signed by the seamen in the presence of the shipping commissioners, unless it can be shown that he was under no legal obligation to make any written or printed agreement whatever with his seamen. That proposition can not be maintained.

Upon that point I concur fully in the reasoning of the judge of the district court, the effect of the amendment was to withdraw the voyage of the City of Mexico from the operation of the twelfth section, and to leave it in the same condition and subject it to all the duties and obligations to which it would have been subject if the twelfth section of the act had been originally passed in its now amended form. An actual intention of the minds of the legislators to withdraw a very large proportion of our seamen from the protection of written shipping articles, which it has been the intention and policy of England for more than one hundred and fifty years to provide, and which this country adopted in its earliest history, and has since consistently maintained, and will not, I think, be for a moment contended. The argument is that whatever we may suppose to have been in the minds of our legislators, we are bound by what is involved in the word and legal effect of their enactment, and thereupon it is claimed that when the terms of the twelfth section of the act of 1872 were, as originally passed, made broad enough to embrace the voyage in question, that operated by implication as a repeal of the act of 1790, so far as relates to such voyages, and hence, when in 1873, congress withdrew such voyages from the operation of the twelfth section, that act necessarily left such voyages wholly unprovided for by any existing law; that although it is possible to say that this legislation created a casus omissus, which the legislators did not, probably, in their minds contemplate, the court is nevertheless bound to construe statutes according to the meaning and legal effect disclosed by the statutes themselves, andnot by any speculative enquiry into the actual intention of the legislators. This may be conceded, but if it is claimed that the legislative intent may not be gathered from the nature of the subject, the consequences which would flow from a proposed construction and the admitted policy of the government, the claim goes too far. Whenever the construction of statutes and their legal effect is doubtful or susceptible of a double interpretation, these considerations are of great force and often conclusive.

The act of 1790 (with some few exceptions) applied to the masters of all vesseis. Section 12 of the act of 1872 selected some of those vessels and applied to them its more stringent and particular provisions. From these latter provisions the voyage now in question was relieved. Now I do not deem it very material to say whether the voyages to the West Indies were always under the operation of both statutes, and so when relieved from the operation of the twelfth section, were simply left under the influence of the statute of 1790, or whether the twelfth section operated as a technical or constructive repeal of the act of 1790 in respect to such voyages, but that the amendments operated to revive the act of 1790, thus constructively repealed. Either view works the same result. Repeals by construction are not favored. There was no repugnance or inconsistency between the requirements of the act of 1790 and the requirements of the twelfth section of the act of 1873.

To the requirements of the act of 1790 that twelfth section refers in special cases. When the voyage now in question was withdrawn from among those cases, it remained under the operation of the act of 1790 as fully as if the act of 1873 had not been passed.

It follows that the City of Mexico incurred the penalty declared in the second clause of the fourteenth section of the act of 1872, for which the decree was pronounced in the district court, and it must be so here decreed with costs.

DECREE FOR LIBELLANT.

Liens of Mechanics, Laborers and Material-Men Under the Indiana Statute—Enforcement of the Lien where a Material-Man Furnishes Materials to a Sub-Contractor.

RICHARD S. COULTER v. CHARLES FRESE, CHARLES F. HAHN, JOHN A. LYONS, AND INDIANAPOLIS MANUFACTURERS AND CARPENTERS' UNION.

Supreme Court of Judicature of Indiana, No. 3508, April 11, 1874.

JOHN PETTIT, LL. D.,
ANDREW L. OSBORNE, LL. D.,
ALEXANDER C. DOWNEY, LL D.,
JAMES L. WORDEN, LL. D.,
SAMUEL H. BUSHKIRK, LL. D, } Judges.

1. Furnisher's Lien for Materials Furnished to Sub-Contractor.—To give a person furnishing materials for a new building a right to acquire a lien on the building and real estate, to the extent of the value of the materials furnished, it is not necessary that the materials should be furnished to the owner of the real estate who is erecting the building, or to his immediate contractor; but section 647 of the code, as qualified by section 648, gives such right to any person furnishing materials for a new building to a sub-contractor.

2. ——. Payment by Owner to Contractor before Notice of Lien.—A lien thus acquired is not defeated by payment in full by the owner to the contractor of the entire amount due him, before notice of the intention to hold the lien has been filed, it being filed within the time limited therefor.

3. The Indiana Statute relating to the liens of mechanics, laborers and material-men expounded at length, and the construction put upon it in Barker v. Buell, 35 Ind. 297, re-affirmed.

4. ——. Constitutional Law.—Said statute is not unconstitutional for the reason that the subject matter is not expressed in the title.

From the Marion Superior Court.

WORDEN, J.—This was an action by Charles Frese and Charles F. Hahn against Richard S. Coulter, to enforce a supposed lien which the plaintiffs had acquired upon certain real estate described in the complaint, owned by Coulter, for material furnished by the plaintiffs to Green and Taylor, who were contractors with Coulter for the erection of a house upon the premises described. John A. Lyons and the Indianapolis Manufacturers and Carpenters' Union were made parties defendant, and they each filed a cross-complaint against Coulter to enforce a like lien. Coulter filed separate answers to the original and cross-complaints. The third paragraph of each of these answers alleged, in substance, that he, Coulter, was the owner of the premises; that he made a contract with Green & Taylor, and no one else, for the furnishing of the materials and the erection of the house; that in pursuance of the contract Green & Taylor furnished the material and erected the house, and that before notices of intention to hold said lien were filed in the recorder's office he fully paid and satisfied Green & Taylor for the work done and materials furnished. Demurrers were filed respectively to each of these paragraphs of answer, for want of sufficient facts, but were overruled and exception taken. Issues of fact were formed and the cause submitted to the court for trial.

Digitized by Google

The court made a special finding which it is not necessary to set out in full. The finding embraces all the facts necessary to the establishment of the lien of the original plaintiffs, as well as of Lyons and the other cross-complainant, if as material-men furnishing materials to the contractor of Coulter, they are entitled to such lien, and unless they are precluded by the fact that before notice of the intent to hold the liens were filed in the proper office, Coulter settled with and paid off his contractors in full.

The court held as a conclusion of law from the facts found, that neither the original plaintiffs nor the cross-complainants were entitled to maintain their supposed lien, and rendered judgment against all of them in favor of Coulter. Due exceptions were taken to the conclusion of law. On appeal to the general term the judgment rendered at special term was reversed, the court holding that error was committed in overruling the demurrers to the paragraphs of answer mentioned, and in the conclusion of law. From the judgment of reversal thus rendered at general term, an appeal has been taken to this court, and the same questions are presented here as were presented to the court below at general term.

The two questions thus presented have been elaborately argued by counsel. They may be stated as follows: First, can a material-man who furnishes materials, not to the owners but to the contractor, for the erection of a new building, acquire and enforce a lien on the building and on the interest of the owner of the lot on which it stands, to the extent of the value of the material furnished? Second, if such lien can be acquired, is it defeated by the fact that the owner, before the filing of the notice of intention to hold the lien, it being filed within the time limited, has paid off the contractors in full for the work and materials?

That such lien can be acquired was decided by this court in the case of Barker v. Buell, 35 Ind. 297. We have been earnestly pressed to reconsider the decision in that case. We have done so, but have again reached the same conclusion. In that case the original and amended sections of the entire statute relating to mechanics' liens were brought together and set out. At the risk of some prolixity we again transcribe two of the sections, being those on which the questions here involved mainly depend.

"Sec. 647. Mechanics and all persons performing labor or furnishing material for the construction or repair of any building, or who may have furnished any engine or other machinery for any mill, distillery or other manufactory, may have a lien separately or jointly upon the building which they may have constructed or repaired, or upon any building, mill, distillery, or other manufactory for which they may have furnished materials of and description, and on the interest of the owner of the lot or land on which it stands, to the extent of the value of any labor done or materials furnished, or for both.

"Sec. 648. The provisions of this act shall only extend to work done or materials furnished on new buildings, or to a contract entered into with the owner of any building for repairs, or to the engine or other machinery furnished for any mill, distillery, or other manufactory, unless furnished to the owner of the land on which the same may be situate, and not to any contract made with the tenant, except only to the extent of his interest."

Sec. 649 provides for a personal liability of the owner of a building in favor of any sub-contractor, journeyman or laborer employed in the construction or repair, or furnishing materials for any buildings, not to exceed, however, the amount due, or that may become due, from the owner to the employer. This section is confined to the subject of personal liability, and has no relation whatever to liens on property. The other sections of the article provide for the manner of acquiring and enforcing the liens.

If the original plaintiffs and the cross-complainants are not entitled respectively to their liens, it must be in consequence of the circumstance that the materials were furnished by them to Green & Taylor, the contractors of Coulter, and not to Coulter himself. But upon reviewing the statute and again considering its terms, we find ourselves utterly unable to give it a construction that will limit the material-man. It must be so as to mechanics and all persons performing labor, right of lien to cases where the materials are furnished to the owner. If such is the case as to material-men, for they all stand upon the same ground, so far as this provision of the statute is concerned. Section 647 provides that mechanics and all persons performing labor or furnishing materials for the construction or repair of any building, shall have a lien, without any limitation in respect to the person to whom the materials are furnished or for whom the labor may be performed. But the meaning of this section is placed beyond doubt by the next. We quote the following paragraph from the opinion of this court in the case of Baylies v. Sinex, 21 Ind. 45, in relation to the two sections: "It is evident that the 647th section, above set out, does not give a lien upon the engine or other machinery furnished as distinct from the building, but only upon the building or lot upon which it stands. The 648th section is somewhat obscurely worded, but it does not, as we think, extend the remedy given by the preceding section, but rather limits or qualifies it. It limits the remedy given by the preceding section, first, to cases where work has been done or materials furnished on new buildings; second, to cases where contracts have been entered into with the owners of buildings for repairs; third, to cases where engines or other machinery have been furnished, &c., to the owners of the land, excluding all contracts with tenants, except only to the extent of their interests. Its object was, undoubtedly, to prevent a tenant from encumbering property with liens, except to the extent of his interest in the property. Lynam v. King, 9 Ind. 3."

The legislature limited what would otherwise perhaps have been the effect of section 647, by providing in section 648, in substance, that tenants shall not encumber property with liens exeept as to their interest in the property, by requiring the contract for repairs to be made with the owner of the property and not with the tenant merely, or that the engine or other machinery be furnished to the owner, in order to create a lien as against his interest in the property, leaving the implication irresistible that where a new building is erected by the owner, whether he lets the work to a contractor or pursues any other mode of accomplishing the result, the person performing labor on or furnishing materials for the building, may have a lien whether the labor be performed for the owner or the materials be furnished directly to him or his contractor. The building must be erected by the authority and direction of the owner, in order that any lien may be acquired as against him. No one by committing a trespass upon another's land can acquire a lien upon it; nor can one, by furnishing materials for the erection of a building which the owner of the land has not authorized to be built, acquire such lien. But where the owner causes a building to be erected, whether he lets the work and the furnishing of the materials as an entire contract or pursues some other course, those performing labor on or furnishing materials for the building are entitled to a lien as provided for. This is in accordance with the plain and unequivocal provisions of the statute.

We shall, before closing this opinion, return to this proposition again, but we will, for convenience, here notice the second question, as the first and second are in some degree blended together. Is the lien of the mechanic, laborer or material-man defeated by the payment to the contractor by the owner of the whole amount due the contractors, before notice of an intention to hold a lien has been filed? Section 650 provides for acquiring a lien by filing in the recorder's office of the county a notice of intention to hold a lien on the property, and that "the lien so created shall relate to the time when the work upon said building or repairs began, and to the time when the person furnishing materials began to furnish the same." We have already seen that by the provisions of section 647 the mechanic, laborer or material-man may have a lien, not to the extent of what may be due from the owner to the contractor, but "to the extent of the value of any labor done or materials funished, or for both." By the next section the lien of the material-man is made to relate to the time when he began to furnish materials. The extent of the material-man's lien being the value of the material furnished, and the time it attaches being the time when he began to furnish materials, it would, in our opinion, be an utter perversion of the law to hold that though he filed his notice within the prescribed time, yet his lien shall be defeated by full payment by the owner to the contractor before the expiration of the time limited for the filing of the notice. This proposition seems to us to be too plain to admit of much argument or illustration. That such payment should defeat the lien confounds all ideas of the force and legal effect of a lien. Indeed, if such is the case there is no lien, and the statute which attempts to confer it is a dead letter.

Digitized by Google

Many arguments have been pressed upon our consideration in respect to this point, as well as upon the question whether a lien can be acquired on account of work done for or materials furnished to a contractor and not the owner. The most of them are based upon the real or supposed hardships of the law, as we construe it, in this, that in many cases it subjects the owner to the liability of making double payments for the same work or materials, and prevents him from making contracts for the erection of buildings and the furnishing of materials therefor, to be paid for otherwise than in money, and other similar inconveniences. These arguments might have much force if addressed to the legislature, whose province is to make the laws, but can have little weight against the clear and unequivocal terms of a statute when addressed to a court whose province it is to determine what the law is, and not what it ought to be. The statute in question speaks for itself in unmistakable language. No arguments can change its significance. An act of the legislature is not of such plastic nature as that it may be moulded at pleasure by the courts into such form as will make it agree with the standard of expediency, or of right and wrong, which the judges may have created. When the legislative will has been clearly and constitutionally expressed, the courts have no alternative but to follow it. If an enactment is wrong or inexpedient the legislature may repeal or modify it, but it is not the province of the courts to avoid its effect by construction contrary to its plain intent and meaning. While much has been said against the statute, construed as we think it must be, much may be said in its favor. Its object is to secure to the mechanic, laborer or material-man, compensation for his work or materials. It prevents the owners of real estate from securing to themselves, without compensation, the benefits of the labor and the materials of others by means of low contracts with irresponsible, or perhaps dishonest contractors. The inconveniences of the law do not seem to us to be insuperable. The owner may withhold from the contractor, for the period of sixty days after the completion of the work, enough to protect the property from liens for work or materials. If full payment is made at the end of that time, it is perhaps quite as prompt as payments are usually made.

It is urged that inasmuch as section 649 provides that sub-contractors, journeymen, laborers and material-men may have a personal action against the owners for their work or material, by giving him the notice therein provided for, to the extent of what is due or may become due from him to the contractors, they should not be held to have the right to acquire a lien. We find nothing, however, in this section that, in our opinion, indicates an intent on the part of the legislature to withhold from them the right to acquire a lien as provided for in the two preceding sections. The contractor has the right to a lien and also to his personal action against the owner. The object of the law was to place the sub-contractor, journeyman, laborer and material-man upon the same footing with the contractor, except that the personal action against the owner in favor of the sub-contractor, etc., is limited by the amount that may be due or may become due from the owner to the employer, the lien given might be an inadequate remedy, as the property might be previously encumbered to an extent that would render the lien unavoidable; hence the right of a personal action against the owner is conferred to the extent indicated.

It has been urged that as the law had been in force for nearly twenty years before any one sought to place such construction upon it as would authorize a sub-contractor, etc. to acquire, a lien, such construction should not prevail; that the absence of any such attempt to acquire and enforce such lien, during so long a period of time, is evidence of general acquiescence that it can not be acquired. This argument has some force, but it can not prevail over the clear and explicit terms of the satute conferring the right. We are not aware that the question was ever raised in the state until the case of Barker v. Buell, supra. See also O'Hallaran v. Leachy, 39 Ind. 150. But new points frequently arise upon statutes a great length of time after their passage. Thus it was not until the year 1840 that the question arose in England whether a promise by the defendant to the plaintiff to pay to A. B. a debt which the plaintiff owed to A. B., was within the statute of frauds passed in the 29th year of CHARLES II, which was the year 1676. Thus the statute had been in force 164 years before the question arose. Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. and E. 438; Smith on Cont., 5th ed., 108.

We have also been referred to some elementary books as authority that a sub-contractor, etc., can not acquire a lien under the statute set out. The statute never having received construction by the courts upon the point here involved, it is obvious that any comments upon it in this respect could only express the individual views of the party making them; and however much we may respect the authors referred to, we can not yield our convictions to theirs. Moreover, elementary books are often prepared with haste, and sometimes express views which the authors themselves would disclaim upon a fuller consideration of the subject.

There is a striking analogy between the statute and the principles of the civil law, including the maritime, in respect to liens. Thus, says Domat, vol. 1, p. 683, § 9. par. 1744: "Architects and other undertakers, workmen and artificers, who bestow their labor on buildings or other works, and who furnish materials, and in general all those who employ their time, their labor, their care, or furnish any materials, whether it be to make a thing or to repair it, or to preserve it, have the same privilege for their salaries, and for what they furnish, as those have who have advanced money for these kinds of works, and which the seller has for the price of the thing sold." The "privilege" of the seller is mentioned in a preceding section (4), p. 681, as follows: "He who has sold an immovable thing for which he has not received the price, is preferred before the other creditors of the purchaser and before all others, as to the thing that is sold. For the sale implied the condition that the purchaser should not be master of the thing till he had paid the price. Thus the seller, who has not received the price, may either keep the land or tenement if the price was to be paid before delivery, or he may follow it into what hands soever it may have passed, if he has delivered it before payment."

Digitized by Google

There are in many of the other states statutes similar to that in question here. An elaborate and well prepared brief intended for another cause, has been filed in this, to which we are indebted for a reference to many decisions of other states under similar statutes. Those decisions are in harmony with the conclusions herein arrived at. It would extend this opinion to an unreasonable length to notice them all in detail, but a few may be glanced at. In the case of Parker v. Bell, 7 Gray, 429, it was held, under a statute not unlike our own, that a plasterer employed by a builder who has made a written contract with the owner of land to build a house thereon, is entitled to a lien on the house and land. The court say: "The object of the provision of the statute is to create and preserve to the laborer security for the payment of the wages which he earns. It is manifest, from a consideration of the provisions of the successive statutes in relation to the lien of mechanics upon the estates upon which their labor has been expended, that the legislature have regarded it as a sound principle, that all those who have by consent of the owner, or in pursuance of contract with him for that purpose, contributed to increase the value of his property, should have an interest in it until their respective claims for such services shall have been paid and discharged." In White v. Miller, 18 Penn. State, 52, it was held under the Pennsylvania statute, that one who furnished lumber and window sash to a contractor to be used in the erection of a building had a lien therefor. GIBSON, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "As soon as owners of lots ceased to be their own builders, they put it in the power of persons employed by them to occasion losses to mechanics and material-men which they ought not to bear; and it was to remedy this mischief that the legislature established the principle that materials and labor are to be considered as having been furnished on the credit of the building, and not of the contractor. The principle is not only a just, but a convenient one. Whether the builder be the agent of the owner or an independent contractor, his appointment to the job creates a confidence in him which was not had before; and the consequence of a false confidence ought not to be borne by those who had no hand in occasioning it. Nor does the rule of the legislature bear hard on the owner. He has it in his power to detain the price of the building while there are outstanding charges against it, or to stipulate for security against those that might afterwards turn up; and if he uses common prudence, any loss which occurs will eventually fall on the author of it. If he do not, he can not charge the mechanic or material-man with the consequences of his own supineness. The adoption of these lien laws was imperfect, and they worked ill for the owner at first; but amended and expounded by experience, they work justly and well for all parties." See also the case of Lee v. Burke, 66 Penn. State, 336. So also in New York, under a statute certainly no more explicit than our own, it is held that a sub-contractor may acquire a lien for work and materials, and that the owner can not defeat the lien by a subsequent conveyance of the property. Blauvelt v. Woodworth, 31 N. Y. 285. See also Morrison v. Hancock, 40 Mo. 561; McCrea v. Craig, 23 Cal. 522.

In the case of Sodini v. Winter, 32 Md. 130, the court say, among other things, that "In a case like the present, of a material-man furnishing material to a contractor to be used in the erection of a building, the law contemplates a contract of purchase between these two, and that credit may be given to the latter, and whilst there is no contract express or implied between the founder and the owner, or credit given to the owner, yet the law provides a lien upon the building as a security for the material-man in case the contractor fails to pay for the materials; and this is done without affecting the liability of the contractor on his contract of purchase which still exists. Indeed, it was the liability to and frequency of loss sustained by mechanics and dealers in consequence of the employment of a middle-man or contractor which induced the legislature to give a lien on the building. Such being its character, and such the provision of law for its enforcement, the mere fact that the materials were furnished on the credit of the contractor, and not on the credit of the building, is not in our opinion either a waiver or extinguishment of the lien." In the case last cited proof was offered of payment in full by the owner to the contractor, but was rejected. This was held to be no error.

There are other authorities tending more or less strongly to sustain the lien; but we pass them over and proceed to the examination of those which seem to be relied upon to sustain the opposite views. The case of Spaulding v. Thompson, 27 Conn. 573, may be best stated in the language of the court in pronouncing the opinion. "The plaintiff," says the court, "by his bill, seeks to foreclose a mechanics' lien, which he claims, on the ground of his having furnished materials and rendered services in the erection of the defendants' church edifice. It appears, however, that the work was not done at the request of the defendants or even for their benefit. On the contrary, it was done against their express prohibition to the original contractors, and was also done after the contractors had been fully paid the contract price for the erection and completion of the whole church. Under the circumstances we cannot think the plaintiff entitled, as against the defendants, to any lien upon the church. It is true the language of the act of 1855 is very broad, but it could not have been intended to create a lien against a party who has not contracted either directly or indirectly for the work, but on the contrary, has expressly prohibited it." This case does not seem to us to militate essentially against the maintenance of the lien under a state of facts entirely different from those set forth.

The case of Hollingsworth v. Dow, 19 Pick. 228, involved nothing but a question of lien arising upon the principles of the common law, where a mechanic had been employed by a contractor to do certain work upon a machine, and had no application whatever to the question involved here.

In the case of Whitney v. Joslin, 108 Mass. 103, one Bourassee had taken a contract from Ebenezer L. Joslin to build a barn on land of his wife. Whitney & Sons had furnished Bourassee with material, who commenced the work but abandoned it before it was finished. Whitney & Sons then made a new contract with Emily J. Joslin, wife or widow of Ebenezer, whereby they agreed to finish the barn, etc., and she agreed, amongst other things, to pay them for the material they had furnished to Bourassee. It was held that if Whitney & Sons ever had any lien for material furnished Bourassee, they had waived it by the new contract. This case in no manner conflicts with the construction we place upon the statute.

The case of Wood v. Donaldson, 17 Wend. 550; S. C. 22 Wend. 395, was this: One Russell contracted with Wood for the erection of a building, engaging to do the mason and carpenter work. Russell made a contract with Tingley whereby the latter engaged to do the mason work of the building as a sub contractor. Tingley absconded before the work was finished. Donaldson, the plaintiff in the case, was employed by Tingley, and did work and furnished material, for which he claimed to hold Wood under the lien law. The court say that the first section of the law gives color to the claim, but that the other sections of the act "clearly show that this new and extraordinary remedy was intended to be limited to the persons employed by him who contracted with the owner. The second section provides that the owner shall furnish his contractor with copy of the account, so that if there shall be any disagreement between him and his creditor, they may adjust the amount. By the next section, if the adjustment can not be amicably made, they shall submit the difference to arbitrators; and the fourth section declares that if the contractor shall not pay the sum found due to his creditor, with costs, the owner shall pay the same out of the funds in his hands; and in case of default, it may be recovered in an action for money had and received, to the use of the cred itor, etc. Nothing can be more explicit than these provisions, and they limit the right to a lien upon the funds of the contractor in the hands of the owner to his creditors—persons who have performed work, etc., under a contract with him." We agree with the decision in the cause, and all that was said by the eminent jurist delivering the opinion, NELSON, Ch. J., but we fail to see that it has any application whatever to the case here. There is nothing in any of the sections that follows those hereinbefore set out, that tends in the slightest degree to qualify them in respect to the point here involved, or to show that the legislature did not intend that the persons therein mentioned should have a lien as therein provided for.

Digitized by Google

In the case of McAlpin v. Duncan, 16 Cal. 126, the statute under which the decision was made is not set out or stated. The court say: "We think all that can be gathered from this act is, that material-men, sub-contractors, etc., have a lien upon the property described in the act to the extent (if so much is necessary) of the contract price of the principal contractor; that these persons must give notice of their claims to the owner, or the mere existence of such claims will not prevent the owner from paying the contractor, and thereby discharging himself from the debt; that by giving notice, the owner becomes liable to pay the sub-contractor, etc. (as on garnishment or assignment, etc.), but that if the owner pays according to his contract, in ignorance of such claims, the payment is good." The case does not seem to throw any light upon the question under consideration.

In the case of Knowles v. Joost, 13 Cal. 620, a statute is in part set out, which authorizes the owner, upon being served with proper notice, "to withhold from the contractor, out of the first money due, or to become due, to him, under the contract, a sufficient sum to cover the lien claimed by such sub-contractor, journeyman or other person performing labor or furnishing materials, until the validity of the lien shall be determined by the proper tribunals, if it be contested." It was held that "it was not the design of the legislature to make him responsible, except upon notice, or to a greater extent than the sum due the contract tor at the date of the notice." We do not perceive that the case is at all in conflict with the construction we place upon our statute. By the statute copied in the opinion in the case cited, it would seem that the rights of the parties were to be determined by the state of things existing at the time of notice. Not so, however, under our statute, inasmuch as, if the notice is filed within the time limited, the lien relates back, as before shown.

The case of Jacobs v. Knapp, 50 N. H. 71, was an action of assumpsit for hauling wood, and a lien on the wood was claimed. The facts were that the wood belonged to the defendant, who had contracted with one Fifield to haul it. Fifield employed the plaintiff to haul it, there being no contract express or implied between the plaintiff and defendant. There was a statute which provides that "any person who labors at cutting, hauling, or drawing wood, bark, logs, or lumber, shall have a lien thereon for his personal services, which lien shall take precedence of all other claims except liens on account of public taxes, to continue sixty days after the services are performed, and may be secured by attachment." The court, after some discussion of the statute, say: "Upon the whole, therefore, we are inclined to the opinion that the lien of laborers in the class to which the plaintiff belongs, can attach only in case and by virtue of a contract, express or implied, with the owners of the property upon which the labor is bestowed." In a previous portion of the opinion the court, after having discussed the matter of liens in respect to buildings, says: "In such a case, to give not only the master-builder, but also all the various under-workmen, each an independent lien, without preference or precedence, upon the same property, would disastrously embarrass the useful construction of the work." This impracticability of giving separate and independent liens upon the same property "without preference or precedence" would seem to be the chief ground for the construction adopted, for the court proceed immediately to say: "In short, there would seem to be no practicable rule by which to interpert this statute, other than the one which should limit the subsistence of the lien to the party above who specially contracts with the owner of the property upon which the labor of the contractor and all his sub-contractors is expended." But this difficulty is entirely obviated by our statute, which makes provision for making all persons having such liens, parties to an action to enforce them, and if the property should not sell for sufficient to pay all, the proceeds of the sale are to be apportioned to each according to the amount due him. §§ 652, 653. The court, after speaking of the statutes of some other states, giving sub-contractors leins, say: "These provisions usuually require by way of proviso, that if the work is done under a contract with the owner, no person who may have done work or furnished materials for such contractor shall have the benefit of the lien, unless within a prescribed time after his employment by the contractor, he shall give notice to the owner that he is employed, and will claim the benefit of the lien." It will be seen that the law in that case did not provide for any notice to the owner; which was, perhaps, a strong reason for the adopting the construction placed upon it; while our statute provides for notice by filing it in the recorder's office. The court say further: "Such a law as we have indicated, and have found in other jurisdictions, would, perhaps, be of public advantage. It would tend to protect the laborer against the fraud, dishonesty, or insolvency of owners and contractors; but if evils exist by reason of the present state of the law, the legistature alone can, and that body most effectually may provide the remedy." We learn from a note to the case that the legislature subsequently took action upon the subject; but we have not seen the enactment. Taking the case in New Hampshire altogether, we are of the opinion that it does not seriously conflict with the conclusion of the case before us.

It has been suggested that the statute, with the construction we place upon it, is unconstitutional, for the reason that the subject matter is not expressed in the title. This, we think, was settled by the case of Hall v. Bunte, 20 Ind. 304 In that case it was held that the statute giving the lien was one that conferred a remedy for a debt, and was valid. In that case the debt was against the party against whom the lien was sought to be enforced. Here the debts are not, but this, we think, makes no material difference.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the original plaintiffs and the cross-complainants were entitled to their liens, and that the liens were not defeatəd by the payment to the contractor. It follows that the judgment below at general term, reversing the judgment rendered at special term, was right, and must be affirmed.

The judgment below is affirmed with costs.

Legislative Power Over Municipal Corporations.

We are greatly indebted to the learned reporter of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire for the subjoined abstract of a recent decision of that court upon the extent of legislative power, under the constitution, over funds granted to municipal and public corporations.

The following letter from Mr. Shirley accompanied the abstract of the case:

OFFICE OF THE STATE REPORTER,
ANDOVER, N. H., MARCH 23, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—I herewith send you an abstract of Spaulding v. Andover, decided March 13th, 1874. Its great length prevents my sending you a transcript of the entire opinion. It comments at length upon the views in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, and of Judge COOLEY in his Const. Limitations. It occurred to me that the abstract might interest you, although the court forbore passing upon several other interesting points.

Digitized by Google

Very truly yours,

JOHN M. SHIRLEY.

CHARLES W. SPAULDING v. THE TOWN OF ANDOVER.

Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire, March 13th, 1874.

1. Legislative Grant to Municipal Corporation a Contract.—A fund granted to a municipal body by the legislature of a state, cannot be taken away or diverted to other purposes by subsequent legislation.

2. ———. Such diversion is prohibited by that clause of the federal constitution, which provides that "no state" shall pass any "law impairing the obligation of contracts."

3. Dicta in Darlington v. Mayor, etc., 31 N. Y. 164, disapproved.

The action was assumpsit for a re-imbursement state bond or the par value thereof in money, under the act of July 3, 1872.

At various times during the war the legislature of New Hampshire passed acts authorizing the several towns to raise money for the payment of bounties to those enlisting to fill their quotas. In this way the town of Andover, with other towns, incurred a large debt.

In 1870 and 1871 the legislature provided that from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 in state bonds should be granted to such towns as a "reimbursement" for such war debts, and "in part payment" thereof, and a board of commissioners duly appointed for that purpose fixed the amount due each town, and the assignment of the same was duly made by them and entered by the state treasurer upon his books before July 3, 1872, and was duly reported by him as a liability of the state; but neither the specific bonds, nor the money in lieu of them had actually been taken by the town from the state treasury before the commencement of this and other suits. $100 00 was so assigned to Andover on account of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff enlisted early in the war, before towns paid bounties; afterwards re-enlisted; was counted upon the quota of the town: deserted while on his re-enlistment furlough; never returned; was never restored, and received no bounty from the town.

The act of July 3, 1872, provides that if "any town or city has received, or shall receive the sum of one hundred dollars or part thereof, either in money or bonds, for any person counted as part of the quota of such town or city, who has not received any bounty from such town, city or place, the sum of money or bonds received shall belong to and be the property of the person so counted, or his legal representatives, and may be recovered of such town or city in an action of assumpsit, as for money had and received."

At the October trial term, 1873, Chief Justice SARGENT directed a verdict for the defendants, and the judgment was reversed. The court unanimously decided that the act of July 3, 1872, was a "law impairing the obligation of contracts," and as such was prohibited by the constitution of the United States, and was therefore unconstitutional and void.

The opinion of the court by FOSTER, J., was an elaborate exposition of the two-fold public and private character of municipal corporations, and of legislative control over them.

The following are the concluding paragraphs of the opinion:

"By the act of 1870 the state granted to the town of Andover a certain amount of bonds to be devoted exclusively toward the re imbursement of the expenditures incurred by the town for war purposes during the rebellion, upon the basis that the amount of such bonds should be at the rate of $100 00 for every man furnished for the military service of the United States, after a specific period of time.

This was an unqualified, unlimited, unencumbered grant, possessing all the incidents of an executed and irrevocable contract, 1 Pars. Cont. 235.

A constitutional act of legislation, which is equivalent to a contract, and is perfected, requiring nothing further to be done in order to its entire completion, is a contract executed. Whatever rights are thereby created a subsequent legislature can not impair. If the proviso, condition or limitation, enacted in 1872, had been engrafted upon or made a part of the re-imbursement act it would, perhaps, have been binding, and the town would take the benefits of the act with its burdens. Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, 477.

The same rule applies to an obligation created by a constitutional law which is in the nature of an executory contract, if supported by a sufficient consideration.

The law of 1872, declaring a portion of the fund which had been solemnly granted to the town of Andover, to belong to and be the property of certain individuals, is invalid, as being contrary to that provision of the federal constitution, art. 1, § 10. which declares that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

We have reached this result fully sensible of the duty which requires of the judicial branch of the government great circumspection in passing upon the validity of the acts and doings of the legislature, but mindful also of the paramount authority of the fundamental decree of the general government and of the necessity for the preservation and protection of the inestimable principle that has been invaded by the legislation which we are thus constrained to declare null and void.

We have not deemed it essential to comment upon the remarkable character of this legislation with regard to its assumption of judicial function. By declaring in express terms that a person counted on the quota of the town, who has not received a bounty, shall be entitled at all events to a portion of the reimbursement fund assigned to the town under a legislative grant, thus assuming to adjudicate concerning the validity of such person's claim in an ex parte hearing before a tribunal not recognized by the law, the legislature of 1872 certainly proceeded with a degree of boldness and assumption which was not generated in very profound or deliberate reflection.

This result renders unnecessary the consideration of all the other questions of law raised by the case transferred.

JUDGMENT ON THE VERDICT.

Legal News and Notes.

—GENERAL LEGGETT, commissioner of patents, has tendered his resignation.

—THE judiciary committee of the New York state assembly has reported favorably a bill providing that no person shall be confined in the county jail on arrest upon process in civil suits, unless there be paid by the person causing the arrest twenty-five dollars every twenty days for the board of the prisoner.

—THE senate has confirmed the following judicial nominations: William Wallace, to be United States district judge for the northern district of New York; Orange Jacobs, to be chief justice of the Supreme Court for Washington territory; Moses Hallett, to be chief justice of Colorado; Joshua G. Heath, to be United States attorney for New Hampshire.

—THE legislature of Illinois has passed an act providing that whenever a total loss shall occur upon any risk insured in that state (mercantile stocks excepted), the amount insured shall be taken and deemed the true value of the property at the time of such loss, and of the amount of loss sustained by the insured, and that the same shall be recovered without any deduction whatever. Similar bills have been before the legislatures of Illinois and Missouri, but we are unable at this writing to state the result.

—IN the course of the financial debate in the house on the 7th instant, Mr. Hoar, the late attorney general, disposed of the oft-repeated assertion that Justices BRADLEY and STRONG of the Supreme Court owe their appointments to the fact of a knowledge on the part of the President that they entertained opinions favorable to the validity of the legal tender act, by asserting positively that both of these gentlemen had been selected by the President before anything was known of the opinion of the court on that question.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

THE Supreme Court of Missouri, in session at St. Louis, met on Monday and delivered over fifty opinions. Owing to the crowded state of our columns, we are unable to give a synopsis of any of these decisions this week. The court adjourned for one week to enable the judges to write other opinions.

WE publish in this number, by request of several subscribers, the case of Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company v. Stout, to which we have heretofore made reference (ante, p. 76), involving the question of the liability of a railway company for injuries to children by an unguarded and unfastened turntable. The very full statement of facts we take from the Legal Gazette.

We publish in this number an interesting opinion of Hon. ARNOLD KREKEL, in the United States District Court at Jefferson City, asserting the validity of proceedings by information instead of indictment, in the prosecution of offences under the internal revenue laws. Our correspondent at Jefferson City, Hon. H. B. Johnson, in sending this opinion, states that heretofore there has been much doubt, even by the Attorney General, as to the validity of this mode of proceeding. The opinion will no doubt prove acceptable and interesting to those of our readers who practice in the federal courts.

The Fourteenth Amendment and the Public Schools.

We learn from an exchange that the Supreme Court of Indiana has pronounced an important decision affecting the rights of colored children of that state to attend the public schools. Indiana had, at an early period, provided by law for the instruction in the public schools, free of charge, of all white children under twenty-one years of age, being children of citizens of the state. The Supreme Court has decided that the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States conferred on colored children the same rights in this respect possessed by white children, and that they had a right to enter as pupils the white schools, until separate schools, substantially equal in educational advantages, were provided for them.

The same question has been decided in substantially the same way by the Supreme Court of California in the case of Ward v. Flood, 7 Pacific Law Reporter, 85. The court hold that the latter clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution—"nor shall any state * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws"—secures to each child in California, regardless of the race or color of such child, a legal right to attend as a pupil and receive instruction at the public schools in the state, under the law providing for common schools; that the act of the legislature providing for the maintenance of separate schools for the education of children of African or Indian descent, and excluding them from schools where white children are educated, is not obnoxious to constitutional objection. But unless such separate schools be actually maintained for the education of colored children, then the latter have a legal right to resort to schools where white children are instructed, and can not be legally excluded therefrom by reason of race or color.

A Lay Opinion of Litigation.

The remark of the Solicitor's Journal that "the prejudice against lawyers is nothing new, nor has it become more reasonable by lapse of time," calls to mind an extremely well-written article from the pen of WALTER B. HILL, Esq., of Macon, Ga., in the January number of the Southern Law Review, showing by a multitude of humorous and sarcastic quotations, what a poor opinion men of letters have had of lawyers in all ages and countries. Lawyers may, however, console themselves with the reflection that men of letters have not generally thought worse of lawyers than of the members of other learned professions or of each other. We all remember the terms in which Swift makes his hero, Gulliver, describe the legal profession of his country to his master, the Houyhnhnm. That was perhaps the most bitter and cutting satire upon our profession that has ever been written. Scarcely less emphatic, but more true to nature, and overflowing with the drollest Western humor, was a speech delivered some years since by a Mr. Elmore, in the Wisconsin legislature, in support of a bill which he had introduced to repeal all laws for the collection of debts.

"Mr. Elmore proceeded to review the present system of collecting debts. It was all a humbug and a cheat, a matter of technicalities and legal shuffling. Lawyers gave advice in order to obtain fees and encourage litigation. Judges made blunders and mistakes. He had a little experience in law, and that was rich. [Laughter.] He would give a history of it. The speaker then related how he had purchased a yoke of oxen about fifteen years ago, paid fifty dollars for them. A few days after, the son of the man of whom he bought the oxen came to him and said the oxen were his. He insisted on having pay over again, and commenced a suit before a justice. The jury didn't agree. Finally, through the basswood justice of the peace, the case went against him. He appealed to the circuit court in Milwaukee. There I lost again, and said to my lawyer: 'I will give you ten dollars to quote Pennsylvania law to Judge MILLER and get a new trial ordered.' [Great laughter.] He took the ten dollars and performed his duty.

"A new trial was then granted and the venue changed to Walworth county. Judge IRVIN was then the judge. Any man who wanted to gain a cause in his court had either to go hunting with him and let the judge claim all the game that was shot, or else pat his dog. I patted his dog. [Laughter.] I fed that dog on crackers. [Renewed laughter.] The case was decided in my favor. When I heard the decision I thought the dog had followed me about long enough. I turned around and gave him a kick. [Laughter.] The yelp of the dog had hardly subsided ere I heard the judge say, 'Mr. Clerk, this judgment is set aside and a new trial granted.' [Great laughter.] Mr. Speaker, that kick cost me $200! [Convulsive laughter.] You have no doubt seen a suit in a justice's court in the country. There is time spent by jurors and hangers-on, besides other costs, at least $50, besides the ill-feeling and dissensions caused by it. It is all a cheat. The litigants had better sit down and play a game of old sledge to decide the case. It would be more sure to settle the dispute justly."

Digitized by Google

Grain Gambling—"Options" and "Puts"—"Seller next Month."

Business men will remember that in June, 1872, Peyton Chandler, of the firm of Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., produce brokers and commission merchants of Chicago, made a formidable attempt to make a fortune at other people's expense, by getting up a "corner" in oats. To accomplish this, Chandler purchased, between the 15th of May and the 18th of June, 2,500,000 bushels of cash oats, being all, or substantially all, the cash oats in the market, and also bought June options to the amount of 2,939,400 bushels. The total amount of oats in store in the city on the 18th of June was only 2,700,000 bushels, from which it will be seen that Chandler practically controlled the market up to that time, and the total amount received during the remainder of the month was only 800,000 bushels. As incidental to and part of the machinery of this corner, Chandler also sold what he called "puts," or privileges of delivery to him of oats during the month of June for forty-one cents a bushel, receiving half a cent per bushel for these "puts" or privileges. These "put" contracts were substantially alike in form, and read as follows:

"Received of A. D. $50 in consideration of which we give him or the holder of this contract the privilege of delivering to us or not, at any time prior to three o'clock P. M. of June 30, 1872, by notification or delivery, 10,000 bushels of No. 2 oats, regular receipts, at forty-one cents per bushel in store, and, if received, we agree to pay for the same at the above price. Signed, Chandler, Pomeroy & Co.

"PEYTON R. CHANDLER."

It will be seen by an inspection of this contract that the purchaser of a "put" paid a bonus of one-half cent per bushel for the chance of making or losing which the contract afforded him. The contract meant simply this: that if at any time prior to three o'clock P. M. of the 30th of June, oats should be worth more than forty-one cents per bushel in the market, Chandler should have the privilege of demanding from the holder of the "put" the difference between forty-one cents per bushel and the market price; but that, if at any time during such period, oats should be worth less than forty-one cents per bushel in the market, then the holder of the "put" should be entitled to make a like demand against Chandler. The well-known effort of Chandler to get up a corner in oats produced a powerful combination against him. This combination was aided by a decline in oats at New York, so that on the 18th of June, twelve days before the date of his expected triumph—with "puts" outstanding against him representing 3,700,000 bushels—Chandler and his brokers, Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., failed. The price declined before the close of business on that day from thirtyn-ine to thirty-one cents, and declined during the month of June, so that at one time they were as low as twenty-six cents per bushel. Between the time of the failure and three o'clock on the 30th of June, the holders of the "put" claims made tender to the bankrupt of the quantity of the oats called for by their respective tickets, and the oats not being accepted and paid for, they were sold upon the market on that day or the next, under the rules of the board of trade.

Chandler and his brokers of course were thrown into bankruptcy, and the holders of the "puts" modestly proved up as their claims the difference between the price named in the "put" contract and that for which the cash was made. That is to say, they had the effrontery to ask a court of justice to sanction a gaming contract of the worst and most profligate character; because it was not only, equally with other gaming contracts, pernicious to the parties engaged in it, but also because, by suddenly changing values, it was liable to involve the ruin of many innocent persons. The total amount of claims thus proved up was about $400,000, while the total amount of "margins" or forfeits paid for these "puts" was less than $19,000.

Upon these facts District Judge BLODGETT holds that the contracts were simply wagers, illegal, immoral and against public policy, and such as a court of justice will not aid in enforcing. But he also holds that they fall within the statute of Illinois which permits the recovery of money lost at gaming, and that therefore the claimants will be entitled to prove against the bankrupts' estate the money actually paid as "margins" on those "puts."

It is to be observed, however, that Judge BLODGETT does not go so far as to declare all option contracts void. On the contrary, he says:

"I do not intend to be understood as holding that every option contract for the delivery of grain or stock, or that every "put" is necessarily void, but only that all these contracts, in the light of the testimony before the court, were in their essential features gambling contracts. The parties when they made them did not intend to deliver the grain, but only at the utmost to settle the differences. They knew they could not obtain the grain to deliver if Chandler sustained his corner, and their action in buying a "put" was virtually a bet on their part that he could not accomplish what they all knew he was endeavoring to do—that is, keep up the price through June to his own figures—and virtually a bet on his part that he could do so.

Judge BLODGETT'S opinion will be found interesting throughout, not only to the lawyer, but also to the general reader. The story of the effort of the bankrupt to get up the corner is exceedingly well told, and the principles of law applicable to the case are clearly brought out. It will be found in the Chicago Legal News of April 11.

Lawyers as Legislators.

A recent attempt of the junior fellows of Trinity College to elect one of their own number, a doctor of medicine, to parliament, upon the avowed principle of the "disestablishment of lawyers," calls forth the following observations from the Solicitor's Journal:

"The prejudice against lawyers is nothing new, nor has it become more reasonable by lapse of time. We have all heard of the 'parliamentum indoctum' from which all lawyers were excluded, and which Lord Coke dismisses with the remark, 'Never a good law was made thereat.'

"From that day to this the lawyers have been from time to time made the butts of meagre witticisms, and occasionally the victims of the same persistent prejudice. And yet upon their honesty, skill and fidelity, all the most important interests throughout the kingdom mainly depend. The very men who chatter obscure calumnies against lawyers as a body, are compelled to confide, and do undoubtingly and safely confide their characters, their property, the honor of their families, and, very often, secrets which they scarcely like to acknowledge to themselves, to the keeping of their legal advisers. One would imagine that those who habitually prove themselves worthy of so high a trust can hardly be so unworthy of public confidence as the college trio (emulous, apparently, of the fame of their prototypes of Tooley street) would have the world believe.

Digitized by Google

"But, further, not only is there no case made for the 'disestablishment' of lawyers, but the exigencies of the public service imperatively demand their establishment. Anyone who has taken the trouble to follow the course of legislation, particularly in the house of commons, can hardly fail to have been struck by the manner in which the whole house, with exceptions so few as to be inconsiderable, leaves all the practical details of legislation in the hands of the lawyers. The house at large may join in a debate on a question of general interest or public policy, but when the second reading has been passed, and the bill has to be put into a workable form in committee, it is upon the lawyers that all the real work falls, and those few lay members who occasionally try their hand at an amendment find the house but too ready to accept the off-hand statement of some practical lawyer that the clause 'wouldn't work,' as an amply sufficient reason for refusing even to consider the question. And we must own that the constituencies at large show themselves fully alive to this consideration, and generally give a lawyer, cæteris paribus, the preference.

"But there is a further ground on which it seems to us that lawyers are peculiarly appropriate representatives of a university. As the county members are properly chosen from the owners of property who have great local interests, and the representatives of commerce and industry are naturally found in the members for great towns, so the distinctly 'educated' element in society finds its appropriate entrance into parliament through the universities. Of this element one principal, though not by any means exclusive, test is academical distinction, and it is perhaps not too much to say that no such constituency can safely, except in the case of rare eminence in after life, dispense with this qualification in a candidate for their suffrages But the most distinguished students of every university are found, with trifling exceptions, in the ranks of the clergy or the bar, and as the former are disqualified by law from sitting in the house of commons, the choice of the electors is almost of necessity limited to the latter. Here and there a physician of distinction may be found who could worthily, so far as professional eminence goes, fill this post, but the training of his life, which more or less secludes him from the arena of wordy contest, is not usually of a kind to fit him to take the lead in debate which ought to be required from the representative of a university. Such cases as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Beresford Hope are no real exceptions to this rule; brilliant scholars of the highest academical distinction, who are able at once to devote themselves to political life, and who, after winning their spurs as members for less important constituencies, are called upon to receive their reward at the hands of their universities, constitute a class always rare, and whose position is entirely exceptional. And it is worthy of remark that certainly one (we believe both) of the gentlemen named had entered upon a course of training for the bar.

"Lastly, in this case res ipsa loquitur: any one who will look down the list of the representatives of any university in the kingdom for the last seventy years will, if he has any acquaintance with the modern history of his country, be struck by three reflections: one, how very large a proportion of these representatives have left their mark upon the legislation of the age; another, with how few exceptions they have been selected from the ranks of the lawyers; and the last, that except in one or two remarkable instances, the undistinguished minority includes all the non-lawyers."

Fifty years ago in the United States the law was almost universally regarded by ambitious young men as a stepping-stone to political distinction, and distinction in politics was of equal assistance in acquiring practice at the bar. Accordingly it was common for young lawyers, in the outset of their professional career, to engage actively in politics with the view of promoting their advancement in the way of acquiring business and clients. At the present day this state of things is reversed. Business men who have great interests at stake are, as a general rule, careful not to commit them to lawyers who divide their time between professional business and the labor and excitement of politics. To this rule there are, of course, many and some distinguished exceptions. But it remains, as a general thing true, that old lawyers, solicitous for the professional advancement of their students, do not fail to advise them to let politics alone, at least in the earlier stages of their career.

It is equally true that the influence of the legal profession upon the politics of the country is declining sensibly of late years. The causes of this decline afford a curious theme for speculation. Whether it is due to the fact that the great mass of able and successful lawyers voluntarily avoid politics and devote themselves exclusively to the practice of their profession, or whether it is due to a more general diffusion of intelligence in other ranks of society; or whether this apparent loss of influence is an evidence of the general degradation of the legal profession;—these, and perhaps other things, will have to be considered in coming to an intelligent conclusion upon the question. It is doubtless true that forensic skill and power have much less influence in promoting success at the bar than formerly. The growing disposition on the part of attorneys to waive juries and to submit causes to the final decision of the judge, and the introduction in many states of the referee system in the place of trial by jury, have been a sore decayer of the spread-eagle oratory of former years. years. The decline of forensic eloquence is further promoted by the fact that the experience of every successful counsellor teaches him that success before the highest tribunals depends far more upon that skillful attention to details by which the record is made to exhibit in a clear light the questions in dispute, and upon his skill in the preparation of a written argument which shall not weary the court with irrelevant or unimportant matters, but which shall seize at once upon the chief points in controversy, and present his views of them in clear and forcible language and with logical method. The decline of oratory at the bar and in the legislative councils is further promoted by the great circulation and influence of the press. At this day the humblest citizen looks to the columns of his daily or weekly paper for information as to what is taking place in public affairs; whereas fifty years ago the stump orator was the great oracle from whose mouth the masses of the people received their political wisdom. To the decline of the forensic power among the members of the legal profession, may doubtless be attributed chiefly the decline of the influence of the profession in the politics of the country. The lawyer being no longer an orator, but simply a scholarly man of business, other men of business are placed in any forensic contest more nearly upon a footing with him.

Digitized by Google

But there is nothing in this decline of influence to create any alarm on the part of the legal profession. The lawyer never can and never will be dispensed with as a legislator. While the general policy of legislation will henceforth be shaped according to the demands of men of business—merchants, manufacturers and agriculturists; and while the country will never again (if it ever has heretofore) submit to the domination of any one class, or yield to any one class without great jealousy an undue influence in legislation, yet the presence of the practical lawyer will always be necessary in the legislative counsels of the state and nation. In those counsels he will occupy to men of business a relation similar to that of lawyer and client elsewhere. The lay members, preponderating in numbers, will, subject of course to the proper influence of the professional members, dictate the general policy of legislation; while to the professional members will still be assigned most of its technical details. To them, in short, will always belong the highly important duty—a duty which can never be discharged by any but skillful lawyers—of putting legislative bills in such shape that they "will work." Notwithstanding the great learning of the legal profession, and the fact that it is the sympathetic representative of all other classes, it will be an ill day for the country if the work of legislation shall ever be exclusively trusted to lawyers; but it will be a worse day if lawyers shall ever be entirely "disestablished" as legislators, and if legislation shall be entirely committed to those who must be in a great measure ignorant of the laws which already exist. A parliamentum indoctum such as Lord Coke denounced, would present a spectacle far more alarming to the well-wisher of his country than a legislature composed exclusively of lawyers.

Negligence—Liability of a Railway Company for an Injury to a Child Caused by an Unguarded and Unfastened Turntable.

SIOUX CITY & PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. STOUT.

Supreme Court of the United States. October Term, 1873.

1. Railway Negligence—Injury to Child by Unguarded and Unfastened Turntable—Case in Judgment—Under certain circumstances a railroad company may be liable, on the ground of negligence, for a personal injury to a child of tender years, in a town or city, caused by a turntable built by the company upon its own unmolosed land, and which is left unguarded and unlocked in a situation which is likely to canse injury to children.

2. Rule as to Negligence in Case of Children of Tender Years—While it is the general rule in regard to an adult that to entitle him to recover damages for an injury resulting from the fault or negligence of another, he must himself have been free from fault, such is not the rule in regard to an infant of tender years. The care and caution required of a child is according to his maturity and capacity only, and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case. (Railroad Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wallace, 401, affirmed.)

3. Railway Negligence—Injury to Strangers.—While a railway company is not bound to the same degree of care in regard to mere strangers, who are even unlawfully upon its premises, that it owes to passengers conveyed by it, it is not exempt from responsibility to such strangers for injuries arising from its negligence, or from its tortious acts.

4. Negligence, when a Question for the Jury.—It is true, in many cases, that here the facts are undisputed, the effect of them is for the judgment of the court and not for the decision of the jury. This is true in that class of cases where the existence of such facts come in question, rather than where deductions or inferences are to be made from them. And whether the fact be disputed or undisputed, if different minds may honestly draw different conclusions from them, the case is properly left to the jury.

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Nebraska. A report of the case in the court below will be found in 2 Dillon, C. C. 294.

Henry Stout, a child six years of age, and living with his parents, sued by his next friend the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, in the court below, to recover damages for an injury sustained upon a turntable belonging to the said company. The turntable was in an open space, about eighty rods from the company's depot, in a hamlet or settlememt of one hundred to one hundred and fifty persons. Near the turntable was a travelled road passing through the depot grounds, and another travelled road near by. On the railroad ground, which was not enclosed or visibly separated from the adjoining property, was situated the company's station-house, and about a quarter of a mile distant from this was the turntable on which the plaintiff was injured. There were but few houses in the neighborhood of the turntable, and the child's parents lived in another part of the town, and about three-fourths of a mile distant. The child, without the knowledge of his parents, set off with two other boys, the one nine and the other ten years of age, to go to the depot, with no definite purpose in view. When the boys arrived there, it was proposed by some of them to go to the turntable to play. The turntable was not attended or guarded by any servant of the company, was not fastened or locked, and revolved easily on its axis. Two of the boys began to turn it, and in attempting to get upon it the foot of the child (he being at the time upon the railroad track) was caught between the end of the rail on the turntable as it was revolving, and the end of the iron rail on the main track of the road, and was crushed.

One witness, then a servant of the company, testified that he had previously seen boys playing at the turntable, and had forbidden them from playing there. But the witness had no charge of the table, and did not communicate the fact of having seen boys playing there to any of the officers or servants of the company having the table in charge.

One of the boys, who was with the child when injured, had previously played upon the turntable when the railroad men were working on the track, in sight and not far distant.

It appeared from the testimony that the child had not, before the day on which he was row injured, played at the turntable, or had, indeed, ever been there.

The table was constructed on the railroad company's own land, and, the testimony tended to show, in the ordinary way. It was a skeleton turntable; that is to say, it was not planked between the rails, though it had one or two loose boards upon the ties. There was an iron latch fastened to it which turned on a hinge, and, when in order, dropped into an iron socket on the track, and held the table in position while using. The catch of this latch was broken at the time of the accident. The latch, which weighed eight or ten pounds, could be easily lifted out of the catch and thrown back on the table, and the table was allowed to be moved about. This latch was not locked or in any way fastened down before it was broken, and all the testimony on that subject tended to show that it was not usual for railroad companies to lock or guard turntables, but that it was usual to have a latch with a catch, or draw-bolt, to keep them in position when used.

The record stated that "the counsel for the defendant disclaimed resting their defence on the ground that the plaintiff's parents were negligent, or that the plaintiff (considering his tender age) was negligent, but rested their defence on the ground that the company was not negligent, and asserted that the injury to the plaintiff was accidental or brought upon himself."

On the question whether there was negligence on the part of the railway company in the management or condition of its turntable, the judge charged the jury:

Digitized by Google

"That to maintain the action it must appear by the evidence that the turntable, in the condition, situation and place where it then was, was a dangerous machine, one which, if unguarded or unlocked, would be likely to cause injury to children; that if, in its construction and the manner in which it was left, it was not dangerous in its nature, the defendant was not liable for negligence; that they were further to consider whether, situated as it was, as the defendant's property in a small town somewhat remote from habitations, there was negligence in not anticipating that injury might occur if it was left unlocked or unguarded; that if they did not have reason to anticipate that children would be likely to resort to it, or that they would be likely to be injured if they did resort to it, then there was no negligence."

The jury found a verdict of $7,500 for the plaintiff, from the judgment upon which this writ of error was brought.

Mr. Isaac Cook, for the plaintiff in error, insisted:

1st. That the party injured was himself in fault, that his own negligence produced the result, and that upon well-settled principles, a party thus situated is not entitled to recover.

2d. That there was no negligence proved on the part of the defendant in the condition or management of the table.

3d. That the facts being undisputed, the question of evidence was one of law, to be passed upon by the court, and should not have been submitted to the jury.

Mr. S. A. Strickland, contra.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

1st. It is well settled that the conduct of an infant of tender years is not to be judged by the same rule which governs that of an adult. While it is the general rule in regard to an adult, that to entitle him to recover damages for an injury resulting from the fault or negligence of another, he must himself have been free from fault, such is not the rule in regard to an infant of tender years. The care and caution required of a child is according to his maturity and capacity only, and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case. Railroad Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wallace, 401.

But it is not necessary to pursue this subject. The record expressly states that "the counsel for the defendant disclaim resting their defence on the ground that the plaintiff's parents were negligent, or that the plaintiff (considering his tender age) was negligent, but rest their defence on the ground that the company was not negligent, and claim that the injury to the plaintiff was accidental or brought upon himself"

This disclaimer ought to dispose of the question of the plaintiff's negligence, whether made in a direct form or indirectly under the allegation that the plaintiff was a trespasser upon the railroad premises, and therefore can not recover.

A reference to some of the authorities on the last suggestion may, however, be useful.

In the well-known case of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Adolphus and Ellis (New Series, 29), the child was clearly a trespasser in climbing upon the cart, but was allowed to recover.

In Birge v. Gardener, 19 Conn. 507, the same judgment was given and the same principle laid down. In the most of the actions, indeed, brought to recover for injuries to children, the position of the child was that of a technical trespasser.

In Daily v. Norwich and Worcester Railroad Company, 26 Connecticut, 591, it is said the fact that the person was trespassing at the time was no excuse, unless he thereby invited the act, or his negligent conduct contributed to it.

In Bird v. Holbrook, 4 Bingham, 628 (see also Loomis v. Terry, 17 Wendell. 496; Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Saunders, 83; Johnson v. Patterson, 14 Conn. 1; State v. Moore, 31 id. 479), the plaintiff was injured by the spring guns set in the defendant's grounds, and although the plaintiff was a trespasser, the defendant was held liable.

There are no doubt cases in which the contrary rule is laid down. But we conceive the rule to be this: that while a railway company is not bound to the same degree of care in regard to mere strangers, who are unlawfully upon its premises, that it owes to passengers conveyed by it, that it is not exempt from responsibility to such strangers for injuries arising from its negligence or from its tortious acts.

2d. Was there negligence on the part of the railway company in the management or condition of its turntable?

The charge on this point (see supra) was an impartial and an intelligent one. Unless the defendant was entitled to an order that the plaintiff be non-suited, or, as it is expressed in the practice of the United States courts, to an order directing a verdict in its favor, the submission was right. If, upon any construction which the jury was authorized to put upon the evidence, or by any inferences they were authorized to draw from it, the conclusion of negligence can be justified, the defendant was not entitled to this order, and the judgment can not be disturbed. To express it affirmatively—if, from the evidence given, it might justly be inferred by the jury that the defendant, in the construction, location, management or condition of its machine, had omitted that care and attention to prevent the occurrence of accidents which prudent and careful men ordinarily bestow, the jury was at liberty to find for the plaintiff.

That the turntable was a dangerous machine, which would be likely to cause injury to children who resorted to it, might fairly be inferred from the injury which actually occurred to the plaintiff. There was the same liability to injury to him, and no greater, that existed with reference to all children. When the jury learned from the evidence that he had suffered a serious injury by his foot being caught between the fixed rail of the road-bed and the turning rail of the table, they were justified in believing that there was a probability of the occurrence of such accidents.

So, in looking at the remoteness of the machine from inhabited dwellings, when it was proved to the jury that several boys from the hamlet were at play there on this occasion, and that they had been at play upon the turntable on other occasions, and within the observation and to the knowledge of the employees of the defendant, the jury were justified in believing that children would probably resort to it, and that the defendant should have anticipated that such would be the case.

As it was in fact, on this occasion, so it was to be expected that the amusement of the boys would have been found in turning this table while they were on it or about it. This could certainly have been prevented by locking the turntable when not in use by the company. It was not shown that this would cause any considerable expense or inconvenience to the defendant. It could probably have been prevented by the repair of the broken latch. This was a heavy catch, which, by dropping into a socket, prevented the revolution of the table. There had been one on this table weighing some eight or ten pounds, but it had broken off and had not been replaced. It was proved to have been usual with railroad companies to have upon their turntables a latch or bolt, or some similar instrument. The jury may well have believed that if the defendant had incurred the trifling expense of replacing this latch, and had taken the slight trouble of putting it in its place, these very small boys would not have taken the pains to lift it out, and thus the whole difficulty have been avoided. Thus reasoning, the jury would have reached the conclusion that the defendant had omitted the care and attention it ought to have given—that it was negligent, and that its negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff. The evidence is not strong and the negligence is slight, but we are not able to say that there is not evidence sufficient to justify the verdict. We are not called upon to weigh, to measure, to balance the evidence, or to ascertain how we should have decided if acting as jurors. The charge was in all respects sound and judicious, and there being sufficient evidence to justify the finding, we are not authorized to disturb it.

Digitized by Google

3d. It is true, in many cases, that where the facts are undisputed, the effect of them is for the judgment of the court, and not for the decision of the jury. This is true in that class of cases where the existence of such facts come in question rather than where deductions or inferences are to be made from the facts If a deed be given in evidence, a contract proven, or its breach testified to, the existence of such deed, contract, or breach, there being nothing in derogation of the evidence, is no doubt to be ruled as a question of law. In some cases, too, the necessary inference from the proof is so certain that it may be ruled as a question of law. If a sane man voluntarily throws himself in contact with a passing engine, there being nothing to counteract the effect of this action, it may be ruled as a matter of law that the injury to him resulted from his own fault, and that no action can be sustained by him or his representatives. So if a coach driver intentionally drives within a few inches of a precipice, and an accident happens, negligence may be ruled as a question of law. On the other hand, if he had placed a suitable distance between his coach and the precipice, but by the breaking of a rein or an axle, which could not have been anticipated, an injury occurred, it might be ruled as a question of law that there was no negligence and no liability. But these are extreme cases. The range between them is almost infinite in variety and extent. It is in relation to these intermediate cases that the opposite rule prevails. Upon the facts proven in such cases, it is a matter of judgment and discretion, of sound inference, what is the deduction to be drawn from the undisputed facts. Certain facts we may suppose to be clearly established from which one sensible, impartial man would infer that proper care had not been used, and that negligence existed; another man, equally sensible and equally impartial, would infer that proper care had been used, and that there was no negligence. It is this class of cases, and those akin to it, that the law commits to the decision of a jury. Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and men of little education, men of learning and men whose learning consists only in what they have themselves seen and heard, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer; these sit together, consult, apply their separate experience of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw an unanimous conclusion. This average judgment thus given it is the great effort of the law to obtain. It is assumed that twelve men know more of the common affairs of life than does one man, that they can draw wiser and safer conclusions from admitted facts thus occurring than can a single judge.

In no class of cases can this practical experience be more wisely applied than in that we are considering. We find, accordingly, although not uniform or harmonious, that the authorities justify us in holding in the case before us, that although the facts are undisputed, it is for the jury and not for the judge to determine whether proper care was given, or whether they establish negligence.

In Redfield on the Law of Railways, vol. 2, p. 231, it is said: "And what is proper care will be often a question of law, where there is no controversy about the facts. But ordinarily, we apprehend, where there is any testimony tending to show negligence, it is a question for the jury." Quimby v. Vermont Central Railroad, 23 Vermont, 387; Pfau v. Reynolds, 53 Illinois, 212; Patterson v. Wallace, 1 McQueen's House of Lords Cases, 748.

In Patterson v. Wallace, 1 McQueen's House of Lords Cases, 748, there was no controversy about the facts, but only a question whether certain facts proved established negligence on the one side, or rashness on the other. The judge at the trial withdrew the case from the jury, but it was held in the house of lords to be a pure question of fact for the jury, and the judgment was reversed.

In Mangam v. Brooklyn Railroad, 38 New York, 455, the facts in relation to the conduct of the child injured, the manner in which it was guarded, and how it escaped from those having it in charge, were undisputed. The judge at the trial ordered a non-suit, holding that these facts established negligence in those having the custody of the child. The Court of Appeals of the State of New York held that the case should have been submitted to the jury, and set aside the non-suit.

In Detroit and W. R. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Michigan, 99, the cases are largely examined, and the rule laid down that when the facts are disputed, or when they are not disputed, but different minds might honestly draw different conclusions from them, the case must be left to the jury for their determination. See among other cases cited, the following: Carsley v. White, 21 Pickering, 256; Rindge v. Inhabitants of Coleraine, 11 Gray, 157; Langhoff v. Milwaukee and P. R. R. Co., 19 Wisconsin, 497; Macon and Western Railroad v. Davis, 13 Georgia, 68; Renwick v. New York Central Railroad, 36 New York, 132.

It has been already shown that the facts proved justified the jury in finding that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and we are of the opinion that it was properly left to the jury to determine that point.

Upon the whole case, the judgment must be affirmed.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Negligence—Liability of Municipal Corporations for Injuries Resulting from Failure to Keep Streets in Repair.

HULL v. CITY OF KANSAS.

Supreme Court of Missouri, Jefferson City, January Term, 1874.

Present, Hon. WASH ADAMS, " W. B. NAPTON, " H. M. VORIES, } Judges.

1. Rule Where the Injury is in Part Caused by Unmanageable Horse — Where, in driving a buggy on the street of an incorporated town, the plaintiff's horse became uncontrollable by reason of the lines getting entangled under his tail, so that, in backing, the horse fell into a hole which the city authorities had negligently left open, whereby the horse and buggy were injured, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages of the municipal corporation, although the fact that the horse became for the time unmanageable contributed to the producing of the injury.

2. Case Affirmed.—The principle laid down in Hunt v. Pownall, 9 Vt. 411, applicable to such cases, affirmed.

Napton, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This action was to recover damages for an injury to a horse and buggy, alleged to have been occasioned by a hole in a street, negligently left uncovered by the city authorities. The facts appeared to be that the driver of the buggy, when attempting to turn from one street into another, got one of the lines entangled under the horse's tail, which caused the horse to commence backing, and, as the driver was about to jump out, the horse fell into the hole in the embankment on which the street was built.

The court, on the trial, declared the law to be "that it was the duty of the defendant to keep its streets in a proper state of repair, so that they should be reasonably safe for travel, and if the defendant permitted one of its streets to be and remain out of repair, and that at the time said street was so out of repair the plaintiff's horse and buggy was being driven along the same, and, without the fault of the driver, the horse and buggy of plaintiff was injured by reason of said street being out of repair, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, even though such injury was the combined result of accident and of the defendant's neglect to keep said street in repair, provided the driver of said horse was in no fault."

The court refused to declare the law as asked by the defendant, that if the defect in the street was not the sole cause of the injury, no recovery could be had, and therefore if before the accident the driver of the horse had lost all control over him, and the horse continued uncontrollable at the time of the accident, the plaintiff could not recover.

Digitized by Google

Another instruction was asked, that if this occurred on Sunday, and the plaintiff was the owner of the horse and buggy, and had hired them out on that day from his livery stable, no recovery could be had.

There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff.

The point presented by the instructions in this case, I understand, was decided at the last term at St. Joseph in the case of Bassett v. City of St. Joseph,* in which case this court adopted the view taken by the New Hampshire court in Winship v. Enfield (42 N. H. 202), and declined to follow the decisions in Massachusetts, referred to in the brief of defendant's counsel. The Circuit Court of Jackson County evidently adopted the views of the New Hampshire cases, and determined that although the injury was the result of accident in the temporary loss of control over the horse, yet if that accident would have resulted in no damage had the street been in proper repair, the city must be held responsible.

Indeed, it is not very clear that the Massachusetts cases go to the extent of holding that a mere temporary loss of control over the horse driven along the street would relieve the city from responsibility. It is held that where the horse escapes from the driver entirely, or is totally ungovernable, or is a vicious animal, the damage occasioned is not chargeable to the city or town, because it ultimately occurs in a street or at a place where the street is out of repair.

In this case the driver had not lost the control of the horse except during the short period of his backing into the hole, and if no such hole had been there, no damage would have occurred.

In the case of Hunt v. Pownall (9 Vt. 411) Redfield, J., said: "In every case of damage occurring on a highway, we could suppose a state of circumstances in which the injury would not have occurred. If the team had not been too young or restive, or too old, or too headstrong, or the harness had not been defective, or the carriage insufficient, no loss would have intervened. It is against these constantly occurring accidents that towns are required to guard in building highways. The traveler is not bound to see to it that his carriage and harness are always perfect, and his team of the most manageable character and in the most perfect training, before he ventures upon the highway. If he could be always sure of all this, he would not require any further guarantee of his safety, unless the road were absolutely impassable. If the plaintiff is in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, and the injury is attributable to the insufficiency of the road conspiring with some accidental cause, the defendants are liable.

This is in substance the position of the Circuit Court in its instructions in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

Judges Wagner and Sherwood absent.

Prosecutions by Information of Offences under the Internal Revenue Laws.

THE UNITED STATES v. EBERT.

District Court of the United States, Western District of Missouri, March Term, 1874.

Before Hon. ARNOLD KREKEL, District Judge.

1. Criminal Practice—Information.—Offences arising under the internal revenue laws being misdemeanors merely, and not "infamous," may be prosecuted by information filed by the district attorney.

The facts sufficiently appear from the opinion of the court.

* Since reported, 53 Mo. 290.

E. L. King, for the motion, relied on the fifth amendment to the constitution.

Jas. S. Botsford, district attorney, relied on and cited 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 624, 611; Comm. v. Waterborough, 5 Mass. 257; Adams v. Woods, 2 Cranch, 336; Ex parte Marquand, 2 Gall. 552; Walsh v. United States, 3 Wood. & M. 341; Levy v. Burley, 2 Sumn. 355; Parsons v. Hunter, ib. 419; United States v. Mann, 1 Gall. 3; Territory v. Lockwood, 3 Wall. 236; United States v. Shephard, 1 Abb. U. S. R. 431; United States v. Waller, 1 Sawyer C. C. 701; 1 Stat. at Large, 119, § 32; 13 Stat. at Large, 305, § 179; 14 Stat. at Large. 145 § 179.

KREKEL, J.—This is an information filed by the district attorney alleging that defendant was a manufacturer of cigars, and as such had failed to execute bond as required by law. To this, defendant files his motion to quash, alleging, in substance, that cases of the kind can not be prosecuted by information, but must be by indictment. This brings up the question—first, is the case here presented within the act of July 13, 1866, which provides that "all fines, penalties and forfeitures which may be imposed or incurred shall and may be sued for and recovered, when not otherwise provided, in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action or by any appropriate form of proceeding before any circuit or district court."

The provision cited is found in the revenue act, and there can be no doubt that the intention of congress was to sanction or provide for a class of cases most frequently occurring under the revenue laws. Looking at the language employed—"a proper form of action"—it is obvious that congress here had reference to existing forms of action, and when using the terms immediately following—"or by any appropriate form of proceeding"—it intended to enlarge the former by giving authority to provide new and suitable forms and proceedings to meet cases as they might arise. It is well known that at the time of framing and adopting the constitution, fines and penalties could be and were largely recovered by information; and there can scarcely be any doubt but that congress had reference, when speaking of "a proper form of action," to that practice which at the time of the enactment of the law cited, prevailed in a number of the states. It must, then, be taken that the case under consideration, and the class of cases to which it belongs, comes within the provisions of the statute cited.

The second question is, had congress the power to pass the act of 1866, and especially the provision cited, thereby doing away with the necessity of a grand jury passing upon cases arising under internal revenue laws? The fifth article of the amendments of the constitution of the United States provides that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury." It will be observed that this provision covers infamous crimes only. It is not necessary to define what is here meant by infamous, for it is an undisputed point that misdemeanors, such as the one for which the information under consideration is filed, can not, by any construction or interpretation given by courts, be brought within the term "infamous." At the time of the adoption of the amendment cited, attention was no doubt called to existing constitutional provisions; and had the requirement that all classes of crimes should be passed on by grand juries before trial been intended, suitable language for that purpose would have been employed. Indeed, by the use of the words "capital or otherwise infamous crimes" it may be readily inferred that a grand jury was to pass upon such, and such only; and while the legislature was not bound to limit the holding to answer to that class of cases, but might extend the requirement to any offences, yet the decision of a grandjury was secured only to the person or persons charged with thehigher classes of crimes specified.

The act of March 30, 1790, passed by congress soon after the adoption of the constitution, strongly supports the view here taken. In the thirty-second section of said act, providing the time within which prosecutions shall be commenced, it enacts, "nor shall any person be prosecuted, tried or punished for any offence not capital, nor for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall have been found or instituted," thus affirming that there existed the distinction between crimes and other offences contended for. As sustaining these views, see United States v. Shephard, 1 Abb. U. S. 431, and United States v. Waller, 1 Sawyer C. C. 701.

Digitized by Google

Under these views of the court, the case under consideration may be prosecuted by information, and the motion to quash is overruled.

Action by Insurance Company Against Incendiary —In Whose Name Brought.

ÆTNA INS. CO. v. HANNIBAL & ST. JOSEPH R. R. CO.

U. S. Circuit Court, Eastern District of Mo., March Term, 1874.

Before DILLON AND TREAT, JJ.

1. Insurance—Subrogation—Assignment—Action—Where insured property has been destroyed by a wrong-doer and the insurer has paid to the owner on the policy less than the value of his loss, and taken a partial assignment of his right, he can not sue the wrong-doer in his own name for the injury, either as at common law or under the statute of Missouri. The action must be in the name of the owner of the property destroyed.

The plaintiff insured the personal property of one Myron H. Balcom, situate adjoining the defendant's railway, for $1,900. Within the lifetime of the policy, property covered by it to the value of $2,214 was destroyed by the carelessness of the defendant's servants in the use of its locomotive engine. The insurance company paid Balcom in full satisfaction for all claim under his policy $1,050, and received from him a written instrument reciting the foregoing facts, and assigning to it all his right to recover on account of said loss against the railroad company, reserving all rights in excess of the $1,050.

The petition, which is in the name of the insurance company, sets forth the foregoing facts and asks a judgment against the railroad company for the $1,050. The defendant demurs because the cause of action is not assignable either by operation of law or by act of the parties, and because the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain an action in its own name.

Lucien Eaton, for the plaintiff; James Carr, for the defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge—The property destroyed exceeded in value the amount insured, and the rule of law has been long settled that the insurance company, on the payment of the loss, can not sue the wrong doer who occasioned it in its own name. The suit, though for the use of the insurer, must be in the name of the person whose property was destroyed. The wrongful act was single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability. If one insurer may sue, then if there are a dozen each may sue, and if the aggregate amount of all the policies falls short of the actual loss, the owner could sue for the balance. This is not permitted, and so it was held nearly a hundred years ago in a case whose authority has been recognized ever since, both in Great Britain and in this country. London Assurance Co. v. Sainsbury, 3 Doug. 245, 1783, in which the Exchequer Chamber unanimously affirmed the judgment of the K. B. for the defendant; Rockingham, etc., Ins. Co. v. Bosher, 39 Maine, 253, and cases cited; Hart v. Western Railroad Corporation, 13 Metc. 99, where the subject is fully gone into by Chief Justice SHAW: Conn., etc., Ins. Co. v. N. Y., etc., R. R. Co., 25 Conn. 265, 278; Peoria, etc., Insurance Company v. Frost, 37 Ills, 333. Flanders on Ins. pp. 360, 481, 591. But it is insisted that the provision of the Missouri statute, that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, though it declares that the provision shall not authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of contract (Gen. Stats. 1865, p. 651, sec. 2.), changes the rule. However it might be if the amount paid by the insurer to the assured had equalled or exceeded the value of the property, and the assured had made a full assignment, it is plain that this case falls within all the reasons of the rule itself, as expounded by Buller and Mansfield in the case in Douglas above cited, and which is the foundation of the law on this subject. The demurrer to the petition is sustained.

JUDGMENT ACCORDINGLY.

Leave was given the plaintiff to amend and make Balcom plaintiff on the record, but as the latter, as well as the defendant, was a citizen of Missouri, no amendment, so as to give the court jurisdiction, was practicable, and the plaintiff submitted to a non-suit Negligence—Servants of Corporation—Evidence.

CAROLINE T. PARKER v. BOSTON & HINGHAM STEAMBOAT COMPANY.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

[Courtesy of Henry N. Sheldon, Esq., of Boston.]

The defendant corporation ran a line of passenger and freight boats as common carriers between Boston and Hingham. While one of their boats was loading at the wharf in Boston, the plaintiff, in passing over the gangway plank from the wharf to the boat, for the purpose of going to Hingham as a passenger, was thrown into the water and injured by the end of the plank slipping from the boat. This action was brought to recover for the alleged negligence in not having this plank properly secured and tended.

The plaintiff introduced evidence of the injuries which she claims to have suffered, and of their effect upon her nervous system. Susie Parker testified, against defendant's objection, that the plaintiff's health was decidedly worse at the time of the trial than it had been two months after the accident.

One Bradshaw testified for plaintiff that he went on board the boat over the same plank just before the plaintiff; that it was not resting as it should be; and that hands were taking in freight close to this plank. He was then allowed to state, against defendant's objection, that he called the attention of these hands to the plank.

One Hildreth testified that he went over the same plank before the plaintiff; that it was then from six to eight inches from falling off; that he went back and spoke to a man who was taking in baggage over the same plank; and he was then allowed, against defendant's objection, to state that he told this man there should be some one to see to this gangway plank, or some one would fall in.

There was no other evidence to show who these men or "hands" were, or whether they were in the employ of defendants; but defendants called the captain of the vessel, and there was no express denial at the trial tha the men who took on board freight and baggage were employed by defendants. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the defendants alleged exceptions.

L. M. Child, for defendants.

The opinion of Susie Parker as to plaintiff's comparative health at different times was inadmissible. Ashland v. Marlborough, 99 Mass. 47. Testimony of what was said and done by or to men at work near the gangway should not have been received. It did not appear that the work was done for defendants or at their request. Fisk v. Chester, 8 Gray, 506; Everest v. Wood, 1 Car. & P. 75. These men may have been expressmen carrying on board their own freight. On the evidence they were mere volunteers. Nor can the plaintiff's failure to prove her case be supplied by the fact that defendants gave in evidence no denial that these men were their servants. A non-denial can be used only to support some direct evidence of an affirmative. Commonwealth v. Hardiman, 9 Gray, 136.

Tolman Willey, for plaintiff, argued that the statement of Susie Parker was not of an opinion, but of a fact within her own knowledge, and that notice of the dangerous condition of the plank to the "hands" was admissible.

The court held that there had been no error at the trial, and ordered judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff.

Digitized by Google

United States Supreme Court—Recent Decisions.

Life Insurance—Willful Exposure—Death while Horse-racing.—Travelers' Insurance Company v. Seaver. Error to Circuit Court for Vermont. The main questions in this case were whether the court below erred in instructing the jury that the driving of a race, when regarded as an exposure of the life of the insured to unnecessary peril, was to be considered in the light in which fair-minded people of the community looked upon it, and if, under the ordinary regulations of such matches such fair minded people would not regard the driving of the match as within the provisions of a life policy against such exposure, then the representatives of the insured, who was killed while so driving, could recover; and whether it was error for the court to instruct the jury that, if the insured was killed by the reckless driving of his competitor, and not by the ordinary mischance of the race, then there should be a recovery. It is held that the court erred in both instances; that the question of willful exposure was for the jury, after all the facts were before them, and that, if the intentions of the competitor of the insured were as bad as the charge of the court implied, and the reckless driving was for the purpose of winning the race at all hazards, still the fact did not take the case out of the clause of the policy against willful exposure. It was against just such danger the company had intended to protect itself. Reversed. Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Bills of Exceptions—Incorporating Rule of Court—Measure of Damages for Infringement of Patent.—No 265. Washington and Alexandria Steam Packet Company v. Sickels. Error to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. This was an action by Sickels to recover for the use of his cut-off for the saving of coal in operating steam engines. The judgment below was for the patentee, and the company, bringing the case here for review, obtained a reversal for errors, which will appear in the following statement of the substance of the opinion: The statute of limitations having been pleaded, the court say that while the right to plead it is no more within the discretion of the court than other pleas, when the refusal of the court to permit the plea to be filed is based on the allegation that it is not filed within the time prescribed by the rules of practice adopted in that court, it is necessary that the party excepting to the refusal shall incorporate the rule in his bill of exceptions, or this court will presume that the court below construed correctly its own rules. Such rules are indispensable to the dispatch of business and the orderly administration of justice, and it must be presumed that the court below is familiar with the construction and course of practice under them. On the merits it is said that the rule of damages in actions at law for infringement of the rights of patentees has long been established in this court to be the customary price at which the patentee has licensed the use of his invention, where a sufficient number of licenses or sales have been made to establish a market value. The reason for this rule is still stronger where the use of the patented invention has been, with the consent of the patentee, express or implied, without any rate of compensation fixed by the parties. (In this case the compensation was to be the value of three-fourths of the amount of fuel saved.) Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion.

Constitutional Law—Duty on Tonnage.—No. 248. Peete v. Morgan. Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Texas. In this case Morgan, a citizen of New York, running two lines of steamers between ports in Louisiana and ports in Texas, obtained a perpetual injunction to restrain the appellant, health officer of Galveston, from exacting of him certain tonnage duties laid upon his shipping to defray the expenses of quarantine regulations. The decree below is affirmed here, the court holding in substance that while the legislature may lay a tax in some proper form to maintain the quarantine system of the state, the present tax is outside the jurisdiction of the state to enforce, being a duty on tonnage. Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion.

Discharge in Bankruptcy—Debts Due the United States.—No. 252. United States v. Herron. Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana. In this case the government sued on the official bond of one Collins, Herron being a surety. The defence was a discharge under the bankrupt act. The court below sustained the plea, and the judgment was accordingly. The judgment is here reversed, the court holding that a discharge under the bankrupt act does not bar a debt due the United States. This conclusion is sustained by the uniform construction of similar legislation in this country and in England. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion.

Land Law—Spanish Grant.—No. 247. United States v. Heirs of Junerarity. Appeal from the Circuit Court for Louisiana. This was a reversal of a decree adjudging parties represented by the appellees entitled to certain land in Louisiana, under a Spanish patent issued to one Ramos, the court holding that the claim attempted to be set up by the petitions in the case can not be sustained. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Bill of Review by Creditor.—No. 257. First National Bank of Troy v. Cooper et al. Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York. The bill in this case was filed by the bank, a creditor of an insolvent corporation (the Troy Woolen Company), to review a decree of the district court confirming the report of a referee and allowing a claim of Cooper, Vail & Co. for $67,000. The circuit court decided that it could not review this decree at the instance of a creditor, and dismissed the bill. That decree is affirmed here, the court holding that the bank does not show any equity sufficient to justify the court in granting the relief sought. Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion.

Power of Attorney by Husband and Wife.—Holladay v. Daily. Error to the Supreme Court of Colorado Territory. In this case Ben Holladay and wife joined in executing a power of attorney to sell their real estate in a section of the Territory. The attorney sold, making the deed in the name of Holladay alone. Thereupon the latter repudiated the transaction and sought to hold the property. The court below sustained the sale, and that judgment is here affirmed, the court holding that a power of attorney to sell and convey real property given by a husband and his wife authorizes a conveyance by the attorney of the interest of the husband by a deed executed in his name alone. If, it is said, the wife in fact has no interest in the property, such individual deed passes the entire estate. Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion.

Memphis Paving Contracts.—In the case of The City of Memphis v. Brown et al., from the Tennessee Circuit Court, an appeal by the city to reverse a decree recovered against it by the appellees, upon contracts for paving its streets, this court affirms the decree except as to the item for damages for not creating a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds issued in pursuance of the contracts, the item for the services of attorney, and that for services in collecting bills for paving. As to these the decree is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter a decree in accordance with these views. Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion.

Decisions in Ninth Federal Circuit.

In the case of Lee v. Rogers, adm'r, &c., Circuit Judge SAWYER, of the Ninth Federal Circuit (whose opinion is reported in full in the Pacific Law Reporter, March 3, 1874), ruled the following points:

1. Paid Judgment—Sale.—A sale of lands under an execution issued upon a judgment which had been fully paid, is void.

2. Assignee of Paid Judgment.—W. had a judgment against C., which was the first lien on his property. T., also, had a judgment, which was the second lien on the property. C. paid W.'s judgment in full, but took an assignment of it in the name of his hired man, who paid nothing for it. Afterwards, to avoid an attachment, C. confessed a judgment in favor of L., for a debt previously due him, which became a lien upon the property, and, in order to give L. a preference over T., C. procured an assignment to him of W.'s judgment, for which no additional consideration was paid, but L. was not aware that it had been paid. C. afterwards confessed a judgment in favor of F., which also became a lien on the property. L. afterwards sold the lands on W.'s judgment and became the purchaser. Afterwards F. became the purchaser of the same lands under his own judgment. Held:

1. That as to F., L. was not a bona fide assignee of W.'s judgment for a valuable consideration, and that his sale was void.

2. That by his purchase F. acquired the title to the land.

3. Power of Attorney- Incidental Powers.—L. executed a power of attorney to H., authorizing him to collect his said judgments against C., by sales under execution, etc., to receive the money thereon, "arbitrate or compound" the same, and for that purpose to employ counsel. After the aforesaid sales F. brought an action against L. to annul the said sales and conveyances to L., as clouds on his, F.'s title. H. consulted counsel, who advised him that the said sales under W.'s judgment after payment, were void, and L.'s title invalid. Held, that as incident to the powers expressly given to collect said judgment, arbitrate and compound the same, in connection with subsequent instructions from L. by letter, H. had power to authorize counsel to appear in said action and consent to a judgment annulling said sales, upon terms that enabled him to realize the amount due to L. on his judgment.

4. Actions against Belligerents.—The existence of war does not prevent the citizens of one belligerent power from taking proceedings for the protection of their own property in their own courts, against the citizens of the other, whenever the latter can be reached by process.

In Nicklin, complainant, v. Wythe et al., defendants, before SAWYER and DEADY, JJ (Pacific Law Reporter, March 10, 1874), it appeared that G. conveyed lots 1 and 2, in the town of Salem, to W., and in consideration of such conveyance said W. and wife afterwards conveyed to said G. lands belonging to said wife, in exchange for said lots 1 and 2, and it was held that in the absence of evidence to show that the conveyance of lots 1 was 2 were made to W. with the assent of his wife, there was a resulting trust in her favor, and her subsequent vendees were entitled to a decree against the heirs of W. for a conveyance of the legal title.

Digitized by Google

Supreme Court of Missouri—Decisions at the March Term, 1874.

Continuance—Effect of the Answer as Evidence.—Thomas J. Bartholow et al. v. Thomas Campbell Eliza Hays and George W. Thurmond. This was an action on a promissory note made by the defendants, Campbell and Hays, in favor of the defendant Thurmond, and by him endorsed to the plaintiffs for value. The defendant Thurmond failed to answer. The other defendants filed separate answers, alleging that the note was procured from them through fraud for the accommodation of the defendant Thurmond. Mrs. Hays' answer differed from Campbell's in that it charged fraud against both Campbell and Thurmond. It was alleged that the plaintiffs had notice of this fraud before they discounted the note. Two questions arise, the first relating to the refusal of a continuance. The court—after stating the general rule that the continuance of causes by the trial court is generally very much in the sound discretion of the court; that every intendment in such cases should be in favor of the sound and proper exercise of this discretion; and that, unless it plainly appears from the record that this discretion has been unsoundly or oppressively exercised, the supreme court ought not to interfere—proceed to say: "The affidavit in this case shows that the absent witness resided in the city of St. Louis, where the trial was had; that she had been sick for ten days before the day of trial—confined to her room; that this fact was known to the defendant; that the defendant did not know until the last two or three days that the absent witness would not become able to attend the trial; that no witness in attendance, or whose presence could be procured in time, could prove the same facts expected to be proved by the absent witness. But it nowhere appears in the affidavit that there were not others who were not in attendance who could prove the same facts. On the contrary, it is plainly apparent from the affidavit that there were such other persons, and it does not appear that any effort had ever been made to procure any such evidence during the ten days after the witness named in the affidavit was known to be sick, or within the three days after which it was known to the defendant that the absent witness would not be able to appear at the trial. The defendant seems to have remained wholly inactive until the case was called for trial; and it is not negatived in the affidavit that the application was made for delay or vexation. The defendant is required to show some diligence in such cases. In the absence of diligence on the part of the defendant to avail herself of every means in her power to get ready for trial, this court will not be authorized to reverse the judgment on the ground that the court trying the cause has unsoundly exercised its discretion in the premises. (Cline v. Brainerd, 28 Mo. 341; Globe Mutual Ins. Co. v. Carson, 31 Mo. 218; State v. Murphy, 46 Mo. 430.)

"The second ground of error related to the ruling of the court below in excluding the answer of the defendant Campbell as evidence for the defendant Hays. It was claimed that as no replication had been filed by the plaintiff as to this answer, its truth was therefore admitted, and that the defendant, Mrs. Hays, who had filed a separate answer, might put Campbell's answer in evidence for herself. But the court held, expounding the statute which relates to the effect of the answer as evidence (2 Wagn. Stat. p. 1019, § 36), that although the answer, not being denied, was admitted by the plaintiff so as to make it evidence for Campbell, yet it was not therefore evidence for Mrs. Hays, and that there was no error in rejecting it when offered by her."

VORIES, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The other judges concurred, except SHERWOOD, J., who did not sit.

Supreme Court of Missouri—List of Cases Decided Monday.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, Monday morning, on convening, delivered a large batch of opinions, as follows, all the judges being present:

BY JUDGE ADAMS.

Wolf v. Walter; affirmed.
Bailey v. Rosenthal; affirmed.
Helmerichs v. Gehrke; affirmed.
Bennett v. Torlina; affirmed.
Chouteau et al. v. Rowse; affirmed.
O'Fallon v. Nicholson; affirmed.
O'Neill v. Capelle; affirmed.
Schasle's v. Woodburn Sarven Wheel Co.; affirmed.
Bloebgum v. Seatheny; affirmed.
Bobb v. Taylor; affirmed.
Woods, assignee, etc., v. Atlantic Insurance Co.; affirmed.
Norton v. Ittner et al.; affirmed.
Lackland v. Garesche, garnishee, etc.; affirmed.

BY JUDGE WAGNER.

Harney v. Sullens; affirmed.
Reid v. Piedmont and Arlington Insurance Co.; affirmed.
Tyler v. City of St. Louis; affirmed.
Haenschen v. O'Bannon; affirmed.
Ruff v. Doyle's administratrix; affirmed.
Kellogg v. Schnaake; reversed and remanded.
State ex rel. Cavender v. City of St. Louis; affirmed.
Carlin v. Cavender; judgment modified and affirmed.
Parker v. Scudder; affirmed.
Ricords v. Watkins; affirmed.
Estel & Co. v. St. Louis and S. E. R. R. Co.; affirmed.
Bishop v. O'Connell; affirmed.

BY JUDGE NAPTON.

Brink v. Collier; affirmed.
Claflin & Co. v. Hafkemeyer et al.; affirmed.
Price v. Roetzel, administratrix; reversed and remanded.
Williams v. Mellon; reversed and remanded.
Huth v. Carondelet Dock Co.; reversed and remanded.
LeBeau v. Armitage; reversed and remanded.
Market v. City of St. Louis; general term reversed and special term affirmed.
St. Vrain v. Columbia Bottom Levee Co.; reversed and remanded.
Thomas et al. v. Pullis et al.; affirmed.

BY JUDGE SHERWOOD.

Primm et al. v. Rabeteau; affirmed.
Seiners et al. v. Kleeburg et al.; reversed and remanded.
State use Clifford v. Beldsmeier; reversed and remanded.
Gillett v. Union National Bank; affirmed.
Kefferstein v. Knox; reversed.

BY JUDGE VORIES.

Wilson et al. v. Taylor; affirmed.
Cocker v. Cocker; affirmed.
Township Board of Education v. Heath; affirmed.
Doering v. Saun; affirmed.
Stagg v. Eureka Tanning Co.; reversed and remanded.
Daly v. Butchers and Drovers' Bank; reversed and remanded.
Gibson v. Coons; affirmed.
Edmondson v. Garnhart; affirmed.
Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors; affirmed.

The Arkansas Homestead Law.

Our correspondent at Little Rock, Frank M. Parsons, Esq., sends us the following note of the exposition placed upon the homestead law of Arkansas by the Supreme Court of that state, in the case of Norris et al. v. Kidd. They decide that, under their constitution and homestead law, a homestead is a mere possessory right—a particular estate carved out of the fee by constitutional provision. It is a personal privilege conferred by the constitution of the state upon a resident, which he may insist upon or waive at his option. It must be selected by the owner in the manner provided by the act of March 28, 1871, and in no other way can a sale upon execution be prevented. Mere occupancy is not sufficient to constitute property a homestead; but after the selection has been properly made, occupancy is necessary to give it the character of a homestead. The homestead may be selected at any time before actual sale. Any house or town lot (or tract of land, not exceeding 160 acres, owned by a judgment debtor, may be selected by him as a homestead, whether he resided upon it at the time of the rendition of the judgment or not. The entire building need not be used as a residence. It is enough if the owner and his family actually occupy some part of the house as a residence. A failure to select in the manner provided by the act of March 28, 1871, before sale, is a waiver of the homestead right, and it can not after that be set up in defence in ejectment. The selection of a homestead does not prevent the lien of a judgment from attaching; it merely suspends the sale of the property; the lien attaches to the reversion or remainder.

Digitized by Google

Our correspondent adds, by way of a note, that it would seem that the execution might be enforced by the sale of this remainder, subject to the debtor's "possessory right," and that this could be done by an assignee in bankruptcy, but that view is not considered in the opinion.

Judge BENNETT dissented as to the manner of reaching these conclusions.

Taking Private Property for Public Use—Damages, when Fixed.

Our Boston correspondent, Henry N. Sheldon, Esq., sends the following note of a recent decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in the case of William L. Bent v. The Merchants' Ins. Co.:

This is a petition for the assessment of the value of the estate of the defendants, taken by the United States for the extension of the post-office under the provisions of that act. The receivers of the Merchants' Insurance Company are the general owners of the estate; Charles L Haley is the lessee, and Avery & Harris are sub-lessees under Haley. At the trial in the superior court with a jury, it was contended on behalf of the United States, that the time at which the value of the land should be estimated was the date of the petition. But the court ruled that it should be estimated as at the time of the verdict and trial. The petitioners excepted to this, among other rulings of the presiding judge. The supreme court has now sustained the exceptions, set aside the verdict and ordered a new trial. The rescript is as follows:

1. The value of the land should have been estimated as of the date of the petition. The jury having been instructed otherwise, the exception of the petitioner must be sustained on this point.

2. The sum of the damages of the owners of all the interests in the land taken, can not exceed the value of the whole land. And such is a fair construction of the instructions to the jury.

Obiter Dicta.

The Albany Law Journal has hit upon a happy name for its funny column. It calls it obiter dicta. The following are specimens:

The Law Journal (London), speaking of the close of the Tichborne case, says: If the learned counsel engaged in the case had thrown up their wigs and proffered each other a back at a game of leap-frog in Westminster Hall, no one who knows what they have suffered would have found fault with their somewhat undignified expressions of joy.

A Nevada judge, after the jury had been empannelled and counsel ready to proceed, pulled out a revolver and judiciously remarked: "If any man goes frollicking around the court-room during the trial of this case, I shall interrupt him in his career." The strictest decorum prevailed.

On the trial of a person charged with stealing ducks, the prisoner's counsel asked the farmer from whom they had been stolen, "how he knew" they were his ducks, and the farmer went on to describe their peculiarities. "Why," said the lawyer, "these ducks can't be such a rare breed; I have some very like them in my own yard." "Likely enough," replied the farmer, "they are not the only ducks I have had stolen lately."

One can hardly appreciate the "mixed emotions" with which the counsel in a certain important case listened to the following dialogue between the judge and the foreman of the jury, at the close of the judge's charge:

Judge—"Is there any point on which the jury would like further explanation?"

Foreman—"There are two terms of law that have been a good deal used during the trial, that I should like to know the meaning of—they are plaintiff and defendant."

The judge explained.

Notes and Queries.

The following letter was not written for publication, but we shall print it and take the consequences. We, however, omit our friend's name, notwithstanding there is nothing in his letter that need have made him feel so modest:

CAPE GIRARDEAU, Mo., April 12, 1874.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—In answer to some correspondent in the CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL of the 12th ult., you say that "professional opinion in St. Louis is somewhat divided as to the construction of the 5th section of the homestead act," and although you express no opinion as to the proper construction, I infer, from the authorities cited, that you are inclined to hold that it passes the fee. I have always so understood the law. The language, it seems, will admit of but one construction, although somewhat ambiguous. As to what the law was, your correspondent does not ask, and it is unnecessary to enquire.

It is granted that the legislature is not the recognized tribunal for the interpretation of acts passed by prior legislatures, but as they have the power to repeal, alter or amend, it is submitted that any amendment adopted by them subrogates—if I may use the term—the old to the new law, and fixes, upon the whole, the intention of the last legislature.

If this be true, it seems to me that there ought to be no further doubt as to whom the fee passes, for the general assembly of 1873, Gen'l Acts, p. 16, so amended the old law as to allow femes covert to file a claim to a homestead, even against the will of the baron, and any conveyance made by him of said estate, without being joined by her, is absolutely void—in contradistinction to the old rule that a husband may convey in fee, even if his wife does not join, subject, of course, to her dower.

If the general assembly intended by this act to give a mere life-estate, it seems to me that a very different wording would have been used.

I do not write this for publication, but simply to suggest what seems to me to be an additional reason in support of the theory that the widow ultimately takes the fee.

 We have received several queries from correspondents, which we shall attend to as soon as we get time.

Book Notices.

REPORTS OF CASES AT LAW AND IN EQUITY IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF IOWA. Edited by C. C. COLE, LL.D., Judge of the Supreme Court of Iowa, Professor in the Law Department of the Iowa University, Editor of Western Jurist, etc. Vol. 1. Des Moines, Iowa: Mills & Co. 1874. NEW EDITION.

The first 12 volumes of Iowa Reports were not stereotyped, and the plates of the remainder of the first 21 volumes were mostly destroyed by the great Chicago fire. In consequence of this, and of the very considerable general demand of late years for the Reports of the Iowa Supreme Court, it has lately been quite impossible to procure a full set of them at a moderate price. Hence the necessity for a new edition, and the publishers very wisely resolved to secure success to their enterprise by deserving it.

The Iowa Reports justly stand high in professional estimation. This has, we think, very largely resulted from the painstaking and thorough manner in which the judges discharge their duties. For the past 12 years the judges, imitating the example of the Supreme Court of the United States, have strictly followed the plan of examining and deciding every case in conference before it is assigned to a judge to prepare the opinion. It is known to us that many of the appellate courts in the country pursue the opposite course and assign the cases before they are settled by the judges. The bar of every state where this is done should protest against it. It is a prolific source of error and of ill-considered law.

The Iowa court has had the good fortune, also, to have three most excellent and capable reporters—Clarke, Withrow and Stiles.

The present series is unabridged, and the head-notes are entirely new, and have been prepared by Mr. Justice COLE himself. His name is a sufficient guaranty that his work has been well done. The present editor is part of the judicial history of the state. For the past eleven years he has been one of the judges of the court, and before that he was an extensive practitioner at the bar. This experience has peculiarly fitted him to undertake the editorial management of the new edition of the Reports, and gives to the head-notes and the copious foot-notes an especial value. To each case has been added a note referring to every subsequent Iowa case in which the case to which the note is appended has been cited. This is a new and valuable feature in this republication, and of itself will finally induce many persons to dispose of the first edition in order to procure the second.

We congratulate the distinguished editor upon the excellent and thorough manner in which his work upon this volume has been done, and we doubt not that the future volumes will keep up to the standard of the present one.

Digitized by Google

SOUTHERN LAW REVIEW for April. Nashville: Frank T. Reid & Co.

This number is fully up to its usual standard in point of variety and ability. Chancellor Cooper continues his paper on Modern Theories of Government. John C. Reed, Esq., of Lexington, Georgia, has a paper on Codification, which, however impracticable some of his views may seem, contains a great many excellent suggestions well made, and will amply repay a perusal. The Parkman Murder is graphically described by Chas. J. Swift, Esq., of Columbus, Georgia. Mr. Phelan of Memphis entertains us with a number of quaint extracts on Legal Presumptions. Mr. Hutchinson of Memphis furnishes a thoughtful article on Executions by Separate Creditors against the Joint Effects of the Partnership. The Privilege Tax is discussed by J. S. Wiltse, Esq., of Chattanooga. Mr. Daniel of Lynchburgh, Virginia, furnishes an article upon Exchange and Re-exchange and Damages upon Dishonored Negotiable Paper, which we presume is a chapter from his forthcoming work on Negotiable Paper. Not the least interesting part of the Review are its "Notes," among which we find the following foot-note, by Judge Cooley, taken from the last edition of Story on the Constitution.

We have now received three numbers of the WESTERN INSURANCE REVIEW, edited and published at St. Louis by H. L. Aldrich, Esq., and have perused each number with much pleasure and profit. To an insurance lawyer we should judge that it would be a great favorite. Its legal department, edited by H. E. Mills, Esq., of the St. Louis bar, gives in a condensed form a great many insurance decisions, fire and life, of various courts throughout the country, while important opinions are frequently published in full. From the typographical beauty of the Review, the richly tinted paper on which it is printed, and the great amount of advertising which it carries, we judge that the insurance business, by which we presume it is chiefly supported, must be in a highly prosperous condition.

Legal News and Notes.

—BENDER, the notorious Kansas murderer, has been caught for the fifth or sixth time. It is pretty certain now that they have got the right man. He emerged from the mountains near Salt Lake City.

—THE Brazilian Bishop of Olinda has been tried, convicted and sentenced by a civil court, the Supreme Tribunal of Justice, at Rio, upon a charge of "attempting to destroy an article of the constitution."

—A DISPATCH from London states that John Karslake has resigned the attorney generalship, in consequence of illness.

—THE Erie Railway company has given a consolidated mortgage of its road to the Farmers' and Merchants' Land and Savings company of New York, to secure the payment of $30,000,000. It is recorded in every county along the line of the road.

—Of the $75,000 appropriated by the legislature of New York to pay the counsel who prosecuted the Tammany Ring thieves, Mr. Peckham, son of the late Judge PECKHAM, of the court of appeals, gets the principal share, and Charles O'Conor declares that he has earned all he gets.

—THE following colloquy occurred in an English divorce case: Mr. Sergeant Tindal—"He treated her very kindly, did he not?" Atkinson—"Oh, yes, very; he kissed her several times." Mr. Sergeant Tindal—"And how did she treat him?" Atkinson—"Well, she retaliated."

—THE legislature of Mississippi, at its recent session, passed an excellent temperance law. It embraces the principles of the so-called "local option" incorporated in the laws on this subject which have been enacted in the several states of the Northwest. These laws provide for the license or refusing to license retail traffic in intoxicating liquors in any township or incorporated city, accordingly as a majority of the legal voters may decide. The Mississippi statute requires the signature of a majority of men over twenty-one years of age, and of women over eighteen years of age, in any locality, to a petition asking for a license before it can issue.

—THE learned editor of the Bench and Bar Review writes us as follows: "I received your JOURNAL, and am very greatly obliged for your kind notice. The criticism, however, requires that I should set you right, being somewhat premature. When we were looking about for a name for the 'Review,' we struck upon 'Bench and Bar' as one likely to answer in all particulars. Afterwards, but before we issued it, we were made aware of the existence of the Chicago periodical. We then wrote to Callaghan & Co., and received the reply that they had discontinued its publication.

"Very truly, A. SCHAUMBERG."

—AN amusing incident is related of a woman in England, whose husband, a wealthy man, died suddenly without leaving any will. The widow, desirous of securing the whole property, concealed her husband's death and persuaded a poor shoemaker to take his place while a will could be made. Accordingly he was closely muffled in bed as if very sick, and a lawyer was called to write the will. The shoemaker in a feeble voice bequeathed half of all the property to the widow. "What shall be done with the remainder?" asked the lawyer. "The remainder," replied he, "I give and bequeath to the poor little shoemaker across the street, who has always been a good neighbor and a deserving man." The widow was thunder-struck with the man's audacious cunning, but did not dare expose the fraud, and so two rogues shared the estate.

—QUITE a stir was created in the court of claims the other day in consequence of the application of Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood for admittance as an attorney of that court. After considerable debate, in which the lady acquitted herself creditably, Chief Justice DRAKE took the matter under advisement, and was still advising upon it at last accounts. The difficulty in the way of her admission is two-fold. First, the rules of the court require that a person to be admitted must be a man of good moral character, etc. Secondly, Mrs. Lockwood has a husband, and consequently is "dead in law." It is stated, however, that she is in good standing and practice before the other courts of the district, and if denied admission by the court of claims it is said her friends will appeal to congress for the passage of a declaratory act to the effect that the law is not designed to authorize the exclusion, on account of sex, of any practicing attorney in good standing.

—OUR sanctum was honored on Tuesday with a call from Mrs. Myra Bradwell, editor of the Chicago Legal News. We had always regarded Mrs. Bradwell as one of the most remarkable of American women; but had hardly expected to meet a lady that converses with the same graceful ease and precision which characterize her written compositions. Her paper is probably as extensively read and with as much profit to the profession as any legal publication in the United States. We know this is saying much, when we consider the success which has attended the brilliant Albany Law Journal and the staid old Legal Intelligencer of Philadelphia; but from the reports of our agents and canvassers, we do not doubt that it is true. As an instance of Mrs. Bradwell's ability to overcome difficulties, we may note that her establishment was so completely burned out in the great Chicago fire, that nothing but a prayer-book was saved. Nevertheless, the News appeared on its next publication day as usual, and since then a new printing office has been purchased and its prosperity has been greater than ever. This is the more remarkable when we consider that although the Legal News establishment was well insured, only three per cent. of the insurance money was paid.

—THE judgment in the case of Fox v. Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, recently rendered in a Philadelphia court, is causing no little comment, both in the insurance and secular press. Lee, the party whose life was insured for the benefit of Fox, represented himself as a man of temperate habits when the reverse was the case, as he died within a year after the policy was issued, of disease superinduced by excessive drinking. Soon after the policy was written the officers of the insurance company were apprised of the fraud practiced on them, cancelled the policy and offered to return the premium received, which offer was refused by the beneficiary, and the suit was brought soon after the death of Lee.

It seems to us that the true course for the company to have pursued as soon as the fraud was discovered, was to have brought a suit in equity to set aside the contract on the ground of fraud. As this would have been a purely legal question, a sympathetic jury could not have outraged the plainest principles of justice. Does not good policy require of the managers of life companies, as soon as an attempted fraud is discovered, to take immediate measures to annul the policy? Better by far fight the living swindlers than their legal representatives, who are often innocent parties.—Western Insurance Review.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. }
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. } ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, APRIL 30, 1874. { SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

We print elsewhere an interesting opinion of the Supreme Court of Colorado, determining that the mere fact that a special election called on petition of some of the citizens of a county has resulted in authorizing the county commissioners to issue the bonds of the county to a railroad, will not entitle the railroad company to a mandamus to compel the county commissioners to issue the bonds. It is to be inferred from the opinion that the rule might be otherwise if the election were ordered [in pursuance of a petition of the railroad company, but this question is, of course, not determined.

The Pueblo Chieftain in publishing this opinion pays a merited compliment to G. Q. Richmond, Esq., of that city, who at the request of the chairman of the board of county commissioners prepared some time previously a written opinion, with which the opinion we publish fully corresponds. Mr. Richmond is a young lawyer, but unless a brief acquaintance has greatly deceived us as to his qualities, the country will hear of him hereafter.

THE Supreme Court of South Carolina has recently decided, in the case of Whaley v. Bank of Charleston, that a bank doing business before and during the war (and which has resumed business since) is liable to a customer for the value of deposits in gold made before the war, notwithstanding the fact that the bank gave notice that all credits would be given and payable in currency (confederate) after September 6, 1861, and that plaintiff's testator continued to do business with the bank after that date and with knowledge of the notice. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice MOSES, with whom WRIGHT, J., concurred. WILLIARD, J., dissented, on the ground, as we understand it, that whereas the first balance that was struck after the notice exhibited the same amount to the credit of the plaintiff's tesrator as the last balance which was struck before the notice, an acquiescence on his part was manifested in the resolution of the bank to treat it as a currency balance. This decision opens, so far as South Carolina is concerned, another vexatious question growing out of the war.

Our correspondent who sends us this opinion states that "it is a little singular that the chief justice who wrote the opinion of the court was during the war a prominent secessionist, though now a republican, and that the judge who wrote the dissenting opinion is a Northern man who was always a republican, and who came first to South Carolina in the union army. The judge who concurred with the chief justice is a colored man."

WE desire to call the attention of insurance lawyers and underwriters to the opinion of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, elsewhere published in this issue, in the case of The People's Insurance Company v. Kuhn. The judge who delivered the opinion has obtained considerable reputation as a jurist during the comparatively short time he has been upon the supreme bench of Tennessee. The syllabus and foot-note were prepared by Hon. JAMES O. PIERCE, formerly judge of the Law Court of Memphis, and now a practitioner at the bar of that city. Judge PIERCE's note is marked by that care and fine discrimination which characterizes everything its author writes. It may perhaps strike some readers as leaning somewhat towards the underwriters' side of the question which it discusses, but we do not think it fairly open to this criticism. In the matter of entering into contracts of insurance there is no species of "moral duress" such as characterizes many engagements made with common carriers, where the shipper is obliged to send his goods over a particular line. On the contrary, the insurance business is marked by a degree of competition which is excelled by no other business of the same magnitude. There appears, therefore, to be no reason, founded in public policy or in the principles of private right, why insurance contracts should be subjected to those severe rules of interpretation as against the obligor which the courts are obliged to apply to contracts made with common carriers. But, rather, it would seem true that common sense and the principles of an unbending morality require that contracts of insurance should be subjected to the same rules of interpretation, both as regards their written and printed conditions, which are applied to other private contracts; and this we understand to be the principle enforced and applied in the opinion and note which we elsewhere print.

Negligence of Municipal Corporation in Suffering Street to be out of Repair—Rule as to Notice.

In the case of Market v. The City of St. Louis, decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri on the 20th instant, the court held that where a street in the city of St. Louis had been out of repair for the space of two months, no express notice to the city authorities was necessary in order to charge the city with liability for an injury happening in consequence of such defect. The court (NAPTON, J.) say: "Of course, where a street is out of repair from a casual rain-storm, or any other sudden or unforeseen violence, the city can not be held responsible for accidents occasioned by such sudden occurrences until the authorities have had a reasonable time to make the necessary repairs. But if a reasonable time has elapsed, as was the case here, where the defect continued for two months, no express notice is necessary." Further on the court say: "We do not think any notice is necessary where there has been a standing nuisance in a public street for two months." The rule thus laid down follows that in Requa v. City of Rochester, 45 N. Y. 129, 136, and Reid v. Northfield, 13 Pick. 94. In the former case it is said that the city is liable "if, after the wilful act of one not in its employment has made a place of danger in its highway, a lapse of time had run long enough, in the sound judgment of a tribunal, for it to have learned of the danger and to have removed it." In Reed v. Northfield, 13 Pick. 94, 98, it is said that "notice to the town of a defect in the highway may be inferred from its notoriety, and from its continuance for such a length of time as to lead to the presumption that the proper officers of the town did in fact know, or, with proper vigilance and care might have known, the fact." In Mayor v. Sheffield, 4 Wall. 189, the authorities of New York city, in converting a portion of a park into a street, had cut down a tree and left the stump standing from six to eight inches above the surface, and from fourteen to eighteen inches inside the curbstone on the sidewalk. This was done in 1847, and the stump thus left by the city authorities, who had cut down the tree, remained in this condition until the plaintiff was injured upon it in 1857. These facts were uncontradicted, and the court (Mr. Justice MILLER) said that "stronger proof of notice could not be given."

Digitized by Google

In the Missouri case, supra, the circuit judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover unless the defendant had notice of the unsafe condition of the gutter and neglected to repair it within a reasonable time thereafter. The jury found for the plaintiff, but the verdict was set aside at general term, on the ground that it was against this instruction. The supreme court, however, reversed the general term and sustained the verdict on the ground that the instructions were more favorable to the defendant than the law justified.

Negligence—Proximate and Remote Damage.

One of the most interesting cases on the law of negligence which has been determined for some time is the Metallic Compression Casting Company v. Fitchburg Railroad Company, decided by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and to appear in volume 109 of the Massachusetts Reports. It will be found in the American Law Times Reports (N. S.) vol. 1, p. 135.

On the 24th of January, 1870, a little before midnight, the plaintiff's manufacturing establishment was discovered to be on fire. The buildings were situated in Somerville, about fifty feet south of the track of the Fitchburg railroad. Two fire engines were brought upon the ground, belonging to the Somerville fire department, and one from Cambridge. Not being able to procure a supply of water otherwise, they laid the hose across the railroad track, under the direction of the chief engineer of the Cambridge fire department, and obtained a supply from a hydrant on the north side of the track. The water was, by means of the hose, applied to the fire and diminished it, and would probably have extinguished it in a short time but for the acts of the defendants. At that time a freight train came along from the west, and though its managers had sufficient notice and warning, and might have stopped and had no occasion for haste, they paid no attention to the hose, but carelessly passed over it with their train and thereby severed it and stopped the water. They injured the hose so much that it could not be seasonably repaired, and thereby the plaintiff's buildings were consumed. They did not delay to give time for uncoupling the hose, which would have delayed them but a few minutes. The railroad was crossed by another at a grade a few hundred feet before the place where the hose was severed, and the train was not stopped before the crossing, as required by the Gen. Stats. c. 63, § 93.

The owners of the buildings bring this action to recover damages against the railroad corporation; and upon the foregoing facts the court hold: (1) that the violation of the statute did not affect the defendants' liability; (2) that the firemen had a right at common law to lay the hose across the railroad; (3) that it was immaterial that they were volunteers from another town; (4) that it was immaterial that the plaintiff did not own the hose; (5) that the severing of the hose was the proximate cause of the destruction of the building; and (6) that the defendants were liable for the negligence of their servants in severing the hose.

Upon the question that the injury was too remote to entitle the plaintiff to recover Mr. Chief Justice CHAPMAN, in pronouncing the judgment of the court, said: "The question of proximate cause is often involved in difficulty, by reason of the endless variety of circumstances in which injuries may occur; and the cases on the subject are very numerous. A case which much resembles the present is Atkinson v. Newcastle & Gateshead Waterworks Co., Law Reports, 6 Exch. 404. The plaintiffs' saw-mill and lumber-yard took fire; and in consequence of the defendants' neglect in respect to the head of water, the plaintiffs could not obtain a supply, and their property was burned. It was held that the defendant's were liable on the common-law principle stated in Comyn's Digest, Action on the Case, A: 'wherever a man has a temporal loss or damage by the wrong of another, he may have an action on the case to be repaired in damages.' The defendants contended that the damages were too remote, but the court held otherwise. KELLY, Ch. B., significantly asked, 'what kind of damage can be more a proximate consequence of the want of water than the destruction by fire of a house which a proper supply of water would have saved?' Baron BROMWELL remarked that it was the immediate consequence of the proximate cause. Couch v. Steel, 3 El. & Bl. 402, was cited as decisive of this principle." Among other cases illustrating the subject of direct consequences are Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892; Gilbertson v. Richardson, 5 C. B. 502; Lee v. Riley, 18 C. B. (N. S.) 722; Dickinson v. Boyle, 17 Pick. 78; Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co., 104 Mass. 64. Other cases are cited where the damages are held to be too remote, but they are unlike the present case. The law regards practical distinctions rather than those which are merely theoretical; and practically, when a man cuts off the hose through which the firemen are throwing a stream upon a burning building, and thereupon the building is consumed for want of water to extinguish it, his act is to be regarded as the direct and efficient cause of the injury."

The Right to Use or Destroy Private Property in Preventing the Spread of Fires.

It is difficult to conceive how an advocate could face a court of justice — especially such a court as the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts — and assert that, because a railroad company had obtained a legal title to the land occupied by its track, a fire company could not lawfully lay a hose across it for the purpose of extinguishing a fire. Yet this proposition was asserted in The Metallic Compression Casting Company v. Fitchburg Railroad Company, 1 Am. Law Times Reports (N. S.) 135; and the court was obliged to reiterate a principle which has been familiar to lawyers, at least, since the time of Lord COKE. In 12 Coke, 13, it was said, in illustrating a principle which was resolved by all the judges, that "for the commonwealth a man shall suffer damage; as, for saving of a city or town, a house shall be plucked down if the next be on fire; and the suburbs of a city, in time of war, for the common safety, shall be plucked down; and a thing for the commonwealth every man may do without being liable to an action." In British Cast Plate Manufacturers v. Meredith, 4 Term, 796, it is said, by BULLER, J., "there are many cases in which individuals sustain an injury for which the law gives no action; for instance, pulling down houses or raising bulwarks for the preservation and defence of the kingdom against the king's enemies. The civil-law writers indeed say that the individuals who suffer have a right to resort to the public for satisfaction; but no one ever thought that the common law gave an action against the individual who pulled down the house, etc. This is one of those cases to which the maxim applies, salus populi suprema lex." In The Mayor, etc., v. Lord, 18 Wend. 129, it is said by Chancellor WALWORTH that "the rule appears to be well settled that in a case of actual necessity, to prevent the spreading of a fire, the ravages of a pestilence, the advance of a hostile army, or any other public calamity, the private property of an individual may be lawfully taken or destroyed for the relief, protection or safety of the many, without subjecting those whose duty it is to protect the public interests, by whom or under whose direction such private property was taken or destroyed, to personal liability for the damage which the owner has thereby sustained." See, also, to the same general effect, Russell v. Mayor, etc., 2 Denio, 461; Hale v. Lawrence, 1 Zab. 714; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 1 Zab. 248; Lorocco v. Geary, 3 Cal. 69; Meeker v. Van Rensselaer, 15 Wend. 397; McDonald v. Redwing, 13 Minn. 38. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts had also said, in Taylor v. Inhabitants of Plymouth, 8 Metc. 465, that, "independently of the statute, the pulling down of a building in a city or compact town in time of fire, is justified upon the great doctrine of public safety, when it is necessary."

Digitized by Google

So much for the general principle. It remained, however, for a railroad company to assert that it was unlawful to lay a fireman's hose across its track to reach the only water which was accessible in order to save a large manufacturing establishment which was on fire. While in such emergencies the houses of private citizens may be torn down and blown up, and their property taken or destroyed as far as necessary, the convenience of a corporation must not be temporarily interrupted! The court, however, thought otherwise. Mr. Chief Justice CHAPMAN, after reiterating the general principle laid down in the foregoing cases, said:

"The elaborate provisions which our statutes have made for the extinguishment of fires, indicate the magnitude of the interest which the community has in preventing the spread of conflagrations, but these statutes do not supersede the common law. Their purpose is merely to enable the community to protect themselves more effectually than they could do otherwise. Thus the organization of a fire department with officers and implements does not deprive the people of a neighborhood from obtaining an engine and hose and crossing the neighboring lands to obtain water for stopping a conflagration, without waiting for an organization, and individuals may climb upon neighboring roofs to carry buckets of water. It is a sufficient justification that the circumstances made such an invasion of private property reasonable and proper in helping to extinguish the fire. The objection of the defendants that the officers of the fire department in Cambridge had no jurisdiction in Somerville, and could not act officially in that town, has no validity. They had a fire company organized, and an engine and hose, and were in the vicinity of the building, and they could not with propriety stand idly by and witness the spread of a fire which they might extinguish, merely because it was beyond the town line. They had a right, as citizens, to do what they reasonably could to prevent this public calamity, whether in their own city or a neighboring town."

The court, however, intimate that there may be a limit to this principle, but where that limit is to be drawn is a question for the jury. Thus, the chief justice said: "It is urged that upon this principle one person may enter upon the property of another for the purpose of extinguishing a fire in a small building of no importance, and where there is no danger to other buildings. Undoubtedly the principle is to have a reasonable limitation. He who enters upon the property of another takes upon himself the burden of establishing the fact that there was a just occasion for it, and in this case the plaintiffs must submit to the jury, with proper instructions, the question whether there was good cause for laying the hose across the defendant's track. All that the court can say is that there is sufficient evidence to submit to the jury."

Seizure of Books and Papers by Revenue Officers Decision by Judge Blatchford.

Judge BLATCHFORD, of the Federal District Court at New York city, has just rendered an important decision upon the constitutionality of laws authorizing the seizure of the books and papers of persons who are suspected of having committed frauds upon the revenue. The case is stated by the New York Herald as follows: "Three warrants issued by Judge BLATCHFORD in the United States District Court on the 14th of June, 1873, the 16th of June, 1873, and July 30, 1873, respectively. The books and papers of Platt & Boyd, glass importers of this city, were seized by custom-house officers on the allegation that Messrs. Platt & Boyd had committed fraud on the revenue by the undervaluation of goods. The defendants filed a petition praying for the restoration of their books and papers, and claimed through their counsel that the seizure in question was wholly illegal and not warranted by the law or the constitution. Full argument having been heard upon this point, the court took time to consider, and yesterday Judge BLATCHFORD redered a long but able opinion sustaining the constitutionality of the law under which the seizure in question was made, but holding that the books and papers must be immediately restored to the petitioners, as the government have had them long enough to examine and make such extracts from them as they desired."

In the course of the opinion, after showing that the constitutionality of laws authorizing the seizure of goods by custom-house officials has never been questioned, Judge BLATCHFORD goes on to say: "If imported goods may be searched for and seized because alleged to have been imported or entered in fraud of the revenue, it is difficult to see why books and papers, which relate to the goods in respect to which such fraud is alleged to have been committed, may not be searched for and seized and examined. Of course, what is to be searched for and seized is books and papers, which not only relate to the goods, but will show the fraud. The fourth amendment to the constitution is directed against a search for and seizure of 'effects' as fully as it is against a search for and seizure of 'papers,' and is no more fully directed against a search for and seizure of 'papers' than it is against a search for and seizure of 'effects.' Under the fifth amendment merchandise is as fully 'property' as books and papers are, and books and papers are no more fully 'property' than merchandise is. Books and papers appertaining to and evidencing frauds on the revenue, in respect to imported goods, can not be said to be unreasonably searched for and seized, in the abstract, if a search for and a seizure of the goods themselves be not, in the abstract, unreasonable; and if a seizure of goods imported in fraud of the revenue does not, in the abstract, deprive a person of the property without due process of law, a seizure of books and papers appertaining to and evidencing such fraud can not be said, in the abstract, to deprive a person without due process of law of his property in the books and papers."

Digitized by Google

But while he affirms the validity of the laws themselves, he indicates distinctly that the power conferred by them may be exercised oppressively, in a manner not warranted by the statutes themselves and in derogation of the immunities secured by the constitution. He says:

"A search and seizure may be unreasonably conducted in execution under the statute authorizing it, and thus the right of security sought to be protected by the fourth amendment may be violated, and, under what is due process of law as authorized by the statute, a person may be deprived of his property when the statute did not contemplate or authorize such deprivation, and thus the fifth amendment may be violated. But these things are not the fault of the statute as it stands. They grow out of the fact that the statute is administered in the particular case in a manner not authorized by the statute. They are violative alike of the statute and of the constitution, but they have no effect to make the statute unconstitutional."

The Herald summarizes the concluding portions of the opinion as follows:

"After adverting at considerable length to the statutes, the decision goes on to maintain that the various statutes referred to have been held to be constitutional; that no good objection has been raised against the warrants issued for the seizure of the books and papers of the petitioners, and the judge refuses to grant the motion to vacate the warrants. Then, turning to the question whether the books and papers have been retained long enough, the judge decides that it must be assumed that the books and papers have been adequately examined, or if they had not, abundant time has elapsed for examining them for the taking of such copies and extracts as relate to the fraud alleged in the warrants. The judge goes on to show that the law under which this seizure was made—the law of 1867—provides for sending the warrant to the marshal, who was responsible to the court which took the responsibility of issuing the warrant on affidavit properly sworn to, while a previous law on the same subject—the law of 1863—sent the warrant for execution to the collector, who seized the books and held them subject to the order of the solicitor of the treasury. Nothing (adds the judge) is shown on which I can base a satisfactory opinion that any further detention of the books and papers is either proper or necessary. The decision closes by stating that an order directed to the marshal shall be issued, directing him to return the books and papers, and that the petitioners are entitled to receive them immediately."

—ONE of Judge FORD'S instructions in the Humbolt (Iowa) county court was like this: "Sheriff, extinguish the lighted cigars, put out the pipes, hoist the windows and let the wind blow this fog of smoke away, that we may see what we are doing."

Fire Insurance Policies — Waiver of Printed Conditions—Insurance on Family Grocery Store, with Printed Condition against Vending Spirituous Liquors, etc.

THE PEOPLE'S INSURANCE CO. v. WILLIAM KUHN.

Supreme Court of Tennessee, Special November Term, 1873.

Hon. A. O. P. NICHOLSON, Chief Justice.
" P. TURNEY,
" ROBERT MCFARLAND,
" JAMES W. DEADERICK,
" JOHN L. T. SNEED,
" THOMAS J. FREEMAN, } Judges.

1. Fire Insurance—Contract.—Both parties to an insurance contract are bound by it, according to its fair, just and reasonable meaning.

2. ——. ——. Condition of Policy—Waiver.—Condition sustained, providing that "the use of general terms, or anything less than a distinct, specific agreement, clearly expressed, and endorsed on this policy, shall not be construed as a waiver of any printed or written condition or restriction thereon."

3. ——. ——. ——. ——. In a policy with such a condition, the use of the written words "family groceries," or "meat and family grocery store," is not a waiver of a printed condition prohibiting the use of the premises for "storing, using or vending" spiritous liquors or kerosene oil.

4. ——. ——. ——. Retailing Liquors.—A printed condition prohibiting the use of the premises as above stated is violated by retailing liquors and oil on the premises as a business.

5. ——. ——. ——. If in such case it be proved that the insured retailed liquors and oil as a part of the business of keeping a "meat and family grocery store" (though not the principal part of such business), this will avoid the policy unless it contains an especial agreement in writing that such articles may be kept and sold. Aliter, if such retailing were only accidental or immaterial.

6. ——. ——. Proof of Custom.—Proof in such a case that the retailing of liquors and oil is a usual and customary part of the grocery business, can not avail to change the contract and bind the underwriter.

MCFARLAND, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action upon an insurance policy against loss by fire, "upon a stock of family groceries and meat store." The plaintiff having recovered, the company appealed in error. This contract contains a large number of conditions and restrictions; as usual, these were contained in a printed form of great length. It has been sometimes remarked by courts that these printed conditions escape the notice of the insured, and sometimes "define away" all or nearly all of the substantial part of the contract itself; and for this reason, in cases where there appears to be a conflict between the printed form and the written parts of the policy, the latter have been held a waiver of the former. But the parties may certainly make their contracts, and by the contract, according to its fair and reasonable meaning, they must be bound. One of the conditions of the policy, being part of the printed form, is as follows: "If during this insurance the above mentioned premises (the premises containing the stock of groceries) shall be used for any trade, business or vocation, or for storing, using or vending therein any of the articles, goods or merchandise denominated hazardous or extra hazardous or specially hazardous in the second class of hazards on the back of this policy * * * except as herein specially agreed to in writing upon this policy, then and from thenceforth, so long as the same shall be so appropriated, applied or used, this policy shall cease and be of no effect."

Among the articles so classed on the back of the policy are kerosene or petroleum, liquors, matches, &c., and the business of retailing liquors. These articles were kept by the plaintiff, as the proof shows, and the proof shows that he retailed liquors without a license. By the express provisions of the policy above quoted, to keep these articles avoided the policy, unless the policy contained an especial agreement in writing that these articles might be kept. The question is, does the policy contain such agreement in writing? The circuit judge held, in substance, that that part of the policy as follows, "On his stock of family groceries contained in the two-story framed building occupied below by assured as a meat and family grocery store," &c., being in writing, would amount to an express consent that these articles might be kept, provided these articles are usually kept in a family grocery store; that the use of these general words, "meat and family grocery store," would be an express consent that the insured might keep all articles usually kept in such a store.

Digitized by Google

Upon this question there is a conflict in the authorities. The Massachusetts cases are by the counsel admitted to be against this proposition. Flanders, in his work on Fire Insurance, cites numerous cases sustaining the ruling of the circuit judge. See p. 309. The question of doubt is whether the general terms used, "family grocery store or meat store," &c., shall be held to amount to the express written consent required.

But this policy contains a provision evidently intended to meet this question, and one that does not seem to have been contained in the cases upon which the text in Flanders is founded. That provision is as follows: "The use of general terms, or anything less than a distinct, specific agreement clearly expressed and endorsed on this policy shall not be construed as a waiver of any printed or written condition or restriction thereon." This, we think, leaves but little room for argument, and we are constrained to hold under this that the general terms in the beginning of the policy, "family groceries," or "meat and family grocery store," are not a waiver of the restrictions against keeping kerosene, liquors, &c., marked "extra hazardous."

The cases referred to in 22 New York, 441; 17 New York, 194, and 6 Wendell, 623, have been examined, but do not meet this objection. The cases where the written portions of the contract have been held to overrule the printed portions are only where they are in conflict and can not be reconciled. Flanders on Insurance, pp. 72, 212, 216.

The circuit judge held that the company should have known what is usually kept in a family grocery store, and if they did not intend the general terms above quoted to be a permission to keep all such articles, then they should have so stated in unmistakable terms, and this they had not done. As we have said, we think this an erroneous construction of the contract. The charge also uses language which was calculated to mislead the jury, by assuming that the prohibited articles mentioned were usually kept in a family grocery store. This, in any event, was a matter of proof before the jury.

Again, in the manner before stated, the policy contains a restriction against the building being used as a retail liquor store. The judge instructed the jury that if the insured converted his store into a tippling shop as his principal business, this would avoid the policy; but if he occupied the house as a meat and grocery store as his principal branches of business, and that as incidental to these he occasionally or frequently sold whisky by the glass or otherwise, but not as his principal business, this would not avoid the policy. We think this rather a latitudinous construction of the contract. We would not hold the policy avoided by some immaterial or accidental violation of this restriction. The law has regard for a substantial compliance with contracts.

But as we have construed this contract, it is a prohibition against the use of the building as a retail liquor store. According to the construction given, the house might have been used for retailing liquors, as the proof indicates that it was, provided Kuhn made his other business in the meat and family grocery line so far excel in amount as to make the latter his principal business. We think this language too strong, and that it is erroneous. The charge should have been that the house could not be used for the trade, business or vocation of retailing liquors.

We suppose insurance companies are compelled, in order to guard against frauds, to resort to these carefully-prepared conditions and restrictions. At all events, they are entitled to stand upon their contract, according to its fair and just interpretation.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed and a new trial awarded.

REVERSED.

NOTE.—This case bids fair to become a leading one upon the branch of insurance law therein treated, in view of the new features of the policy therein exhibited.

I. The policy in this case is different from those construed in previous cases, not only by the condition relating to "the use of general terms," &c., but also by the provision against using the premises "for storing, using or vending" any of the prohibited articles. This distinction appears to have escaped the attention of the able and careful judge who prepared the opinion. In all of the cases cited by him, viz: 6 Wend. 17 N. Y., and 22 N. Y., the condition was against "storing" or "keeping" only, and this feature distinguished all that large number of cases based on 6 Wend. as a leading case, which hold that such a condition does not by implication prohibit vending. All this line of adjudication may now become obsolete should underwriters generally amend their policies by inserting this revised condition expressly prohibiting "vending." Many insurers are already doing this. It does not appear, however, that a policy thus worded has ever before received judicial construction. In the late cases in 12 Wall. 404 (1870), 34 Mo. 227 (1870), and 47 N. Y. 597 (1872), the condition, like that in older cases, applied to "storing" alone. Probably the principal case is the first one reported in which the policy contained this express prohibition against "vending." This fact alone plainly distinguishes the case from preceding ones, and, when considered in connection with the proof in the case as to the habitual sale of liquors, furnishes additional and sufficient reasons for sustaining the condition under the same principles of law that govern the older cases.

II. A provision against "storing" liquors is not violated by keeping them for retail and retailing them in a family grocery (Equitable Ins. Co. v. Langdon, 6 Wend. 623), nor by keeping them for the use of a family and boarders in a boarding-house (Rafferty v. Ins. Co. 3 Harr. N. J. 80); even when such retailing be unlawful, provided the fire be not occasioned by such unlawful act. Ib. To the same effect as to other articles are Phenix Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 5 Minn. 492; Mayor v. Hamilton Ins. Co., 10 Bosworth, 537; Moore v. Protection Ins. Co., 29 Me. 97, and many cases cited in May on Insurance, 261, 262; and 1 Benn. Ins. Cases, 353.

This ruling is in view of the fact that the storage in these cases is not a principal business, in truth not strictly a business at all, but is a mere incident to the usual and ordinary business of selling or retailing, which is not prohibited by the terms of the policy in any of the said cases. But when, as in the present case, "vending" as well as "storing" is under an express prohibition, it is correctly characterized as erroneous to assume at nisi prius that consent to keep a meat and family grocery store could sanction the habitual sale of liquors, even if that were shown by proof to be common in such a store. Such an assumption would amount to a denial to underwriters of the right to make their own contracts.

It is said, on the authority of Mr. Flanders, that there are "numerous cases sustaining the ruling of the circuit judge" on this point, and that there is conflict in the authorities, the Massachusetts cases (inferentially) being alone and in the minority. On examination of the cases cited by the usually careful Mr. Flanders on the point of the repugnancy between the written and printed portions of the contract (p. 311), shows that the conflict is not so extensive as might be supposed, and that many of the cases cited by him as sustaining written endorsements as against printed conditions, do not go to that length. The cases in 6 Wend., 3 Harr., 19 N. Y., 22 N. Y. and 29 Me., expressly pretermit the question of repugnancy, and hold that storing of the articles named, which was merely incidental to the recognized business, was not prohibited. We repeat that the express prohibition of "vending" in the present case practically isolates it from all prior cases. It is, as to its facts, and the application to them of the law, a case sui generis.

III. The instruction to the jury that "if the insured converted his store into a tippling-shop as his principal business, this would avoid the policy," but if this were only incidental to his main business of selling meats and groceries, it would be otherwise, furnishes not only a "latitudinous construction of the contract," but also a confused and unstable standard of construction. Where several different principles of law may enter into and affect the determination of the same case, if they be not distinguished in their application, confusion results. It will be seen that the circuit judge assumed in this instruction that the policy contained a prohibition, to some degree at least, of the vending of liquors. It is true that an occasional or incidental storage or use of prohibited articles does not avoid the policy when its conditions are those before referred to; (May on Ins. § 241; Dobson v. Sotheby, 1 Mood. & M. 90; Hynds v. Schenectady Ins. Co., 11 N. Y. 554; Gates v. Madison Co. Ins. Co., 5 N. Y. 479, Leggett v. Ætna Ins. Co., 10 Rich. Law (S. C.), 202; Vogel v. People's Ins. Co., 9 Gray, 23; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 9); because the law has regard for a substantial, not a merely technical compliance with insurance contracts. Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Slaughter, 12 Wall. 404; Turley v. N. A. Ins. Co., 25 Wend. 374; May on Ins. § 173, 174; 11 N. Y. 554; 10 Rich. Law, 202; 3 Harr. (N. J.) 480; 53 Penn. 485; So. Life Ins. Co. v. Booker, Tennessee, April, 1872.

Digitized by Google

But it is also true, as a distinct principle, that where the policy recognizes the conducting on the premises of any certain business, this carries with it, by necessary implication which the law so often indulges, the right to sell, keep or use any article which is a necessary appurtenant to the conduct of that business; (May on Ins. § 239; Harper v. Albany Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 194; Bryant v. Poughkeepsie Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 200; Harper v. N. Y. Ins. Co., 22 N. Y. 441; Stanley v Western Ins. Co., 3 Law (Exchq.) R. 71; Delonguemare v. Tradesmen's Ins. Co., 2 Hall (N. J.) 588); and also to some extent all such articles as are usually and customarily an incident of such business. Eq. Ins. Co. v. Langdon, 6 Wend. 623; Brown v. Kings County Ins. Co., 31 How. (N. Y.) 508; Citizens' Ins. Co. v. McLaughlin, 53 Penn. 485; People's Ins. Co. v. Spencer, 53 Penn. 353; Pindar v. Kings County Ins. Co., 36 N. Y. 648. These points often present questions for the jury. Franklin Ins. Co. v. Updegraff, 7 Wright (Pa.) 350; 17 N. Y. 194; 22 N. Y. 442; 36 N. Y. 648.

In the present case the policy contains a clear restriction upon the vending of liquors, and its several clauses, taken together, give authority to the insured to carry on the business of a meat and grocery store, except the retailing of liquors. When the court has construed this contract, as is its duty, there can be no question to submit to the jury concerning the custom of grocers to retail liquors. The only proper question for the jury would be the fact of retailing liquors in the case at bar. The only question for the court would seem to be the right and capacity of the parties to contract.

IV. The case recognizes the right of parties to make their own contracts of insurance, by sustaining the new condition here brought into practice concerning "the use of general terms," etc. Possibly such a condition has never before been considered by the courts, as there are no reported cases in which it figures. But it is probable that other courts will in like manner sustain it. Parties have, as a rule, been held bound by the conditions of their insurance contracts, except in cases of fraud, deceit, mistake or accident. The courts have often criticised these conditions unsparingly. In Pennsylvania, WOODWARD, Ch. J., described them as "four times as voluminous as the policy itself, and which, if strictly construed, take back nearly all the policy grants, and leave the insured about as empty-handed as he began." Columbia Ins. Co. v. Cooper, 14 Wright, 340. And in Massachusetts, where underwriters have, as a rule, had the most success in the courts, it was said that "many of these companies have encumbered their policies with so many conditions that they can be seldom held responsible for losses except at their own option." Abbott v. Shawmut Ins. Co., 3 Allen, 214. Such language seems extra-judicial, savoring more of passion than of reason. In contrast with it is the calm dignity with which the Supreme Court of the United States, in 12 Wall. 404, criticised the employment of small type in printing conditions, and disregarded the construction contended for by the insurer, as resting in unfairness and bad faith. The Tennessee court has looked at the subject with the eyes of Lord KENYON, who said in 1796: "Insurance companies are liable to great frauds and impositions; common prudence, therefore, suggests to them the propriety of taking all possible care to protect themselves from frauds when they make these contracts." Worsley v. Wood, 6 Term R. 710. The true rule is the Tennssee rule, to let the parties "stand upon their contract, according to its fair and just interpretation." "Every man's inclination to the side of the plaintiff must be governed by the rules of law and justice," said Lord MANSFIELD, in 1780. Langdale v. Mason, 1 Benn. Cas. 17. If these salutary principles be preserved, the honor and impartiality of the law will remain unsullied. As a general rule, it will doubtless be found that those underwriters, if any, who practice fraud and oppression in their contracts, will be shunned by applicants for insurance, particularly if the latter are by the courts held to a strict compliance with their contracts It is the safer plan to let all such evils correct themselves, as is done by the courts in so many other instances.

V. It is a matter for regret that so many courts have decided questions arising in insurance cases in haste, without the application of the principles of law most properly applicable, and without the deliberation manifest in the opinion of the Tennessee court. The same tribunal has heretofore said, in an opinion prepared by the same learned judge: "It is important that these questions be determined upon principles alike fair and just to the parties upon both sides." Southern Life Ins. Co. v. Booker, April, 1872. This is an echo of the warning given at an early day by Lord ELDON, "It is dangerous to decide these questions of insurance without being sure what may be the effect of the decision, and the nature of the doctrine which may result from it." Newcastle Ins. Co., v. Macmorran, 3 Dow, 255. It would seem that more care on the part of the courts might have resulted in less diversity of decisions, and saved the student of insurance law from much wandering through the mazes of the contradictory authorities that now embarrass his researches among our thousands of insurance cases.

J. O. P.

Railway-Aid Bonds—Charter Privilege of Receiving Subscriptions—Effect of Railway Consolidation and Change of Name.

JOHN T. THOMAS v. COUNTY OF SCOTLAND, AND JOHN T. THOMAS v. COUNTY OF SCHUYLER.

United States Circuit Court, Eastern District of Mo., March Term, 1874.

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Circuit Judge.
Hon. SAMUEL TREAT, District Judge.

1. Municipal Bonds—State Decisions, how far Binding on the Federal Courts.—Although the decisions of the supreme court of a State expounding the effect of the State constitution and laws upon securities issued by a municipal corporation are not necessarily conclusive upon the federal courts, yet they will be followed, unless cogent reasons appear to the contrary.

2. Railway-Aid Bonds—Charter Privilege of Receiving Subscriptions, a Contract—The decisions of the Supreme Court of Missouri in State ex rel., etc., v. Sullivan County, 51 Mo. 522; Smith v. Clark County, 54 Mo. 58; 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. p. 5, and State v. Green County, January Term, 1874, which hold that a provision in the charter of a railway company granted by act of the legislature, authorizing and empowering counties through which the road shall pass to subscribe for its stock and issue its bonds in payment of the same, is a "privilege" of the railway company, which is not taken away by a subsequent constitutional ordinance, are approved and followed.

2. ——. Effect of Railway Consolidation—Case in Judgment.—The charter of the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company gave the county courts of the counties through which the road should pass power to subscribe to its stock and issue their bonds in payment of the same, without a vote of the people. Subsequently the company was empowered to change its name and extend its line, and its name was accordingly changed. Subsequently authority was given to this company to consolidate with an Iowa company whose road intersected it on the boundary line between the two States, and the consolidation was accordingly effected, and the consolidated company took a new name. After this consolidation the defendant counties issued their bonds to the consolidated company by name, reciting on the face of the bonds the provision in the charter of the original Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company as their authority to do so, and also reciting on the face of the bonds the subsequent change of name of that company, and the final consolidation and change of name. In a suit upon coupons detached from these bonds, it is held, on the authority of Nugent v. Putnam County (1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 153), that the authority to issue the bonds was complete, and that the defendants are liable.

Case Criticised.—The case of —— v. Bates County, U. S. Circuit Court, Western District of Missouri, November Term, 1873, distinguished from the present case.

TREAT, J.—These are suits on coupons attached to bonds issued by the respective counties to pay for subscriptions to stock in a consolidated railroad company, and are in all essential particulars dependent on the same legal questions.

The bond in the Scotland county case reads as follows: "United States of America. $1,000. Eight per cent. Railroad Bond, County of Scotland. Twenty-five years.

"Know all men by these presents: That the County of Scotland, in the State of Missouri, acknowledges itself indebted to the Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the States of Missouri and Iowa, formed by consolidation of the Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company, formerly Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, of the State of Missouri, and the Iowa Southern Railway Company of the State of Iowa, in the sum of one thousand dollars, which sum the said county hereby promises to pay to the said Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, or bearer, at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, New York, on the 31st day of December, A. D. 1895, together with interest thereon from the 31st day of December, 1870, at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, which interest shall be payable annually in the city of New York, on the 31st day of December in each year as the same shall become due, on the presentation of the coupons hereto annexed. This bond being issued under and pursuant to an order of the county court of said Scotland County for subscription to the stock of the Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company, as authorized by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled 'An act to incorporate the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company,' approved February 9, 1857.

Digitized by Google

"In testimony whereof," &c.

Under the various decisions of the Supreme Court of Missouri and of the United States, a bona fide holder of such a bond, or of its coupons annexed, has a right to recover thereon at maturity, unless there was an absence of authority on the part of the county court to issue them, and said county is estopped by the recitals from disputing that all measures antecedent to the issue were properly and lawfully adopted and pursued when the recitals so state.

When these cases were argued at the last term of this court, several grave questions as to the authority of the respective counties to subscribe to the stock of the consolidated company, and issue bonds in payment of such subscriptions were fully discussed, leaving the court in serious doubt as to the liability of said counties. Since that term, several decisions have been made by the Missouri and United States Supreme Courts upon the disputed points, and a new argument has been had in the light of those new decisions.

What our views might have been on the many propositions arising under the state constitution of Missouri and the state statutes, were they before us de novo, is unimportant; for while in cases like the present the decisions of the State Supreme Court would not be conclusive in United States courts; yet they will be, and ought to be, followed, unless very cogent reasons to the contrary appear. The more especially should the United States courts so act, when under such state decisions negotiable instruments of the kind sued on have, on the faith thereof, been received in the money markets of the world and passed freely from hand to hand. In the several cases of Iowa municipal and county bonds the United States Supreme Court has not only laid down that rule, even disregarding adverse state decisions subsequently made, but has also caused it to be rigorously enforced.

The Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company was chartered in 1857, and in its charter the privilege was given to the county court of the counties defendant to subscribe to its stock and issue bonds in payment thereof. Subsequently, that railroad company was authorized to change its corporate name and extend its line. The name was duly changed accordingly, as recited in the bonds.

The Missouri Supreme Court has settled the question that the power given to the county courts by the charter of 1857 for the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company remained unaffected by the new state constitution; for that power was a "privilege" of the corporation, not impaired or taken from it. Hence, under the several state decisions, especially in the cases against Sullivan, Clark and Green counties, [State ex rel., etc., v. Sullivan County, 51 Mo. 522; Smith & Hall v. Clark County, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR., 5; S. C., 54 Mo., 58; State v. Green County, Supreme Court of Missouri, January Term, 1874], it must be considered settled that the county courts of Scotland and Schuyler counties respectively had the power to subscribe, without a previous vote of the people, to the stock of the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company under its changed name of Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company. Indeed, the case against Clark county was under said charter, and is express on that point.

This case is clearly distinguishable from that against Bates county in the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Missouri. In that case the previous vote of the people was essential to the authority to subscribe, and that vote was for a subscription to a specified company. The reasons on which that decision is based are fully stated in the published opinion rendered, and it is unnecessary to repeat them. But in the cases now before this court no such proposition is involved, for the power was granted to these county courts to subscribe and issue bonds of their own motion. These courts could of their own motion subscribe to the stock of the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, or of the same company under its new name of the Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company, without a previous vote by the people. But the subscription was not made in terms to that company.

Under the act of March 2, 1869, authority was given for the consolidation of that company with any other railroad company in Iowa whose track met at the same point on the boundary line of the respective states. Pursuant thereto the consolidation was had, and the consolidated companies were known as the Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska Railway Company—the company named in the bonds issued. As reference was fully made to the changed name of the Alexandria and Bloomfield Railroad Company, and to said consolidation, the bondholder was bound, in the light of the law as expounded by the United States Supreme Court, to look only to the authority of these county courts to make subscriptions to said constituent and consolidated company. The decision in the case against Green county seems to have decided that point; but whether that be so or not, the case of Nugent against Putnam County, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 153, appears conclusive. The previous cases of Clearwater v. Meredith, and of Marsh v. Fulton County, were supposed to hold the opposite doctrine. True, in the case of Nugent v. Putnam County the subscription was made to one of the constituent companies and accepted before consolidation, and the bonds were delivered subsequently to the consolidated company. But when a subscription is made to a specified company which has at the time power to consolidate with another company, that subscription is made in full view of the fact that the consolidation may occur without invalidating the subscription. In the Bates county case the subscription was not made as the vote of the people required. The stockholders of a constituent company may by vote decide whether the consolidation shall be made, and even if a non-assenting stockholder could not be bound by the acts of the majority, he who subscribed to the stock of the consolidated company, after consolidation, could set up no such defense. In Tomlinson v. Branch, and other cases cited, it is clearly established that the new or consolidated company has for its respective constituent parts all the powers and privileges and exemptions pertaining to the constituents previously. Therefore, if Scotland and Schuyler counties had subscribed to the Alexandria and Nebraska City Railroad Company, and, as stockholders in said company, had voted for the consolidation, they would be in exactly the same position as they are now, viz: stockholders in the consolidated company by their own consent.

It follows, therefore, that if, when the subscription was to a constituent road, and the delivery of bonds to the road consolidated afterwards, the bonds are obligatory, the subscription and delivery of bonds, therefore, to the consolidated road are equally obligatory. The main consideration is the authority to issue said bonds to the consolidated company. That authority does not depend on the fact of previous subscription to a constituent road subsequently consolidated as authorized by law at the time the subscription was made, which subscription is by operation of law carried over to the consolidated road, but on the fact that the court's authority to issue the bonds was complete, as it had the authority to make the counties stockholders in the consolidated road and issue its bonds in payment of its subscriptions.

Such we understand to be the doctrine established by the United States Supreme Court in the recent case of Nugent v. Putnam County, in accordance with which the demurrers in these cases must be overruled.

DILLON, J., concurs.

DEMURRER OVERRULED.

Digitized by Google

Municipal Subscriptions to Railroads—Mandamus to Compel the Issuance of the Bonds.

DENVER & RIO GRANDE RAILROAD COMPANY v. COMMISSIONERS OF PUEBLO COUNTY.

Supreme Court of Colorado, Pueblo, April 2, 1874.

Hon. MOSES HALLETT, Chief Justice.
" JAMES B. BELFORD, } Justices.
" EBENEZER T. WELLS, }

1. Railway-aid Bonds—Mandamus to County Officers to Compel Issuance after Election.—Although an election may have been lawfully held pursuant to a petition of some of the citizens of a county, upon the question of a county subscription in aid of a projected railway, and although such election may have resulted in favor of such subscription, yet this does not create a contract between the county and the railway company such as will entitle them to a mandamus to compel the county commissioners to issue the bonds in exchange for the certificates of stock. The proposition not having been submitted to vote on petition of the company, the transaction was one purely between the people and their agents, the company being in no sense a party or privy thereto.

BELFORD, J.—From a careful examination of the act authorizing subscriptions to be made to aid in the construction of railroads, it is apparent that the body clothed with the power of contracting is the board of commissioners, and it is equally clear that the exercise of this power is made dependent on the approval of the people, expressed at an election called for that purpose.

In this case it is evident, from the form of the proposition submitted to the voters, as from other things in the record, that no stock had been subscribed prior to the election, but that the purpose of the election was to ascertain whether the popular will would authorize and sanction such a subscription. The people can make no contract binding on the county. They can approve or disapprove a contract made by the board; beyond this they can not go. It is clear, also, that to maintain this action the complainants must have a valid, legal right against the county, springing out of a contract made in a way known to and approved by the law.

To constitute a contract there must not only be parties competent to agree, but also mutuality of consideration and obligation. Both must be bound or neither can be held. The election proceeds upon the petition of the citizens. The railroad company is not a party in this preliminary step. The election is not and can not be ordered at their request. They may submit their proposals to the board, and through it to the people; but the statute neither empowers the company to contract with the people, nor does it authorize the people, in their preliminary capacity, to contract with the corporation. This power is vested solely in their representatives, the commissioners, and to make it effectual they must pursue the strict letter of the law granting it.

The most that can be said to the action of the board in this case is, that at an election they submitted certain proposals—by whom made does not clearly appear—to the consideration of the voters, and that they approved them. This is not enough, for as we have seen, the people in their primary capacity are not empowered to contract. Nor can the commissioners make a contract that will bind the county until the people, through the ballot-box, tell them to do so. The action of both in their appropriate ways must be had before the negotiations can be consummated. "Until the county has subscribed," says the Supreme Court of Illinois, "there is no privity between the road and the county." It is the contract of subscription which compels the subscriber for stock to pay his money, and the company to issue to him shares of their stock. When the vote was taken and resulted in favor of subscription, it only amounted to a delegation of power to the commissioners to make the contract of subscription.

The company was no party in this vote, and has no more right to insist upon the execution of this power thus delegated, than it would have in case an individual were to authorize an agent to subscribe for stock in the road, and who should refuse to exercise the power of his principal. P. & O. R. R. Co. v. Tazewell County, 22 Ills. 156.

If we were to concede the power of the people to make a contract by a vote to take stock, still their vote could not amount to a contract till the company, through its proper officers, also agreed to issue the stock. The record fails to disclose any such contract in behalf of the corporation.

The recitals in this writ are simply to the effect that the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad Company had constructed its railway to Colorado Springs, and contemplate extending it thence to the coal fields of Fremont county by the most advantageous route, and that the citizens of Pueblo county, desiring such extension via the town of Pueblo, made their petition, signed according to law, praying the board of county commissioners of Pueblo county to order an election for voting to subscribe $50,000 in this behalf, and to pay the same in bonds of the county.

That pursuant to this petition a special election was ordered, the notice reciting the proposition upon which said subscription was to be made. There is nothing in the record to show that the propositions voted on were submitted by the company, or that they had any knowledge of the same. The connection of the corporation with the transactions only became apparent when through their attorneys they appear before the board and demand the bonds of the county. Clearly, then, according to the recitals of the writ, there is nothing that would indicate the existence of an obligation on the part of the company.

Had the commissioners, on behalf of the county, brought suit to compel the issue and delivery of stock, the company could well have replied, under the facts set forth in this record, "We never contracted to deliver any. The election was a movement between the people and the commissioners; we made no propositions. The record fails to disclose any agreement, and hence there is nothing on which to predicate a claim against us." And taking the facts set forth, no sufficient rejoinder could have been made by the board. It is insisted, however, that when the proposals were approved by the people it then became the duty of the board to subscribe. As stated above, it does not appear that these propositions were submitted by the company. If they were not, then the transaction was purely one between the people and their agents, the company being in no sense a party or privy thereto. Under a statute whose language is identical with that of our own, it was held that the vote of the people could create no obligation on the part of the county or railroad company. Mr. Justice Nelson, in answering the argument "that the duty of the board to issue stock after the election was imperative," said "that a subscription was necessary to create a contract binding upon the county, on one side to take the stock and pay in the bonds, and upon the other to transfer the stock and receive the bonds for the same. Until the subscription is made the contract is unexecuted and obligatory upon neither." Aspinwall et als. v. Davies County, 22 How. 364; Commissioners of Crawford County v. The L. N. A., etc., R R. Co., 39 Ind. 192; Union Pacific R. R, etc., v. Davies County, 6 Kansas, 256. In the absence of a contract, we see no obligation resting on the county which the complainants can enforce. It is very questionable whether the proceedings were valid in any sense. The order for the election was made at a special meeting, and there is nothing in the record to show that the meeting was appointed at a regular session of the board.

We are of the opinion that the court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer and refusing the writ.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

Notes and Queries.

A correspondent asks whether the new rule (with regard to the taking of depositions) established in the federal court at St. Louis, and published in this journal, ante, p. 158, is a rule of United States circuit as well as of the district court. We are informed by Judge Treat that it applies to both the circuit and the district courts.

Digitized by Google

The Reed Murder Trial—Circumstantial Evidence—Admirable Charge of Chief Justice Appleton, of Maine.

Recently Elridge W. Reed was tried before Chief Justice APPLETON for the murder of John Ray. The evidence showed that on the afternoon of the 20th September, 1870, Ray, a quiet and peaceable man, in full health, returned home from hunting, with his gun; that about six o'clock in the afternoon, after eating his supper and being informed by his wife that his cow was missing, he left to go in search of his cow, taking, as his daughter says, the road toward Reed's. From that search he never returned alive.

On Wednesday, the 28th September following, his body was found in a hole on the island, covered with rotten wood and brush. Upon removing the wood and brush, it was found that he had been cruelly and brutally beaten to death; a wound on the left temple so severe that the left eye protruded from its socket, two-thirds of the ball out of the head; the neck dislocated; evidence of blows on the top of the head; a bunch as big as a hen's egg; one behind the ear an inch and a half long; blows on the back between the shoulders as big as a saucer; black and blue spots on the left side and on the hip—evidence of terrible and fearful violence inflicted by some one upon the body of the deceased.

The evidence to implicate the defendant was largely circumstantial. In the course of his admirable charge to the jury, the learned chief justice, who has given much attention to criminal evidence, made the following observations upon the necessity, nature, and evidential force of circumstantial testimony, which, though not new in principle, are still interesting from the clear, forcible, and even eloquent manner in which they were presented to the jury. He said:

"Evidence is ordinarily divided into two kinds, direct and circumstantial—direct when the witness testifies to the principal fact in issue—as when a murder is committed and the witness testifies that he saw the blow inflicted, which resulted in death, and the person by whom it was so inflicted. In such a case the truth of the witness testifying is the main subject of enquiry.

In circumstantial testimony there is the fact proving and the fact proved inferentially from the fact given in testimony. The circumstance must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and it is for them to draw the inference from the fact proved. To illustrate: A snow storm; the new-fallen snow covers the earth; a witness testifies to human footprints; you infer some one has passed. He gives you the direction of the toe and the heel; you infer the direction which the person was moving. As his steps are watched, it is proved that there is a dot or hole in the snow; you infer he had a stick or cane in his hands. It is summer; the rain has fallen; the ground is muddy; a witness testifies to seeing the impression of the heel and the toes in the mud. If you believe the witness, do you doubt that the person whose feet made the impression was bare-footed? Yet this is circumstantial evidence.

"A man testifies to seeing a violent blow given by a club and the falling dead of the person struck. You infer the man was killed by the blow, from the fact that a witness so testified, for you did not see him; that is, you infer one fact from another; the killing from the sworn testimony—an inference properly drawn if the testimony be true, but it is still an inference. It is of the same kind as any other inference of one fact from another—the fact of testimony, the assumption of the truth of testimony, and the inference from the fact testified to its truth. In short, strictly speaking, all testimony is circumstantial or indirect, except what one sees or hears.

"You see a man discharge a loaded gun; you see the flash; you see a man fall dead; you find the bullet in the body; you saw not the ball in its passage through the air from the pistol to the body; you did not see it leave the pistol or enter the body, but from the facts seen you infer that it did. What is this but circumstantial evidence?

"The probative force of circumstantial evidence depends upon the closeness of connection between the fact inferred and the fact from which the inference is drawn. The more numerous the circumstances—the facts tending to establish a given fact—the greater this probative force. One circumstance may be of slight weight; another, tending to the same result, increases, by its consistency with the first, the probability of the inference to be drawn from their existence and co-existence. Another is added, and another, all pointing in the same direction, giving added and increased strength to the inference, as each strand gives strength to the cable of which it forms a component part. Men talk of a chain of facts. The comparison is inapt. The chain is weakened by the increasing number of its links, until it breaks by its own weight. Not so with circumstantial evidence. The rope or cable gains increased strength by each added strand. The failure of proof as to one circumstance is but one strand from the cable. The cable may still be firm and strong, holding the ship securely at anchor, though tossed upon the waves by the fierce and stormy winds.

"The strength of the conclusion is not to be ascertained by the addition of the several probabilities created by the several circumstances. Their existence proved, and their concurrence increases in a much higher degree the truth of the conclusion, till that may become irresistible from the concurrence of numerous, distinct, co-existent and corroborating facts, all tending in the same direction to one and the same result.

"Nor is it necessary that each and every circumstance should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Some facts may be proved with more, some with less assurance of certainty. Such is the invariable result. Some facts are proved more satisfactorily than others. It is enough that you give to each fact its just and true weight. Then, after weighing and examining each and all the facts, exculpative and inculpative, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner, it will be your bounden duty to say so, though some of the alleged facts may be proved with a less degree of certainty than others.

"It is in vain that we attempt to detect or punish crime unless we resort to circumstantial evidence. Crime shuns the light of day. It seeks darkness. It courts secrecy. It endeavors to escape detection. The assassin moves stealthily upon his unsuspicious or sleeping victim. He calls no witness to see him strike the fatal blow. He attempts to obliterate all traces of crime. He seeks to cover up his tracks. Does the thief take a witness to see him steal—the incendiary to see him apply the torch? You must resort to circumstantial evidence or crime must remain unpunished. If you wait for an eye-witness, if you expect a felon to call one to witness his criminality, you at once grant impunity to crime.

"There may have been cases in which the innocent have been convicted. If this be so, it is a reason for caution; for giving to each circumstance its just and appropriate weight, not for disregarding such proof, or neglecting to give it proper consideration. But if men have been convicted erroneously on circumstantial evidence, so have they on direct testimony; but is that a reason for refusing to act on such testimony? Is it any more or better reason for refusing to act on circumstantial evidence? Assuredly not.

"The cases are few and far between in which erroneous verdicts were found, and they occurred under entirely different conditions from those of our own time. Formerly the prisoner was not permitted to call witnesses. He was not allowed to employ counsel. He could not be a witness in his own case. Now the government summons his witnesses, pays his counsel, and permits him to be a witness to explain, if he can, every adverse fact. But the cases of erroneous verdicts are of rare occurrence. The wonder is that they were so few. Did you gentlemen ever know or hear of one in this state? The stories told of such instances may or may not be true, but of their truth you have no proof. They are resorted to for the purpose of imposing upon timid jurymen the belief that there should be no safe conviction upon circumstantial evidence; that there is infinite danger to innocence if there is such conviction. They have nothing to do with the case under consideration. This you are to decide upon the evidence before you, upon nothing else.

Digitized by Google

"Circumstantial evidence is legal evidence. When that satisfies you beyond reasonable doubt, you are equally bound to act upon it as if it were the most direct. The possibility of error exists alike, whether the evidence be direct or circumstantial. But because you possibly may err, do you refuse to act? Because your wheat may possibly be blighted, do you refuse to sow? Until it pleases Providence to give us means of knowledge beyond our present faculties we must act upon this kind of evidence, or grant almost universal impunity to crime.

"When death occurs, it may be accidental or it may be by suicide. How do you know that John Ray's death was not the result of accident, or was not self-inflicted? No witness testifies to having been present when that sad affair occurred. Is not the answer obvious? The protruded eye, the blows on the back, on the head, on the sides, the secret and unknown burial place, the various circumstances detailed, do they not satisfy beyond a shadow of doubt that the death was not accidental, was not suicidal? Yet what is this but circumstantial? Can not you with almost absolute certainty, a certainty which no reasoning however acute, no eloquence however thrilling, can disturb, infer from the facts disclosed that the death of John Ray was by the hand of violence and of crime—for if no crime, why conceal or attempt to conceal the dead body? Could the dead man bury himself?

"If you can so infer, then you will remember that circumstantial evidence is not merely legal evidence, but that species of evidence upon which you can rest with an assured confidence of the truth of your conclusions.

"All the acts of the prisoner—whatever explains or throws light upon those acts, all the acts of others relative to the crime charged, that came to his knowledge and which may influence him; his loves and hates, his threats, the truth of his statements, the falsehood of his explanations, his looks, his speech, his silence when called upon to speak; everything which tends in any degree to establish the connection between the prisoner and the crime with which he is charged; every circumstance preceding, accompanying or following the act, may become articles of circumstantial evidence, and of no slight importance as proving or disproving guilt."

The Death of a Bankrupt no Bar to the Continuance of Bankruptcy Proceedings--Important Decision by Judge Blatchford.

Yesterday in the United States District Court Judge Blatchford rendered his decision in the case of E. C. Litchfield, an involuntary bankrupt. On the 3d of November, 1873, the order of adjudication was made, and on the 27th of that month the bankrupt died. The warrant, based upon this adjudication, was not physically issued until the 27th of December, 1873. To a further continuance of the proceedings objection was made by a creditor. This creditor, through counsel, insisted that the court had no further jurisdiction over the cause by reason of the death of the bankrupt.

The twelfth section of the bankruptcy law has the following language, bearing on a case of this kind:

"If the debtor dies after the issuing of the warrant, the proceedings may be continued and concluded in like manner as if he had lived."

The decision of Judge Blatchford upholds the point that the court has jurisdiction over a bankruptcy proceeding, even after the death of the bankrupt. The Judge says:

"This provision is found among those which relate to voluntary bankruptcy. Section 11, which relates to voluntary bankruptcy, provides that the filing of a voluntary petition shall be an act of bankruptcy, and the petitioner shall be adjudicated bankrupt, and a warrant shall be forthwith issued. Section 42, which relates to involuntary bankruptcy, provides that the court shall adjudge the debtor to be a bankrupt and shall forthwith issue a warrant, and that the proceedings for the taking possession, assignment and distribution of the property of the debtor shall be similar to those before provided for in the act in regard to voluntary petitions. It is contended that section 12 implies that if the debtor dies before the issuing of the warrant the proceedings can not be continued, and that the warrant is not issued in the meaning of the section or of the act until it is physically issued, or in other words, that when it is physically issued it can not be considered as having been issued before it was physically issued. Section 38 provides that the filing of a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, either by a debtor in his own behalf or by a creditor against a debtor, upon which an order shall be issued adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt, shall be deemed and taken to be the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy under the act. (In re Patterson, 1 Benedict, 508.) By section 14 the assignment to the assignee and his title thereunder relate back to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. In the present case, there having been an adjudication entered before the death of the bankrupt, the title of the assignee relates back to the time the petition was filed, and the title the bankrupt then had to his property is absolutely vested in the assignee, unless the death of the bankrupt has had the effect to prevent the vesting of such title in the assignee. I do not think that the bankrupt died before the issuing of the warrant in the sense of section 12. The warrant is required to be issued forthwith. It is, in judgment of law, issued simultaneously with the entry of the order of adjudication. Whenever it is physically issued it relates back, for the purpose of section 12, to the entry of the order of adjudication. The entry of that order causes the entire proceedings and the title of the assignee to relate back to the filing of the petition, and there is no indication in the act of any intention that the death of the bankrupt, after the entry of that order, shall dissolve all the proceedings if the physical preparation and issuing of the warrant shall happen to be delayed until after such death. Where section 12 speaks of the issuing of the warrant it contemplates its issue in a voluntray case, simultaneously with the entry of an order of adjudication, and the same intent exists in regard to an involuntary case. Section 12 must be read as if the words "issuing of the warrant" were "entering the order of adjudication." There is no difference in the two forms of expression.—New York Herald.

A Legal Opinion in Rhyme.

It is said that one of our largest corporations, "in view of the approaching Centennial," has requested his solicitor hereafter to render his opinions on mortgage investments in verse. The legal gentleman being of known poetic temperament has promptly complied. His first effort was the following:

I have examined with great care
(A sound opinion to prepare)
This mortgage, brief of title and the deeds therewith produced;
And I think beyond all question
Or contrary suggestion,
Good title to the mortgagor, in fee, is well deduced.

I've read the search certificates
With watchful reference to dates,
And find therein no prior lien or charge is interposed.
I'm ready, therefore, to advise
That no good reason doth arise
(With one exception) to prevent the matter being closed.

The single point I would reserve
Most grave attention does deserve,
As clearly coming to the notice of the mortgagee:
There does a valid claim exist,
Tho' not included in the list
Of cases in "the act of eighteenth April, '53."

Tho' "not of record" 'tis, nor large,
'Tis in the nature of a charge;
And to its liquidation there is SOME ONE "bound to see"—
In short, without addition more
To what I have remarked before—
The point that I refer to is the matter of my fee.

—Legal Intelligencer.

Digitized by Google

Supreme Court of Missouri—Decisions last Monday.

BY JUDGE ADAMS.

Ackley et al. v. Staehlin; reversed and remanded.

State ex rel. Aull et al. v. Macon County Court; affirmed.

Barker v. Patchin; affirmed.

Ackley et al. v. Winkelmeyer; affirmed.

Renicke v. Jod; affirmed.

Jones and wife v. Carter; affirmed.

BY JUDGE WAGNER.

St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad v. Silver; general term reversed and special term affirmed.

Howard et al. v. Smith; affirmed.

City to use Lancaster v. Armstrong; reversed and remanded.

DeJarnett v. DeGiverville; reversed, Judges ADAMS and NAPTON dissenting.

BY JUDGE NAPTON.

State ex rel. Winship v. State Auditor; mandamus refused.

Cranshaw v. Sumner; affirmed.

BY JUDGE VORIES.

O'Connor v. Koch; reversed and remanded.

Douglass v. St. Louis Zinc Company; general term affirmed.

Supreme Court of Missouri—Decisions at the March Term, 1874.

Question of Fact.—Estell v. The St. Louis & Southeastern Railway Co. This was an action on a contract to deliver cross-ties. The question was one of fact merely, namely: whether the defendant had waived the stipulation as to the time within which the cross-ties should be delivered, and whether there was a second contract for the delivery of more ties. Upon both of these questions the jury found for the plaintiff, and the court here affirm the judgment rendered on the verdict, saying that the jury are the proper judges of the credit to be given to the evidence. WAGNER, J., delivered the opinion, the other judges concurring.

Administration of Estates—Mistake in the Classification of Claims—The Remedy by Entry nunc pro tunc—Fraudulent Concealment.—E. L. Gillett et al. v. Union National Bank et al. The plaintiffs had certain claims allowed in the probate court against the estate of Turner Maddox, and placed in the sixth class. At the same term of court the Union National Bank had two claims allowed, which should have been placed in the same class. By a clerical error of the probate judge in endorsing on the claims of the bank a memorandum to the effect that they belonged to the fifth class, the clerk of the court conformed to that memorandum and made his entry accordingly. The plaintiffs were unaware that this mistake had been made, until the time for taking an appeal had elapsed. The Union Bank discovered the error in its favor during the term at which it occurred, but kept the fact to themselves, and when applied to by the plaintiff at the close of the term, declined to have any correction made. The first, second, third and fourth class claims against the estate were paid, and a sufficiency of assets was left to pay the fifth class, and over twenty-five per cent. to pay the sixth class, unless the claims of the bank were permitted to remain as originally and erroneously classed. The petition alleges these facts, and further, that the failure of the bank to disclose the mistake which had occurred in the classification of claims in its favor was a fraudulent concealment of facts of which it now sought to unfairly avail itself, and the prayer was that the bank be restrained from enforcing its claims as of the fifth class, and that the administrator be prohibited from paying them as such, and that they be adjudged as sixth-class claims and ordered to be paid only as such. This petition was held insufficient on demurrer, and the propriety of this ruling is now before the court. The court sustain the judgment below for two reasons: 1. A proper remedy existed at law by a nunc pro tunc entry in the probate court. 2. There being no relation of trust or confidence between the bank and the plaintiffs, and the bank having nothing to do in producing the mistake, it was under no obligation to communicate it to the plaintiffs, and its failure to do so does not make a case which would warrant the interposition of a court of equity, even if there was no remedy at law. SHERWOOD, J., delivered the opinion, all the judges concurring.

Garnishment of Express Trustee.—Henry Lackland v. Alexander J. P. Garesche, Garnishee of Thomas P. Smith. This case simply holds that the trustee of an express trust can not, under the Missouri system of procedure, be made to account as a garnishee in a suit by attachment. The remedy is by a bill in equity for an account. The proceeding by attachment is a legal proceeding purely, and it never was contemplated to allow a jury, or a court sitting as a jury, in a suit by attachment and garnishment, to exercise the complicated functions of a chancellor by compelling an express trustee to account. These views are enforced and illustrated at considerable length. ADAMS, J., delivered the opinion, the other judges concurring.

Book Notices.

THE AMERICAN LAW REVIEW. April, 1874. Boston: Little, Brown & Company.

The April number of the Law Review contains the usual amount of interesting reading matter. It contains a very complete and interesting review of the Tichborne trial, the only one, we believe, which has been published (except in book form by the same house) in this country. The next leading article is on the Virginius case. The history of that vessel, and of her operations previously to her capture, and a summary of the diplomatic correspondence, are first given, and then the legal principles attending the case are discussed with much clearness and force of reasoning. The article upon Torts under the French Law, the text of which is the recent work of M. SOUDAT, entitled "Traite General de la Responsabilite ou de l'Action en Dommages-interets en dehors de Contracts," will be read with great interest by every lover of the study of comparative jurisprudence. The Review also contains an excellent article on the Delivery of Telegraphic Messages, and this, together with its other matter, appears fully up to the standard it has hitherto maintained.

CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS OF THE CHICAGO BAR ASSOCIATION AND ADDRESS OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

We are glad to notice that a bar association has been formed in Chicago, the object of which is "to maintain the honor and dignity of the profession of the law; to cultivate social intercourse among its members, and to increase its usefulness in promoting the due administration of justice." We had occasion to notice in a previous number (ante, p. 156) the formation of a similar association in this city. The good which such associations, if properly conducted, are capable of accomplishing can scarcely be overestimated. They should not only become a means of purifying and elevating the standard of the profession, but they should afford a channel through which the united sentiment of the better class of the profession may find expression. To that sentiment, so expressed, not only the practicing members of the profession, but the judges themselves must in some measure become amenable. We join heartily in what the Albany Law Journal says with reference to this subject:

"We hope to see the time when all the principal cities in the country will have organizations similar to those of New York and Chicago, and when an annual congress of delegates from each will be an accomplished fact. Such a congress could and would exert a powerful influence in many directions, but especially in the direction of a unification of the laws and jurisprudence of the several states. Although all the states but one derive their fundamental law from the same source, we doubt if among the several nations of Europe can be found more diverse legislation, even on questions of general jurisprudence. There is no prospect for assimilation until the legal profession shall bring its united influence to bear to that end. The lawyers in Germany have for years held annual congresses, and their action, quite as much as anything else, made the German empire possible."

DIGEST OF DECISIONS RENDERED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN at the January Term, 1874. By HENRY A. CHANEY, Attorney at Law. Lansing: W. S. George & Co. 1874.

ABSTRACT OF DECISIONS RENDERED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN, at the January Term, 1874, at Lansing, Michigan; also a Complete Digest, with Marginal Notes, Indexed as to Subject; also, to have an Index as to Title of Cases. Arranged by CHIPMAN, DEWEY & HAWES, Attorneys, Detroit. Detroit: Richmond & Backus. 1874.

We have had occasion to notice and commend Mr. Chaney's Quarterly Digest heretofore. That of Messrs. Chipman, Dewey & Hawes is similar in its plan; but we have been so well satisfied with Mr. Chaney's that we have not examined the latter publication with that care which would warrant us in instituting a comparison between them. In this connection we would state that we have been favored by G. B. MOBLEY, Jr., Esq., of Eutaw, Alabama, with a Digest in scrap-book form of the Decisions of the last term of the Supreme Court of that State. If enterprises of this character could be instituted in every state, and then if there could be a general exchange of these publications, it would be a benefit to the profession.

Digitized by Google

THE CASE OF THE VIRGINIUS, CONSIDERED WITH REFERENCE TO THE LAW OF SELF-DEFENCE. By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. New York: Baker, Voorhis & Co. London: Trubner & Co. 1874.

We shall notice this pamphlet at some length hereafter.

LEGAL BIBLIOGRAPHY—The Catalogue of the Library of the New York Law Institute. By R. S. GUERNSEY. Reprinted from the New York Daily Register of March 27, 1874.

Among the excellent suggestions contained in this little pamphlet we find the following: "It would seem that in a catalogue of all law books in the English language, chronologically arranged by editions and full titles under subjects, with an index by authors' names, after the manner of continental treatises on legal bibliography, where the latter science has been carried to perfection, should be eagerly sought for both in this country and in England. Such a work would now contain nearly twice the number of titles in Marvin's book, before mentioned, and would occupy about fifteen hundred pages. No publisher in Europe or America will undertake to publish so extensive a work and rely upon the sales for their reimbursement, although the compiler would ask nothing for his manuscript. Therefore, lawyers must still be content to resort to library catalogues only, for their knowledge of what books have been published on a special subject."

When the dream of the Albany Law Journal shall be realized, and we shall have a national bar association, it will be its duty to take upon itself the expense of publishing works of this character, the same as other learned societies are in the habit of publishing works which are beyond the limits of private enterprise.

Legal News and Notes.

—HON. SAMUEL D. LOCKWOOD, who formerly occupied a position upon the supreme bench of Illinois, but who for many years has been in private life, died on the 23d instant at his residence in Batavia, Illinois, at an advanced age. Judge LOCKWOOD enjoyed considerable distinction as a jurist, but the conspicuous feature of his character was his integrity, which was of so high an order as to command the admiration of all who knew him.

—AN action has been commenced in the New York City Supreme Court by Daniel McFarland to recover $50,000 damages against the United States Publishing Company for an atrocious libel upon the plaintiff in a book known as the "History of the New York Tombs," published by the defendant corporation. McFarland, it will be remembered, is the man who figured some time since as the slayer of Richardson, one of the writers on the Tribune. Ex-Judge CURTIS is counsel for McFarland, and eminent legal talent is retained for the defendant.

—A NUMBER of the employees of a street railroad company in New York have been prosecuted for salting a railroad track for the purpose of clearing it of snow. The indictment was for nuisance detrimental to public health, and the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals had also a finger in the pie. It was the first suit of the kind that has ever been before the courts. The counsel for the prosecution claimed that salt and snow produce a freezing mixture which unnaturally chills the atmosphere, injures men's bronchial tubes, produce coughs, colds and diphtheria in human beings, and freezes and contracts the horses' feet. The trial resulted in a drawn battle.

—SENATOR STEVENSON has introduced a bill authorizing Indians in their tribal capacity and as individuals to sue and to be sued. This senator has given considerable attention to the subject of our relations with the Indians, and understands the sad consequences which constantly flow from the inability of Indians to claim and defend their rights before the judicial tribunals of the country. A similar bill was introduced in the house some time since. It is hoped the proposed legislation may receive favorable consideration. That feature of the bill authorizing Indians to be sued should be carefully guarded.—Washington Chronicle.

—HON. SAMUEL MILLIGAN, associate justice of the court of claims, died recently at Washington. Judge MILLIGAN resided in Greenville, East Tennessee, the home of ex-president Johnson, by whom he was appointed to the bench of the court of claims. At the time of his appointment to the court of claims he occupied a position on the supreme bench of Tennessee. Though not a great jurist, he was sound and conscientious. His opinions delivered while on the supreme bench of Tennessee are, perhaps, quoted with as much respect as those of any judge who has occupied a seat on that bench since the war. Horace Maynard, of Tennessee, and Mr. Secretary Richardson are mentioned as his successors.

—SINCE the abandoned French steamer L'Amerique was picked up at sea, after having rolled for thirty-six hours in the troughs of the waves "manless and lifeless," and towed into an English port, the newspapers have been reviving a popular taste for the study of maritime law by publishing long disquisitions on the law of salvage, under such suggestive titles as "Jetsam," "Flotsam," and the like. Beyond question, the saving of the Amerique insures to her salvors the heaviest reward of any case which has occurred for many years. Whether we consider the remarkable circumstances attending her abandonment within one hundred miles of port, or the fact that she was the second steamship of the same line abandoned within two weeks under the same circumstances, or the fact that being a French ship, after being abandoned by her crew, she persisted in not sinking for thirty-six hours, and was finally saved by an English vessel;—we may well conclude that an English court of admiralty will not be so far uninfluenced by national pride but that it will allow liberal salvage. It is not matter of surprise, then, that the admiralty court fixed her bail at £125,000.

—THE "vexed question" of the attorney-general's landaulet has at last apparently been settled by the adoption by the house of representatives, in committee of the whole, of an amendment to the congressional appropriation bill providing that no civil officer of the government shall hereafter receive any compensation or perquisites, directly or indirectly, from the treasury or property of the United States, beyond the salary or compensation allowed by law, or shall make any private use of such property, or of the services or labor of any person employed in the service of the United States, which service or labor is paid for by the United States; provided, this shall not be construed to deprive any officer of the United States of such fees as are or may be provided by law in addition to the salary of such officer, or of use of such property as may be expressly by law appropriated for the use of such officer.

—THE liberty of discussion which is the peculiar advantage of "committee of the whole" was conspicuously exemplified in the national house of representatives on Saturday. The house was in committee of the whole, considering the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. Nesmith moved to strike out from the paragraph relating to the debts of the department of justice, the item of $140 for the care and subsistence of horses, and $600 for repairs to carriages and harness. He spoke of the attorney-general's $1,600 landaulet, and remarked that lawyers of the attorney-general's calibre in his city rode on the outside of a fifty-dollar mule. [Laughter.] There was a Spanish proverb to the effect that if you put a beggar on horseback he will ride to the devil.

Mr. Negley objected to a comparison of an officer of the government to a beggar on horseback.

Mr. Nesmith: I simply referred to the mule. [Laughter.]

The chairman: The gentleman from Oregon will continue, being careful to keep in order.

Mr. Nesmith: I was only quoting the Spanish proverb, which says: "Put a beggar on horseback and he will ride to the devil." I have no objection to the termination of a journey in that particular direction; but I don't want the people to pay for the transportation. [Laughter.]

Mr. G. F. Hoar believed that a reasonable and decent conveyance should be provided for the attorney-general, and he asked the gentleman from Oregon (Nesmith) whether he would like to have the attorney-general ride down Pennsylvania avenue on the back of a fifty-dollar mule.

In reply to Mr. Hoar, Mr. Nesmith said he had seen the attorney-general ride in Oregon on a mule; that Philip the Second, of Spain, rode an Andalusian mule through the streets of Madrid when he went to marry Mary of England, and that sacred history gave an account of a better man than either of them riding on one of those useful animals that had no pride of ancestry and no hope of posterity.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor.
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor.

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1874.

SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

WE publish in this number two important cases upon federal practice—one a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States v. Boutwell, holding that in the absence of any statute warranting it, a mandamus against an officer of the government can not be revived against his successor; and the other a well-considered opinion of district Judge HOPKINS, of the Western District of Wisconsin, in the case of Main v. The Second National Bank of Chicago, holding that a national bank can not be sued in one of the federal courts in a district other than that where it is established and does business, by the device of getting service of process on its cashier. For the latter opinion we are indebted to the learned judge himself.

Municipal Bonds.

In the U. S. Circuit Court for the Western District of Missouri an interesting case of Huidekoper v. Vernon County—Stephenson and Shippen for plaintiff and Stone for defendant—has just been decided. The suit was for collection of interest coupons from bonds proved to have been executed by the presiding justice and clerk of the county court and substituted, with the knowledge of the county agent, for other bonds regularly issued about seven months previously, which were surrendered and destroyed at the time of substitution. The county held $300,000 of railroad stock, and the railroad was built through the county. The defendant claimed that the surrender and destruction of the old bonds by their holders released the county, and the issue and delivery of new bonds without any order of the county court were without authority and that the bonds were hence void. The court held that the said officials had the power to make such bona fide substitution, and further that by holding the stock, by levying and collecting taxes and paying interest, and by passing a resolution recognizing the new bonds and placing refusal to pay interest on other grounds, the substitution was abundantly ratified, and the county was estopped from making such defence.

Involuntary Bankruptcy—What Residence within the District is Necessary to Give Jurisdiction.

In the case of Re Johnson, in the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Missouri, it appeared that the debtor had formerly resided and carried on business in the eastern district of Missouri for the longest period of the six months preceding the filing of the petition against him; and that for the remainder of the six months next preceding the filing of the petition, being a period of two months and a few days, and at the time of filing the same, he was bona fide residing and actually carrying on business in the western district of Missouri. Upon these facts a plea to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain a proceeding in involuntary bankruptcy was filed, and argued by Messrs. Lay and Belch for the debtor, and by Messrs. Johnson and Botsford, contra. It was held, affirming the judgment of the lower court, by DILLON, J.—

1. That the proceedings were properly commenced in the western district of Missouri, and that the district court of said district had jurisdiction to hear the same and to make an adjudication of bankruptcy.

2. That the provisions of section 11 of the bankrupt act, requiring voluntary petitions in bankruptcy to be filed in the district where the petitioner has resided for the six months preceding the filing of the petition, or for the longest period of such six months, does not apply to proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy, and that the district court of any district in which the debtor may actually reside and do business at the time of filing the petition against him, has jurisdiction under the bankrupt act (sec. 39) to hear the cause and make an adjudication of bankruptcy.

An Incident of the Chicago Fire—Remarkable Preservation of Legal Papers.

Among the cases decided last week by the Supreme Court of the United States is the case of Ephraim S. Sawyer v. Henry Prickett et al.

This case has had a very singular and remarkable history.

In 1868 Sawyer filed a bill in the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, to foreclose a mortgage executed by Prickett to the Fox River Valley R. R. Co. and assigned to the plaintiff. An answer was filed by Prickett, a great deal of testimony was taken, and the case was argued and decided, and a decree was entered by Judge BLODGETT, just previous to the great fire, dismissing the bill for want of equity.

An appeal was taken by Sawyer, and at the time of the fire the clerk was copying the record for the supreme court. After the fire it was supposed that this case, like all the cases in the different courts held in Chicago, had been forever set at rest. The probability of even getting up the case for a review by the supreme court was of a most shadowy kind.

Mr. Bradley, the efficient clerk, had given orders to the workmen engaged in removing the debris from the court-house ruins, to preserve all paper which might come to light in clearing away the brick and mortar, and, wonderful to relate, these workmen dug out and preserved, piece by piece, each paper that had ever been on the files of the court in this case.

In making up a transcript for the supreme court it is the custom of the clerk to first make out a list of the different papers on file, with the date of the file-mark, together with a minute of the docket entries.

This minute was also found, and the clerk was thus enabled to see that every paper had been found and to easily restore the docket entries.

Out of the many thousands of cases pending in the United States courts, we understand that this is the only one in which the complete case is preserved.

The supreme court has now reversed the case. It looks like a miraculous preservation for the purpose of reversal.

The counsel engaged in the case were Mr. Frederic Ullmann for complainant, and Messrs. Miller, Van Arman and Lewis for defendants.

Digitized by Google

The Pacific Railroad Tax Case.

We publish in this number an important decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire, determining that an act of the legislature exempting from taxation a "railroad," is violated by a subsequent constitutional ordinance imposing a tax upon its gross earnings. It is proper that we should here take occasion to correct what seems to be a gross misunderstanding in regard to the effect of this decision. One of the St. Louis daily papers has stated that this decision goes to the extent of declaring the tax imposed by the constitutional ordinance of 1865 on the Pacific, the North Missouri, and the St. Louis and Iron Mountain railroads utterly void. The court determined no such question, nor is the validity of the ordinance in question touched upon at all in the opinion which we elsewhere publish, except in so far as it conflicts with a previous legislative contract between the state and the Pacific Railroad Company. On the contrary, in the very recent case of The North Missouri R. R. Co. v. Maguire, the Supreme Court of the United States (opinion by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD) has expressly affirmed the validity of this ordinance. This opinion we shall probably publish at an early day.

The history of this litigation is briefly as follows: The cases of The North Missouri R. R. Co. v. Maguire and The Pacific R. R. Co. v. Maguire were argued together before the Supreme Court of Missouri at its March term, 1872. The former will be found reported in 49 Mo. 490, and the latter in 51 Mo. 142. The substantial question insisted on in behalf of the railroad companies in the Supreme Court of Missouri was that the constitutional ordinance of 1865, assessing a tax upon the gross earnings of these companies until 1868 of ten per cent., and thereafter of fifteen per cent., exceeded the general taxing power of the state and was repugnant to the constitution of the United States and void. The Supreme Court of Missouri, however, held in each of these cases that the constitutional ordinance in question was valid. In the Pacific Railroad case the additional point was ruled that there was nothing in the act of February 10, 1864, which amounted to a contract limiting the right of the state, through a constitutional ordinance, to impose the tax in question. These cases were taken by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, where, as we have before stated, the case of The North Missouri R. R. Co. v. Maguire (49 Mo. 490) was affirmed, Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivering the opinion. The Pacific Railroad case, however, stood upon a ground somewhat different. In that case, as will be seen from the opinion which we elsewhere publish, the legislature, by an act passed in 1852, exempted the "railroad" from taxation until it should declare a dividend, or, in case of failure to declare a dividend, until both its branches should have been completed for two years. The Supreme Court of the United States hold that the particular assessment in question having been levied before the road had been completed for two years, and before it had declared a dividend, was void, and that the constitutional ordinance afforded no warrant for this assessment, because in so far as it impaired the legislative contract it was invalid. The question of the effect of the exemption from taxation enacted by the act of 1852 was not raised at all in the Supreme Court of Missouri, but was urged for the first time in the Supreme Court of the United States; and as this was the only question passed upon in the latter court, it is seen the final decision, while it reverses as to the result, yet it in no sense overrules any position taken by the court below. If, however, the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice WAITE had prevailed, it would have precisely overruled the case in the court below. These cases, then, stand this way: The tax-collector may now go on and collect of the North Missouri Railroad Company the full tax authorized by the constitutional ordinance of 1865; and he may collect the same tax of the Pacific Railroad Company from the date of its first dividend, or from the date at which time both its branches had been completed to the state line for two years.

We regret to state that although we endeavored to get the full opinion in the Pacific Railroad case in time for publication in this issue, we have been obliged to print it as it appeared in one of the St. Louis papers. It is believed that an immaterial portion toward the close of the opinion is omitted.

Liability for Loss of Property through Deviation from Terms of Contract—Proximate and Remote Cause.

We find in advance sheets of 23 Ohio State Reports, sent us by the publishers, Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, the interesting case of Daniels v. Ballentine, p. 532, presenting a very clear discussion of the above question. The defendants contracted to tow the plaintiff's barge, by means of a steam tug, from Bay City, Michigan, to Buffalo, New York. After the voyage had been commenced and been partly performed it was voluntarily suspended and delayed by defendants, the barge during the delay being exposed to none of the perils peculiar to the voyage. After the voyage was resumed, and while it was being duly prosecuted, a storm was encountered by which the barge was lost. Upon these facts it was held that the defendants, by the mere fact of the delay, did not become responsible for the loss of the barge, although the delay was unreasonable and unnecessary, and although, as the event proved, the barge, but for the delay, would probably have been safely towed to its place of destination. In such case the storm must be regarded as the proximate, and the delay as only the remote, cause of the loss.

Mr. Justice STONE, who delivered the opinion of the court, after discussing at some length the general principles applicable to the question of proximate cause of damage, said: "In the present case the route which defendants were necessarily to pursue in the performance of their contract, lay through Lakes Huron and Erie, and the rivers or straits connecting those waters. The delay is said in argument to have occurred in the St. Clair river. The record is silent upon this subject, but it appears that the voyage was, for the time, wholly suspended. After the delay, the barge was again taken in tow, and the voyage was resumed. It is, perhaps, fairly to be inferred that the barge was, in the meantime, in a place of safety, but upon this subject it is sufficient to say that it does not appear nor is it claimed that it was exposed during the delay to any of the perils incident to the voyage. Nor does it appear from any fact or circumstance in the case, that there was any reason to apprehend that the perils to be encountered in completing the voyage would be increased by the delay. No fault is imputed to the defendants in resuming the voyage at the time they did, and it does not appear that in anything which subsequently occurred they failed in any respect in the performance of their duty. The storm which caused the loss of the barge was encountered after the delay and while the voyage, after it had been resumed, was being duly prosecuted. As the event proved, the storm would not have been encountered if no delay had occurred, but this was merely a fortuitous result. It was not a consequence which "arose naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things," from the particular breach of contract complained of. Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341. The two events had, in the nature of things, no natural or necessary connection. It was, for aught that appears, as reasonable to expect that the delay would be the means of avoiding extraordinary peril in the further prosecution of the voyage as it was to expect a contrary result. And while it is true, as the event proved, that the storm which caused the loss would not have been encountered if there had been no delay, it is at the same time evident that if the delay had been greater, and the default of the defendants in that respect more flagrant than it was, the same favorable result would have followed.

Digitized by Google

"The delay, therefore, can not be regarded as the proximate cause of the loss. It constituted a breach of the contract, and for any injury naturally resulting therefrom the defendants were clearly responsible; but except by a conjunction, which there was no reason to anticipate, and which was merely fortuitous with a subsequent event, it had no agency in causing the loss of the barge. Of that loss the storm was the proximate and sufficient cause. Morrison v. Davis, 20 Penn. St. 171; Denny v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 13 Gray, 481; Railroad Co. v. Reeves, 10 Wall. 176.

"It is contended, however, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the defendants are responsible on another ground. The delay, it is said, constituted in law a deviation which would have discharged the underwriter if the barge had been insured; and assuming that the defendants would, in that case, in the further prosecution of the voyage, have taken upon themselves all the risks covered by the policy, it is claimed that the plaintiffs, being their own insurers, are entitled to all the remedies they would have had if the barge had been insured by others.

"A deviation has, it is true, in some circumstances the effect to put an end to the contract of insurance, but in such cases the underwriter is discharged, not because the risks are increased, but because they are not the risks he contracted to assume. So long as the risks are varied, it is wholly immaterial whether they are increased or not. If, then, the defendants are responsible on the ground contended for, they would be equally responsible although it should be made clearly to appear that if there had been no delay, the same or even a worse storm would have been encountered. In short, the plaintiffs would in that case be enabled, by reason of the delay, to recover the value of the barge without averring, or being able to aver, that the delay caused the loss or operated in any way to their injury. The delay occurring, they would thus, without cost, secure the benefit of an insurance for the remainder of the voyage.

"If the barge had been insured against the peril by which its loss was occasioned, and it could be shown that the insurer was discharged by reason of the delay, a different question would have been presented. In such case, the facts being known to the defendants, the loss of the policy might well be held to be the proximate consequence of their wrongful conduct, but in such case the ground of the action would not be the loss of the barge, but the discharge of the underwriter, by reason of which the plaintiffs were deprived of the indemnity which they would otherwise have been able to obtain."

Taxation for the Payment of Railway-Aid Bonds —Effect of Legislative Restriction on the Power of Taxation.

The case of The State ex rel. Aull v. Macon County, which we publish on another page, presents an interesting feature in the great volume of litigation which has grown out of the bonds of municipal corporations issued in aid of railway enterprises. The opinion of Mr. Justice ADAMS presents the single question in the case in a clear light and with commendable brevity. The case simply was that the special act under authority of which the bonds in suit were issued, and which was recited on the face of the bonds as the authority for their issuance, and thus brought to the notice of the purchaser, restricted the amount of tax which should be levied in any one year for the purpose of paying the bonds, to one-twentieth of one per cent. upon the assessed valuation of the taxable property in the county. The county court had shown no disposition toward repudiation, but had exercised its power of taxation for the purpose of meeting the principal and interest of these bonds to the full extent of the grant of power to tax in the special act authorizing their issuance, and by so doing had succeeded in paying the interest from year to year, and also in providing a fund of $12,500 towards the liquidation of the principal. Having done this, they had exhausted their power, until the return of the period for apportioning a tax for the subsequent year. This being their position, it would seem that nothing could be plainer than that a mandamus would not lie to compel them to do what the law expressly restrained them from doing.

The general statute referred to by the court confers a general and unrestricted power of taxation for the purpose of paying the principal and interest of county bonds issued in aid of railways, in the following terms: "Any county court or city which has heretofore subscribed to the capital stock of any railroad in this state shall be entitled to the privileges and subject to the liabilities of other stockholders in such company, and the county court or city council shall have all the rights and powers to provide funds to pay such subscription, as are granted to county courts and cities by this act, and may levy a special tax to pay the interest on their bonds, or to provide a sinking fund to pay the principal." Revised laws 1855, p. 429, § 34. It will be seen that the court does not stop to discuss the effect of this statute. The principle that a special statute, operating particularly upon a given subject matter, excludes the operation of a general statute, where the two are inconsistent with each other, is so elementary and familiar that the learned judge doubtless deemed it unnecessary to direct particular attention to it.

What, then, is the status of the bona fide purchaser for value before maturity of these bonds? It is simply a case where, at the time he purchased the bonds, he was charged with notice by a recital on their face of a restriction on the power of taxation granted for the purpose of securing the payment of the principal and interest of the same. Having such notice, it was manifestly incumbent upon him, as a prudent man, to consult the records of the county and ascertain therefrom the amount of bonds of this particular series which had been issued, as well as the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the county, and from these data to compute the probabilities of the county court being able, with its power of taxation for this particular purpose thus restricted, to meet the yearly interest, and in five years to raise a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal. Having received adequate notification of the restriction on the power of taxation subject to which these bonds were issued, it can not be claimed that this decision works any fraud against the innocent purchaser, but it would rather seem to be a case where the rule of caveat emptor applies in its full extent.

Digitized by Google

There appears to be nothing in this opinion, or in the conduct of the Macon County Court, which savors of repudiation. The amount of bonds of this series which was issued subject to this restricted power of taxation may have been, and doubtless was, improvident. Doubtless the county judges overstepped the mark in estimating the increase in the taxable wealth of the county which would accrue from the completion of the road in favor of which the bonds were issued, as well as from other causes. But the bonds will no doubt be paid. If, however, they are not again funded, and if no further legislation is obtained increasing the power of taxation applicable to them, their liquidation will take time, and the bondholders who have purchased these securities hastily and improvidently must wait.

The Macon county case would seem to be a much stronger case than that of Carroll County v. Reynolds, which it cites and relies on. There the securities in question were ordinary county warrants, issued to meet the current expenses of the county, and which the holders of them, in the first instance, were probably compelled to take or take nothing, and the restriction upon the power of taxation was by a general law. There would seem to be a hardship in that case, consisting in the fact that the county supervisors were upheld in exhausting their power of taxation to meet "current expenses" accruing while "current expenses" already accrued were for the time being repudiated—as though a man is under a greater obligation to provide the means of paying a debt which he expects to contract to-morrow than to pay one which he did contract yesterday. But in the Macon county case the purchasers of the bonds were notified in a peculiar manner of the infirmity to which they were subject, and the fact that the power of taxation granted in the particular instance has proved inadequate, works no injustice to them. They simply get what they bargained for—no more, no less.

What the result of a case of this kind would be in case of a fraudulent assessment, whereby the taxable property of the county were rated below its real value, would seem to present a very different question, and one where the bondholders would probably be entitled to relief upon principles of equity. No such question, however, appears to have arisen in the Macon county case.

We understand that it has been strenuously urged on behalf of the holders of the Macon county bonds that the present decision amounts to a judicial breach of faith, inasmuch as the Supreme Court of Missouri had decided in 1867 in The State ex rel., etc., v. Macon County Court, 41 Mo. 453, that the subscription to the stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, in pursuance of which these bonds were issued, was a valid subscription. It is hence urged that these bonds went out to the money-markets of the world impressed in a peculiar manner with the sanction of the highest tribunal of the state, and that the present decision, ignoring the effect of the former, virtually repudiates them. It is thought that this is an entire misapplication of the case in 41 Missouri. That case, as we read it, simply decided that the charter privilege of receiving the subscription without a vote of the people was not repealed by a subsequent constitutional inhibition against such subscriptions, and that this particular issue of bonds was not rendered invalid by reason of such an inhibition. In the first sentences of the opinion in that case, delivered by Mr. Justice WAGNER, the 13th section of the charter of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company is quoted. That section contains the very limitation on the power of taxation for the payment of these bonds, which is held to constitute a defence in the present action. So far, therefore, as that decision could have any effect upon the present question, it operated as an additional notice to the purchasers of these bonds that they were issued subject to the infirmity from which the bondholders are now suffering. Besides, the court in the present case expressly declare the validity of these bonds, and that the circumstance of the issue having been excessive does not render them invalid. There appears to be nothing in the opinion in the present case which excludes the idea that these bonds are valid and must be paid as soon as the limited taxing power granted for that purpose will permit.

Effect of the War upon Deeds of Trust.

The very important and interesting question of the effect of the late war upon deeds of trust given upon property situated in one of the loyal states as a security for unpaid purchase-money, the borrower residing in one of the Confederate States, has just received an exposition in the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case of De Jarnette v. De Giverville. The plaintiffs purchased from the defendants certain real estate in the city of St. Louis and gave their notes for the purchase-money, secured by a deed of trust. The notes were payable in one, two, three and four years, the last becoming payable on the 30th day of April, 1861. They failed to pay the last note when due, and, in consequence, the property conveyed by the deed of trust was sold by the trustee on the 9th of June, after publication of notice, as required by the deed. This action was brought to annul the sale and the deed made in pursuance thereof. It was alleged in the plaintiffs' petition that all the notes were paid except that which matured on the 30th of April, 1861, and that the plaintiffs were ready and willing to pay this also, but were prevented by a state of war existing at that time between the United States of America, of which Missouri was a part, and the Confederate States, of which Virginia was a part; and that the plaintiffs were, in 1857 and in 1861, and during the whole of the war which followed, citizens and residents of the county of Caroline, Virginia. By reason of the war existing it was alleged that the notice and sale under the deed of trust were fraudulent and void. It was averred that as soon as peace was restored the plaintiffs tendered to the purchaser of the land the amount due under the deed of trust, which was refused, and they prayed that the deed made by the trustees under the sale of June 9, 1861, be set aside and annulled. To this petition the defendants demurred, assigning for causes of demurrer that the petition showed no cause of action; that it appeared that at the time the default was made there was no suspension of intercourse between the citizens of Virginia and those of Missouri, and that even when the sale was made under the deed of trust there was no such suspension, and that there was no excuse for the non-payment of the note of the plaintiffs. The court below overruled the demurrer and gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the case was brought by writ of error to the Supreme Court for review.

Digitized by Google

It is thus seen that the only substantial difference between this case and the case of The Washington University v. Finch, published in this journal (ante, p. 66) consists in the question whether a state of non-intercourse existed at the date of the sale. But in the view the court take of the case, this question becomes immaterial; because it is held, upon the assumption that a state of non-intercourse did exist, that it did not invalidate the sale. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice WAGNER—VORIES and SHERWOOD, JJ., concurring, and ADAMS and NAPTON, JJ., dissenting. In the outset it is fully admitted that "since the decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of The Venice, 2 Wall. 258, 274; Mrs. Alexander Cotton, 2 Wall. 404, 419; Mauran v. Insurance Co., 6 Wall. 1, 14; The Ouachita Cotton, 6 Wall. 521, 530–31; Hunger v. Abbott, 6 Wall. 532–35; Coppell v. Hall, 7 Wall. 542, 554; McKee v. The United States, 8 Wall. 163, 166; and The United States v. Grossmayer, 9 Wall. 72—the question must be regarded as settled, that the late war between the Confederate States and the United States was a public war, and a war not only between the respective governments, but between all the inhabitants of the one territory on the one side and all the inhabitants of the other territory on the other side; so that all the people of each occupied the respective positions of enemies during the continuance of the war."

The court, however, rest their conclusion that the intervention of a war before the last note became due, which made intercourse unlawful between the grantor and grantee in the deed of trust, did not operate to suspend the power of the latter to sell, upon the familiar principle that while an alien enemy can not sue a friendly citizen in the courts of the latter's country, yet that no reason or policy forbids judicial proceedings against an alien enemy in favor of a friendly citizen, and hence, that while an alien enemy may not sue, yet he is liable to be sued. This doctrine is enforced and illustrated by the following authorities: Mixer x. Sibley, 53 Ill. 61; Dorsey v, Kyle, 30 Md. 512; Thomas v. Mahone (Kentucky Court of Appeals), 12 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 433; Crutcher v. Hord, 4 Bush, 363; McVeigh v. United States, 11 Wall. 259. The court distinguished this case from that class of cases represented by Dean v. Nelson, 10 Wall. 158, and Ludlow v. Ramsey, 11 Wall. 581, where the mortgagee had been driven by military force within the confederate lines.

Having rested the conclusion of the court upon this ground, the learned judge proceeds to say: "But there is another aspect in which this case must be considered, and which is really the principal point, and upon which I would have been satisfied to have placed it had not the counsel for the defendants in error, plaintiffs in the court below, insisted in their briefs that the war produced an entire suspension of all proceedings whatever between the citizens of the respective sides, and avoided all judicial process. The sale was made under a deed of trust containing an agreement that in default of payment when the notes matured, the trustee, upon giving the requisite notice, should proceed to sell the property to satisfy the debt. It contained a power coupled with an interest, which was irrevocable in its character, and when the contingency arose calling forth its execution, the trustee was authorized to execute it regardless of the status of the grantors at the particular time. So, as far as the authority of the trustee was concerned to go on and make a sale of the property in satisfaction of the debt, it made no difference whether the grantors were in the confederate lines or in the jungles of India, or even if they were dead. It may be conceded that they were in a place or in a condition where it was physically impossible for notice to reach them, but that would not alter the case, as the notice was not designed to be given for their benefit in the sense of notice to them. It was intended to notify the community that the sale would take place, in order that bidders might be present to purchase the property."

This position of the court is illustrated by Beatie v. Butler, 21 Mo. 213, where the grantor in a mortgagee with power of sale died before the sale, and it was held that the sale was nevertheless valid. The opinion then cites as directly in point the case of Harper v. Ely, 56 Ill. 179, and Washington University v. Finch, 1 CENT. LAW JOUR. 66. Judge WAGNER quotes at length from the opinion of Mr. Justice MILLER in the last named case, and declares that it presents an argument unanswerable, and so remarkably clear and satisfactory that nothing remains to be added. The judgment of the court below was therefore reversed and the petition dismissed.

In this connection it may be interesting to note what appears to be the chief argument adduced in opposition to the conclusion reached by the court in the case here considered. The whole force of it was given in a few sentences in the brief drawn by John E. Jones, Esq., of St. Louis, and filed by Hon. W. H. Letcher, of Virginia, in the Washington University case, supra:

"It is contended that the deed of trust in this case containing a power of sale and providing the manner of giving notice, is not within the rule laid down in the cases heretofore decided by this court. But there is no ground for the distinction sought to be made. In the first place, the sale could only be made when the notes became lawfully due and payable and default was made in the payment of the same. But the notes had not become due and lawfully payable, for the law intervened and prohibited the debtor from paying and the creditor from receiving, and how can it be that the notes are payable lawfully? If the money had been forwarded by the debtor and it reached him, he could not have applied it to payment of the notes, but should turn it over to the district attorney, whose duty it was made especially to enforce the proclamation of the president. The debtors were no way in default. No laches can be imputed to them. The law interfered and prevented the payment, and the statute of limitations would not run under such circumstances. Hunger v. Abbott, 6 Wall. 532. Are they at fault for not doing what the law would not permit them to do? Is it necessary to do more than to state the proposition?"

Digitized by Google

This language certainly presents a strong argument and one which might well give rise to doubts and dissenting views. If the intervention of a war made it unlawful for the debtor to pay and the creditor to receive, how can it be said that the debtor was in default? And if the debtor was in no default, how can it be said that the event had transpired which warranted the trustee in executing the power of sale?

The cases of De Jarnette v. De Giverville, and The Washington University v. Finch, give additional strength to deeds of trust in Missouri as securities for money lent, and possess peculiar interest to those seeking to invest money on real-estate security in this state.

Taxation of Railway Earnings.—Legislative Exemption from Taxation.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY v. CONSTANTINE MAGUIRE.

Supreme Court of the United States, April, 1874.

1. Taxation of Railway Earnings—Effect of Legislative Exemption—The legislature of Missouri, by an act passed in 1852, enacted that "the Pacific Railroad and Southwestern Branch Railroad shall be exempt from taxation, respectively, until the same shall be completed, opened and in operation and shall declare a dividend, when the road-bed, buildings, machinery, engines, cars and other property of such complete road, at the cash value thereof, shall be subject to taxation at the rate assessed by the state on other real and personal property of like value. * * * "Provided, That if said company shall fail for the period of two years after said roads, respectively, shall be completed and put in operation to declare a dividend, then the said company shall no longer be exempt from the payment of the said tax," etc. By a constitutional ordinance adopted in 1865, it was ordained that "there shall be levied and collected from the Pacific Railroad [and certain other railroads] an annual tax of ten per centum of all their gross receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers, * * * from the first of October, 1866, to the first of October, 1868, and fifteen per centum thereafter; which shall be assessed and collected in the county of St. Louis, in the same manner as other taxes are assessed and collected, and shall be appropriated by the general assembly to the payment of the principal and interest now due, or hereafter to become due, upon the bonds of the state and the bonds guaranteed by the state, issued to the aforesaid railroad companies," etc. Under this ordinance the defendant assessed in 1866 a tax against the Pacific Railroad Company of ten per centum upon its gross earnings before it had declared a dividend, and before two years from the date of its completion had elapsed. Upon these facts it is held:

(1.) That the act of 1852 created a contract between the state and the railroad company by which the railroad was exempt from taxation until it should declare a dividend on its capital stock, not, however, extending longer than two years after its completion

(2.) That the ordinance of 1865, imposing a tax of ten per centum upon the gross earnings before the road was completed and in operation, and before it had declared a dividend, was a violation of this contract, and that the levy for its enforcement was illegal.

2. —— Tax upon Gross Receipts.—A contract not to tax a railroad company or its property is broken by the levy of a tax upon its gross receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinions.—The chief justice concurred in the result, but was of opinion that the assessment complained of was not a tax, but the exaction of payment of a debt due, and, as such, inconsistent with the act of February 10, 1864, which was a contract between the state and the company. Mr. Justice CLIFFORD and Mr. Justice MILLER dissented on the ground that the act of 1852 did not exempt the company from the tax imposed by the ordinance

In error in the Supreme Court of the state of Missouri.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action against a tax collector who levied upon property to collect a tax imposed by virtue of an ordinance adopted July 4, 1865, as a part of the constitution of the state of Missouri. The action was tried by the circuit court of St. Charles county upon an agreed state of facts, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff below. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Missouri, where the judgment in the circuit court was reversed, and judgment final was rendered to the effect that the tax was constitutionally and legally collectible from the company. From this judgment the company brings error to this court.

The first question is this: By the acts organizing this company, and by the acts loaning the credit of the state, and the proceedings under the same, was an agreement created on the part of the state that the Pacific Road should not be taxed until it was built and finished and had declared a dividend, and that for two years after it was finished it should be liable to taxation only in common with other property in the state at the same rate?

The right of taxation is a sovereign right, and presumptively belongs to the state in regard to every species of property, and to an unlimited extent. The right may be waived in particular instances, but this can only be done by a clear expression of the legislative will. Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall. 469; Tomlinson v. Jessup, Ib. 454.

The same authorities and many others referred to in those cases, show that when a contract of exemption from taxation is thus established it is binding upon the state, and the action of the state in the passage of the laws violating its terms will not be sustained. Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 481; Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 247, where the cases are collected. The principles of the law are sufficiently settled. The real question arises upon their application to the facts in the case.

By an act of March 12, 1849, the Pacific Railroad Co. was incorporated with a capital of ten millions of dollars, for the purpose of building a railroad from the city of St. Louis to a point in the western line of Van Buren county. Authority was given to the counties through which it should pass to subscribe for the stock, and it was invested also with the powers usually conferred upon such companies. By an act passed February 22, 1851, it was enacted that when $50,000 had been collected of the capital stock and expended in the survey and construction of the road, the bonds of the state to the same amount should be loaned to the road, and further loans were authorized not to exceed the sum of two millions of dollars.

By an act of December 25, 1852, certain public lands were vested in the company, and the company were authorized to build a branch road to the western boundary of the state south of the Osage river. Provision was made for the issue of an additional million of dollars of the bonds of the state to be used in aid of the work proposed, with precaution that subscriptions should have been made and should previously have been applied by the company to amounts stated, and that the bonds should not be sold at less than their par value, and that the road should be completed and put in operation within five years after the passage of the act. The twelfth section contained the following provisions: "The said Pacific Railroad and the Southwestern Branch Railroad shall be exempt from taxation respectively until the same shall be completed, opened and in operation and shall declare a dividend, when the road-bed, buildings, machinery, engines, cars and other property of such complete road, at the cash value thereof, shall be subject to taxation at the rate assessed by the state on other real and personal property of like value. * * * "Provided, that if said company shall fail for the period of two years after said roads respectively shall be completed and put in operation to declare a dividend, then the said company shall no longer be exempt from the payment of said tax, nor from the forfeitures and penalties in this section imposed.

This act and its grants were accepted by an instrument under seal and filed with the secretary of state in compliance with the fifteenth section of the same act.

The road was completed and put in operation on the first day of April, 1866, but no dividend had been declared or paid when the levy in question was made, and two years had not elapsed from the completion of the road. On the fourth day of July, 1865, the present constitution of Missouri, together with an ordinance known as the railroad ordinance as a part thereof, went into effect. The provisions of the ordinance pertinent to this case are as follows:

SECTION 1. There shall be levied and collected from the Pacific Railroad, the North Missouri Railroad Co., and the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Co., an annual tax of ten per centum of all their gross receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers (not including amounts received from and taxes paid to the United States) from the first of October, 1866, to the first of October, 1868, and fifteen per centum thereafter; which tax shall be assessed and collected, in the county of St. Louis, in the same manner as other taxes are assessed and collected; and shall be appropriated by the general assembly to the payment of the principal and interest now due, or hereafter to become due, upon the bonds of the state and the bonds guaranteed by the state, issued to the aforesaid railroad companies.

Digitized by Google

* * * * * * * *

SEC. 3. The tax in this ordinance specified shall be collected from each company hereinbefore named only for the payment of the principal and interest on the bonds for the payment of which such company shall be liable; and whenever such bonds and interest shall have been fully paid no further tax shall be collected from such company, but nothing shall be received by the state in discharge of any amounts due upon such bonds except cash or other bonds or obligations of the state.

SEC. 4. Should either of said companies refuse or neglect to pay said tax, as herein required, and the interest or principal of said bonds, or any part thereof, remain due and unpaid, the general assembly shall provide by law for the sale of the railroad and other property, and the franchises of the company that shall be thus in default, under the lien reserved to the state, and shall appropriate the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount remaining due and unpaid from said company.

In pursuance of this ordinance the defendant assessed a tax against the plaintiff for the year commencing October 1, 1866, of ten per cent. on $2,536,440, that being the gross earnings of the road for that year, which is the tax in question. By the agreed case it is stated that "this was assessed in the same manner as other state taxes were assessed in said county, ten per cent., as a tax under the ordinance hereafter recited, amounting to the sum of $253,644. Upon this state of the facts we are of the opinion, first, that the 12th section of the act of 1852 created a contract between the state and the railroad company by which the railroad was exempt from taxation until it was completed and put in operation, and until it shonld declare a dividend on its capital stock, not, however, extending longer than two years after its completion. Second, that the ordinance of 1865, imposing a tax of ten per cent. upon the gross earnings before the road was completed and in operation and had declared a dividend, was a violation of this contract, and the levy for its enforcement was illegal.

We omit a reference to other questions which have been argued, and express no opinion upon them. We base our opinion upon the effect of the statutes already cited.

The authorities which have been referred to show that a state legislature may make a contract to exempt a corporation from taxation by which it will be bound.

That the facts recited constitute such an agreement we think sufficiently plain. The Pacific corporation was unable to raise funds for completing its road. To induce it to go on with its work, and to induce individuals and counties to subscribe for what the legislature evidently deemed an enterprise of public benefit, it made loans of the credit of the state from time to time. To make the franchise still more valuable to the company, and to the end that individuals and counties should be induced to subscribe to the stock, the legislature added an exemption from taxation until the road should be completed and in operation, and should have declared a dividend. That the money value of this exemption was great is evident from the fact that the tax imposed for a single year, commencing October 1st, 1866, amounted to $253,644. This transaction amounted to a contract between the state and the corporation that there should be no taxation of the company until the occurrence of the stipulated events. Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 244; Wilmington R. R. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264.

In delivering the opinion in the last decided case, Mr. Justice DAVIS uses this language: "It has been so often decided by this court that a charter of incorporation granted by a state creates a contract between the state and the corporators, which the state can not violate, that it would be a work of supererogation to repeat the reasons on which the argument is founded. If the contract is plain and unambiguous, and the meaning of the parties can be clearly ascertained, it is the duty of the court to give effect to it the same as if it were a contract between private persons, without regard to its supposed injurious effects upon the public interests."

The statute of 1852 provided for an exemption from taxation of the "Pacific Railroad, its bed, and of its buildings, machinery, cars, and other property." The tax imposed by the ordinance of 1865 was an annual tax of ten per centum of all the gross receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers. It was directed "to be levied and collected from the Pacific Railroad." In Wilmington Railroad v. Reid (13 Wall. 264), it was held that a statute exempting all the property of a railroad company from taxation, exempts not only the rolling stock and real estate owned by it, and required by the company for the successful prosecution of its business, but its franchises also. In the case before us the road bed, buildings, and machinery, cars and other property not only, but the "Pacific Railroad" is declared to be exempt from taxation.

We can not doubt that a contract not to tax a railroad company or its property, is broken by the levy of a tax upon its gross receipts for the transportation of freight and passengers.

WAITE, Ch. J.—I concur in the judgment of the court which has just been announced, but not for the reasons assigned. If the assessments complained of is a tax, then I agree with a majority of the court in the opinion that it is a violation of the twelfth section of the act of December 25, 1852, and void. I think, however, it is not a tax, but an exaction of the payment of the debt due from the railroad company to the state, and as such, inconsistent with the provisions of the act of February 10, 1864, which, upon its acceptance by the company, became a contract between the parties, and binding upon each.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD—I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case, because the act of the legislature referred to does not, in my judgment, exempt the company from the tax imposed by the ordinance.

Mr. Justice MILLER also dissents upon the same ground.

JUDGMENT REVERSED.

Railway-Aid Bonds—Mandamus to Compel Levy of Tax after Judgment—Effect of a Restriction on the Power of Taxation in the Act Authorizing the Issue of the Bonds.

STATE EX REL. AULL AND POLLARD v. THE COUNTY COURT OF MACON COUNTY.

Supreme Court of Missouri, St. Louis, April 20, 1874.

Present, Hon. WASH. ADAMS, " DAVID WAGNER, " H. M. VORIES, " T. A. SHERWOOD, } Judges.

1. Railway-aid Bonds—Mandamus to Compel Levy of Tax where the Statutory Limit of Taxation has been Reached.—Where the special act under which county bonds have been issued in aid of a railway company, and which is recited on the face of the bonds, restricts the power of taxation for the purpose of paying the principal and interest of such bonds to the levying a tax of one-twentieth of one per cent. on the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the county, a mandamus will not lie at the suit of a bona fide holder for value of such bonds purchased before maturity, to compel the county court to levy a tax greater than the limit so fixed, for the purpose of paying the principal and interest of the same; and this, although there was at the time of the issue of such bonds, and still is, a general law authorizing county courts which have issued bonds to railway companies to levy taxes without limitation to pay the interest on such bonds and to provide a sinking fund to pay the principal.

Digitized by Google

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Macon County.

ADAMS, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an application for a mandamus to compel the County Court of Macon County to levy a tax to pay the principal and interest of several railroad bonds held by the relators as purchasers thereof for value before maturity, which bonds had been issued in payment of a subscription made by the county of Macon to the capital stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company. An alternatative mandamus was issued, to which defendants made their return, and the plaintiff filed a replication thereto, joining issue to the matter set up in the return.

Upon the final hearing the court found for the defendants, refused to make the mandamus absolute, and dismissed the petition. The plaintiff filed a motion for a rehearing, which was overruled, and the relators have brought the case here by appeal.

The county bonds referred to are in the following form:

"No. 1. Five years.

County of Macon, State of Missouri.

"$1,000. $1,000.

"Know all men by these presents, that the county of Macon, state of Missouri, acknowledges itself indebted to the Missouri & Mississippi Railroad Company (organized by an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri), or bearer, in the sum of $1,000, which sum the county promises to pay at the office of the county treasurer, in the city of Macon, Missouri, on the 16th day of September, 1872, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, which interest shall be payable annually on presentation of the coupons hereto annexed, at the office of the said county treasurer in the city of Macon, Mo. This bond being issued under and pursuant to orders of the County Court of Macon County for subscription to the stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, as authorized by an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, entitled 'an act to incorporate the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company,' approved February 20, 1865.

"In testimony whereof the said county of Macon has executed this bond by the presiding justice of the County Court of Macon County, under the order of said court, signing his name thereto, and by the clerk of said court, under the order thereof, attesting the same and affixing the seal of said court. This done at the city of Macon, county and state aforesaid, this 16th day of September, 1867.

[Macon Co. Seal.] JOHN FARRER, Clerk.

[Seal of Court.] A. C. ATTERBERRY,

Presiding Justice of the County Court of Macon County."

The coupons attached are in the usual form.

There is no controversy about the facts. The case was submitted on the alternative writ, the return of respondents, and the reply of relators. The following facts appear: The relators are bona fide holders for value of certain past-due bonds and coupons which are described in the writ, and which, as appears by recitals on the face of the bonds, were issued under orders of the County Court of Macon County for subscription to the capital stock of the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, as authorized by an act of the general assembly of Missouri, entitled "an act to incorporate the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company," approved February 20, 1865, and were delivered to said company in pursuance of a mandamus from this court. (See State ex rel. Missouri & Mississippi Railroad Company v. Judges Macon County Court, 41 Mo. 453.) The amount of bonds so issued and delivered was $175,000, but relators had no knowledge of the amount, nor do the bonds on their face disclose the amount. The subscription was made without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of Macon county. The county in 1867 received 1,750 shares of stock in said company, which it still holds and votes at all meetings of stockholders for the election of directors and for other purposes, and enjoys all the privileges of other stockholders. The county court has every year, from 1867 to 1872, levied upon and collected from the tax-payers of the county a tax of one-twentieth of one per cent. to pay interest, as stated by respondent. As stated by relators, it has levied taxes sufficient to pay the interest, together with $12,500 of the bonds themselves, as they matured. Respondents have refused to pay the bonds and coupons in suit, and have refused to levy the requisite tax beyond one-twentieth of one per cent.

It also appears that the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company accepted its charter and organized under it in April, 1866, that the only authority for issuing the bonds in suit was contained in the thirteenth section of the charter. (Sess. Acts 1865, p. 86.) "It shall be lawful for the corporate authorities of any city or town, the county court of any county desiring so to do, to subscribe to the capital stock of said company, and may issue bonds therefor, and levy a tax to pay the same, not to exceed one-twentieth of one per cent. upon the assessed value of the taxable property for each year." That the assessed value of property in said county in 1867 was $5,145,810; in 1868 was $5,304,644; in 1869 was $5,191,626; in 1870 was $4,874,467; in 1871 was $4,264,260, and in 1872 was $5,466,434.

It is conceded that a tax of one-twentieth of one per cent. has been levied, and that it is wholly insufficient to meet the bonds and interest now due.

The point for us to consider is whether the County Court of Macon County is prohibited by section thirteen of the charter of the railroad company above quoted, from levying, in any one year, a tax of more than one-twentieth of one per cent. upon the assessed value of the taxable property in the county.

There seems to be no restriction on the power of the county as to the amount of stock to be subscribed or the amount of bonds to be issued in payment of such subscription. Prudence, indeed, would dictate that the county court, in the exercise of its discretion, ought not to have subscribed any more stock or issued bonds to any greater amount than they had authority to raise funds by taxation to meet the annual interest on the bonds, and the principal when they matured. But this, in my judgment, was a matter of discretion, and an excessive issue beyond the means of payment, of itself, does not render the bonds void.

Section thirteen of the charter above referred to entered into and formed a part of the bonds themselves, and these bonds must receive the same construction as though this section had been set out in hæc verba on their face.

There can be no innocent holder so far as the restriction upon the power of taxation is concerned. Each bondholder takes it subject to this restriction, and he must ascertain for himself whether there has been an over-issue. The records of the county court will show the amount issued, and he can examine for himself as to the amount of taxable property in the county.

The language of section thirteen is plain and positive, and will hardly admit of any other than a literal construction. It reads that the county court "may issue bonds therefor and levy a tax to pay the same, not to exceed one-twentieth of one per cent. upon the assessed value of the taxable property for each year."

A county is a mere quasi corporation, having only such powers as are delegated to it by the legislature. The county court is the administrative agent of the county, and can only exercise such powers as are conferred on it by statute.

At the time this railroad charter was passed, the general law authorized the county courts which had issued bonds to railroad companies to levy taxes without limitation to pay the interest on their bonds, and to provide a sinking fund to pay the principal. (1 Revised Laws 1855, p. 429, sec. 34.) This provision was continued in the General Statutes of 1865, and is still the law of this state. And no doubt this provision would have entered into and formed a part of these bonds, and might have so entered into the obligations of the contract as to prevent a subsequent repeal by the legislature, if there had been no restriction contained in the special act authorizing this subscription. But the very law authorizing the issue of the bonds in question also limits the power of the county court to levy a tax beyond one-twentieth of one per cent. for their payment in any one year. This limitation was enacted, not for the bondholders, but for the benefit of the tax-payers, so that they might not be harassed with a railroad tax, in any one year, too grievous to be borne.

Digitized by Google

The only taxes that can be levied by counties are such as are provided for by statute. The power of taxation is a sovereign right, which belongs alone to the state, and which can only be exercised in pursuance of laws which are passed by the legislature for that purpose. There can be no such thing as an implied power in a county court to levy a tax The power must be clearly and expressly given by statute. We are called upon to compel the County Court of Macon county, by mandamus, to do what the law does not authorize, but expressly forbids. In my judgment, this mandamus was properly refused. The Board of Supervisors of Carroll County v. The United States ex rel John Reynolds, decided by the United States Supreme Court, at the October term, 1873, reported in the Western Jurist for January, 1874, was a case taken by a writ of error from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Iowa That case is very analogous to the one under review, and fully maintains the doctrines of this opinion. It is true two of the judges dissented, but not on the point involved in this case.

Let the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed. Judge NAPTON, having been of counsel below, not sitting. The other judges concur.

AFFIRMED.

Federal Court Practice — Abatement of Action against Officers of the Government—Mandamus.

UNITED STATES v. BOUTWELL.

Supreme Court of the United States, October Term, 1874.

1. Mandamus against Officer—Abatement.—In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, a mandamus against an officer of the government abates on his death or retirement from office, and his successor in office can not be brought in by way of amendment of the proceeding, or on an order for the substitution of parties.

2. Mandamus.—Office and nature of the remedy by mandamus considered by Mr. Justice STRONG

On motion. Mr. R. M. Corwine, in behalf of the owners of an order on the treasury of the United States, had applied to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a mandamus on the Hon G. S. Boutwell, then secretary of the treasury, to pay it. That court refused the mandamus, and the case was brought, on error, by the relators here. After it had got into this court Mr. Boutwell resigned his place of secretary, and the Hon. W. A. Richardson was appointed to it. Hereupon Mr. Corwine moved for leave to bring in and substitute Mr. Richardson on the record as the defendant in the place of Mr. Boutwell. It did not appear that any application had been made to Mr. Richardson, as secretary, to pay the draft. Mr. Richardson, by his counsel, opposed the motion.

Messrs R. M. and Q. Corwine, in support of the motion, cited The Sapphire, 11 Wall. 168; Maddox v. Graham, 2 Metcalf (Ky.) 56; Hollister and Smith v. The Judges, etc, 8 Ohio State, 201.

Mr. C. H. Hill, contra.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

The office of a writ of mandamus is to compel the performance of a duty resting upon the person to whom the writ is sent. That duty may have originated in one way or in another. It may, as is alleged in the present case, have arisen from the acceptance of an office which has imposed the duty upon its incumbent. But no matter out of what facts or relations the duty has grown, what the law regards and what it seeks to enforce by a writ of mandamus is the personal obligation of the individual to whom it addresses the writ. If he be an officer, and the duty be an official one, still the writ is aimed exclusively against him as a person, and he only can be punished for disobedience. The writ does not reach the office. It can not be directed to it. It is, therefore, in substance, a personal action, and it rests upon the averred and assumed fact that the defendant has neglected or refused to perform a personal duty, to the performance of which by him the relator has a clear right. Hence it is an imperative rule that previous to making application for a writ to command the performance of any particular act, an express and distinct demand or request to perform it must have been made by the relator or prosecutor upon the defendant, and it must appear that he refused to comply with such demand, either in direct terms or by conduct from which refusal can be conclusively inferred. (Tapping on Mandamus, 283.) Thus it is the personal default of the defendant that warrants impetration of the writ, and if a peremptory mandamus be awarded the cost must fall upon the defendant.

It necessarily follows from this that on the death or retirement from office of the original defendant, the writ must abate in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary. When the personal duty exists only so long as the office is held, the court can not compel the defendant to perform it after his power to perform has ceased And if a successor in office may be substituted, he may be mulcted in costs for the fault of his predecessor, without any delinquency of his own. Besides, were a demand made upon him, he might discharge the duty and render the interposition of the court unnecessary. At all events, he is not in privity with his predecessor, much less is he his predecessor's personal representative. As might be expected, therefore, we find no case in which such a substitution as is asked for now has ever been allowed in the absence of some statute authorizing it. On the contrary, after the statute of 9th Anne, chapter 20, section 1, it was the acknowledged doctrine in England that the rules and practice as to abatement by death, resignation or removal from office were the same in cases of mandamus as in personal actions. By that statute it was enacted that the prosecutor or relator may plead to or traverse all or any of the material facts averred in the return, the defendant having liberty to reply, take issue or demur, and it was directed that such further proceedings might be had as might have been had if the prosecutor had brought his action on the case for a false return. Thus mandamus became, in effect, a personal action against the defendant. See Chitty's General Practice, 3d ed., 1406–1409. This statute was in force in Maryland when the District of Columbia was a part of that state, and hence it is in force in the District now. Therefore, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, here a writ of mandamus must abate whenever the performance by the defendant of the personal duty it seeks to enforce has become impossible.

The law was changed to some extent in England by the later act of parliament of 1 William IV., chap. 21, sec. 5, by which it was enacted that in case the return to any writ (of mandamus) within the purview of the act should, in pursuance of an allowance made by it, be expressed to be made on behalf of any other person than the defendant, the further proceedings on such writ should not abate or be discontinued by death, resignation or removal from office of the person who made such return, but the same might be continued and carried on in the name of such person, and if a peremptory writ should be awarded, it might be directed to any successor of such person in office or right. No similar statute exists with us, and its enactment in England was a recognition of the rule that the death, resignation, or removal from office of the defendant worked an abatement of the action. It required a statute to change the rule, and to avoid injustice, the costs of the writ, when issued and obeyed, were committed to the discretion of the court.

And even the retirement of the defendant from office, and his consequent inability to perform the act demanded to be done, does not abate the writ, or necessitate its discontinuance; there is still an insuperable difficulty in the way of our directing the substitution asked for. We can exercise only appellate power. We have no original jurisdiction in the case Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137; Kendall v. United States, 12 Peters, 526. But any summons issued, or rule upon Mr. Richardson requiring him to become a party to the suit, would be the exercise of original jurisdiction over both a new party and a new cause, for a duty which he would be required to perform would be his own, not that of his predecessor.

Digitized by Google

MOTION DENIED.

NOTE.—In many of the states their liberal statutes of amendments apply, either in terms or by judicial construction, to the writ of mandamus and the proceedings under it. The principal case relates to an official duty which rests upon the officer to whom the writ is directed. The Secretary v. McGarrahan, 9 Wall. 298. But where a duty rests upon a municipal corporation, it has been held that there is, in certain cases, an option to direct the writ either to the corporation in its corporate name (serving it upon the officers who have the power to perform its command), or to those officers whose duty it is to execute it, by their official designation. Tapping, 315, 317; Dillon Munic. Corp. sec. 699.

As to the effect of a change in the membership of a municipal council pending proceedings in mandamus against the council, and that the proceedings do not thereby abate, see Maddox v. Graham, 2 Metc. (Ky) 56, 63, 71; Louisville v. McKean, 18 B. Mon. 9, 13; Soutter v. Madison, 15 Wis. 30; Pegram v. Commiss., etc., 65 Nor. Car. 114. Dillon Munic. Corp., sec. 712 and cases cited.

Actions against National Banks in the Federal Courts—Local Jurisdiction.

W. S. MAIN, ASSIGNEE, v. SECOND NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.

United States District Court, Western District of Wisconsin, April 21, 1874.

Before Hon. JAMES C. HOPKINS, District Judge.

1. Suits against National Banks in Federal Courts—Territorial Jurisdiction.—In a suit in one of the federal district courts against a national bank whose habitat is in another district, jurisdiction is not acquired by service of summons on the cashier of such bank, who happens to be found within the district in which the suit is brought.

H. S. Orton and W. F. Vilas, for plaintiff; Tenneys, Flower & Abercrombie, for defendant.

HOPKINS, J.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, an assignee in bankruptcy, against the Second National Bank of Chicago, Illinois.

The suit was commenced by the service of summons upon the cashier, who was found within this district. The defendant moves to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction, because the defendant bank is located in Chicago, Illinois, and not within the western district of Wisconsin. In the argument filed in support of the motion it is claimed that a national bank can not be sued in any court out of the judicial district wherein it is "located" or "established." I do not think the general banking law admits of such an interpretation. The eighth section of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Statutes at Large, 101), provides that such corporations "may sue or be sued in any court of law and equity as fully as natural persons." I do not think the provision in the 57th section of the act restrictive of the general authority, but that it was intended rather to enlarge the operation of the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (U. S. Statutes at Large, 78), and to confer upon such organizations the right to sue and be sued in the federal courts in the district where located by a citizen of the same district; and I fully concur with Judge BLATCHFORD'S views contained in his opinion in The Manufacturer's National Bank of Chicago v. Baack, 8 Blatch. C. C. 137, that the banks organized under the general banking act of congress are to be deemed residents or inhabitants of the state or district where they are "located" and "established." The provisions of the act referred to by him are sufficient to warrant that conclusion, and if this were the only point, I should have no hesitancy in overruling the motion. But there is a question arising under the provisions of the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, which, as interpreted by numerous decisions of the federal courts, seems to me to constitute an insuperable objection to the plaintiff's right to prosecute this defendant in this court. That section provides that "no civil suit shall be brought before either of the courts (circuit or district) against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ." That the defendant was not an "inhabitant" of this district when this suit was commenced, is too plain for discussion. The remaining question is, was the defendant "found" here at that time? The defendant, as before stated, was "located" at Chicago; that was its habitat. That does not move around with the person of its officers; the corporation is not migratory. It could not, of its own will and without authority of law, change its location to this state. Therefore I must hold that this court has no jurisdiction over this defendant; that it was not "found" here within the meaning of that statute. In the case of The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters, 589, the court, in speaking of locality of corporations, says: "It must dwell in the place of its creation, it can not migrate to another sovereignty." This, it is true, was said of a state bank, but the same may, with equal propriety, may be said of a national bank. They have a local habitation—a place of business within a state or district—as much as a state bank. Justice NELSON, in Day v. Newark India-rubber Manuf. Co., 1 Blatchford, 628, and in Pomeroy v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 4 Blatchford, 120, examined this question very fully, and arrived at the conclusion in both cases—notwithstanding there was a statute of the state of New York authorizing service to be made upon officers of such foreign company within the state, which would give the state courts jurisdiction of the corporations; that the corporations were not "inhabitants" of the state, and were not "found" there because their officers or agents resided or came into that district; that the officers were not the corporations, and the corporations were not, therefore, found within the district. This is a jurisdictional question, and "state laws can confer no authority on this court in the exercise of its jurisdiction, by the use of state process, to reach either person or property, which it could not reach within the meaning of the law creating it." Toland v. Sprague, 12 Peters, 328. I do not think the practice act of June 1, 1872 (17 Statutes at Large, p. 196), changes the rule. That relates to the practice and proceedings in suits against parties who may be prosecuted in the federal courts, but does not profess to enlarge the jurisdiction or to extend it over persons or cases not before within the cognizance of the court. As said in Tolond v Sprague, supra, p. 330, "The acts of congress adopting the state process adopt the form and mode of service only so far as the persons are rightfully within the reach of such process, and did not intend to enlarge the sphere of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts." I think the same construction should be given to the act of 1872 above mentioned; and so construed, it does not relieve the case of the question of the habitat of the defendant being without the district, and not, therefore, subject to the process of this court. The motion is therefore granted and the suit dismissed.

SUIT DISMISSED.

Taking Liberties with the Court—Compulsory Payment.

A correspondent in Boston sends us a brief which was submitted to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in a notable case, and which we print below. The counsel for the defence in the case, who drew it, we believe usually writes over the nom de plume of Pelham. The rule is to hand the briefs to the judges before the arguments are begun, which was done in this case. After an inspection by the late chief justice and one of his associates, and a consultation between the two, in which much concern was apparent, the brief was returned to the counsel with the remark that it was not a proper brief to be read by the judges. We should agree with Mr. Pelham, that the case is interesting, not to speak of the affecting part. Trial by jury was waived, and the case was heard before the chief justice of the Superior Court, who found the payment was voluntary and entered a verdict for the defendant. The full court, however, upon argument, overruled him and decided that the payment was compulsory. Opinion by CHAPMAN, C. J. The opinion was especially unsatisfactory to the labor party. An appeal, as we believe is rarely the case in Massachusetts, was taken to the newspapers. The case excited much comment, ending, however, as such appeals usually end. The opinion was supposed to be in conflict with one given by the late Chief Justice SHAW, some years previously, in a somewhat similar case—Commonwealth v. Hunt and others, 4 Met. 111—in which the report says the case supposes the defendants were not bound by contract, but free to work for whom they pleased, or not to work at all if they so prefer. And as in that case, so in this, it was argued that since each one of the defendants had a right to quit the plaintiff's employment when he pleased, all must have that right. Judge SHAW had also said, in the case of Hunt and others above, that a conspiracy must be a combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means. But here there was no combination to violate a contract. It was said this distinction had been lost sight of in this case. A note at the end of the report says, after this opinion was given the case was settled by the parties. Our correspondent says this is true; but, he adds, it was settled by the plaintiff withdrawing his suit and paying his own cost, and the costs of the defendants likewise. As for the brief, we suppose that Mr. Pelham thought

Digitized by Google

"'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume."

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

SUFFOLK, SS.

CAREW vs. RUTHERFORD et als.

DEFENDANTS' BRIEF.

The story of this case is interesting and affecting.

There was a man whose name was Carew, and he was a stonecutter and had a shop at South Boston, and he had contracted to furnish a great many stones, curiously cut, to Father Lyndon, who was then building the great Roman Catholic Cathedral. And this stonecutter was in need of other men, skilled in such stone-cutting, to cut these stones. And there was, at the same time, in Boston, an association of journeymen stonecutters. And most of the workmen of the best skill in that branch of industry in the city belonged to that association. The end in contemplation by the association, as set forth in the preamble, was "civilization." It was expected to reach it by "marching thereto hand in hand," stopping only occasionally on the way to "embrace the advantages which are to be derived from a thorough knowledge of business throughout this land." When in the autumn the swallows are about to take their flight to a better winter land, they assemble. Then together wing their way. Alone and unaided, few would survive the peril of the route. But how true it is, though the infinite is man's aim, the indefinite only, alas! is his right.

The constitution, or articles of association, provided, among other things, it should be especially the duty of the members to aid apprentices in acquiring a knowledge of "ornamental work." And to this end these articles further provided, that no such work begun in one yard should be sent away to be finished in another. Then, for the due enforcement of the articles of this constitution, it was still further provided, that in case any stonecutter should do any act injurious to the trade or association, he should be taken and deemed to be a "scab," and his shop should be styled a "scab shop," and the men who, after this sentence, continued to work for him, were to be denounced as "inveterate scabs." I suppose this word "inveterate" was used to imply long-continued—on the principle, doubtless, that so great a crime could only be committed by one who had been long in criminal practice. There were some minor penalties to be imposed on the journeymen for simple misdemeanors, but none other on the employers. There was to be provided a fund for the sick and the ikers. And to prevent possible misapprehension, perhaps I ought to state, these strikers were not at all men who smote with their hands, but men who, in certain conditions, refused to use their hands to labor, preferring rather to suffer hunger and cold, like the old lady, who is said to have observed, "My daughter had rather cry than pick up chips."

Now it happened that this Mr. Carew sent his ornamental work, as it was called, away to be finished. This was reported to the association. The association chose a committee to enquire into the fact. The committee enquired. The fact was established. It was deemed to be injurious to the trade and to the association. He was adjudged to be a "scab," and his shop was a "scab" shop. His workmen left him.

The association voted it would take $500 as an "initiation fee," and remove the scab, if he so elected. He asked for a hearing. A hearing was granted to him. He humbly represented he had always been a good association man, and begged that the doom might be made less. The association adhered. The scab remained; and there was, moreover, a sore under the scab. He could not get skilled workmen to do his work. Nobody threatened him. There was no force or menace of force. No compulsion. Men said simply, "We won't work;" and they gave him a bad name. He laid his grief in the balance. There was a teasing desire. Scratching did not help it. It needed an ointment, and the price of that ointment was $500. The situation was not pleasant. He looked at his money and he looked at the scab. Whether it were better to part with both or to keep both? He took ten days to consider this question, and then made up his mind, what there was of it, to pay $500; and he paid it. And lo! the scab was removed!

A year and more passed, and Mr. Carew seeks to recover this money back. Jury was waived, and the judge who tried the case found the payment was voluntary, made under no mistake of facts, no duress of person or property, and no compulsion, but because the plaintiff deemed that his interest would be promoted by paying it. I cite Cunningham v. City of Boston, 15 Gray, 468; ——— v. Munroe, ——— 471.

Recent Decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

[Compiled by Henry N. Sheldon, Esq., of the Boston Bar.]

Judgment—Estoppel.—The surety in a recognizance given by a judgment debtor, reciting the recovery of the judgment, can no more avoid the judgment by plea and proof than the original debtor. Way v. Lewis. Plaintiff recovered judgment against J. S. on a promissory note, and caused his body to be arrested on execution thereon. The judgment debtor, under a statute, recognized with surety to surrender himself for examination as to his estate. This condition being broken, the plaintiff brought suit on the recognizance against J. S. or his surety. The surety offered to show that J. S. had paid the judgment before judgment, and that plaintiff had taken the note in violation of an agreement with J. S. Held, that the evidence was inadmissible. Ib.

Witness—Criminal.—A person accused of a crime and voluntarily testifying in his own behalf under a statute allowing him so to do, waives thereby his privilege of not being compelled to criminate himself. Commonwealth v. Nichols.

Defendant was indicted for adultery alleged to have been committed with J. S. in Middlesex county. At the trial he testified in his own behalf that he had never committed adultery with her in Middlesex. On cross-examination he was asked whether he had ever committed that crime with her in Essex county. He objected to answer, on the grounds that it was incompetent and immaterial, and that the answer would tend to criminate himself. Held, that he was rightly compelled to answer. Ib.

Negligence.—It is for the jury to say whether a passenger on a horse-car is guilty of negligence in going to and standing upon the front platform, he having testified that there was not room for him in the car. Maguire v. Middlesex R. R. Co.

The mere fact that a passenger, injured while on the front platform of a horse-car, was drunk at the time, will not prevent his recovering damages against the company. Ib.

Unlawful Contract.—Under a statute providing that all persons using cans for the sale of milk shall have them sealed by an officer, and shall also be responsible for their correctness, and that the buyer may also demand to have them sealed, and imposing a penalty for the use of cans that have been condemned on examination, the sale of milk in unsealed cans is lawful, and the seller may recover price, unless the buyer has demanded that they be sealed. Ritchie v. Boynton.

Digitized by Google

Lien.—Under a statute giving boarding-house keepers a lien for the price of board on the property of their boarders, the lien attaches as and when the board is furnished, although the board is payable at regular times and the lien is sought to be asserted for board for which the time of payment has not arrived. Smith v. Colcord. [In Fitch v. Newberry, 1 Doug Mich. 1, the court say that in the case of a maritime lien for freight, the relation of debtor and creditor must subsist between the owner of the goods and the carrier, so that an action at law might then be maintained for the payment of the debt sought to be enforced But the two cases are not irreconcilable.]

Notes and Queries.

A correspondent in Wyandott, Kansas, sends the following note of enquiry:

"Please look at sec. 41, chap. 93, p. 232 of the session laws of Kansas for 1873, and answer, whether a foreign corporation (insurance company) can come into Kansas, solicit subscriptions to its stock, and take a stock-note (permitted by its charter in the home of it creator) in payment for the subscription, and enforce a collection of the assessments upon the same in the courts of Kansas, never having complied with the requirements of said section. Is not the taking a subscription and receiving a stock-note 'business of insurance'—not strictly 'business of insurance,' but one of the agencies or instruments of the business, so connected with it that it is necessarily a part of it? The corporation is organized to do a 'business of insurance,' nothing else, and the moment it crosses the state line by its agent, in any manner attempting to aid the company, is it not a 'business of insurance?'"

We should be glad to hear from any of our Kansas readers on this question. From the fact that its solution depends upon a local statute, we do not feel warranted in attempting to answer it.

EDITORS CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL:—Among the enumerated powers by the charter conferred upon the city council of the city of Mattoon, Illinois, are the following:

"Thirteenth. To license, tax and regulate merchants, &c.

"Fourteenth. To license, tax, regulate and suppress hackmen, &c.

"Fifteenth. To license, tax, regulate, prohibit and suppress billiard tables, &c.

"Sixteenth. To authorize the proper officer of the city to grant and issue licenses, and to direct the manner of issuing and registering thereof, and the fees and charges to be paid therefor; * * * * * * but no license for the sale of wines or other liquors, ardent or vinous, fermented or malt, at wholesale or retail, by grocery-keepers, inn-keepers, or others, shall be issued for less than fifty dollars or more than one thousand dollars.

"Seventeenth. To restrain, regulate and prohibit the selling or giving away of any intoxicating or malt liquors by any person within the city, except by persons duly licensed."

These are all the provisions of the charter on the subject of intoxicating liquors.

By the sixteenth section, power somewhere to grant license is assumed but not conferred. The same may be said of the seventeenth section—the word "license" being omitted from the clause conferring power on this subject.

Has the council power to grant license to sell intoxicating liquors in the city, so as to protect the licensee from prosecution under the state law, which punishes him who sells without license? J. F. H.

ANSWER.—The question asked by our correspondent seems to relate to a local controversy, and its solution dependent upon, or at least liable to be influenced by, local or general legislation, with which we are not familiar. Such questions we can not undertake to answer. If all the data are given, we would incline to the opinion that the council possessed the power to grant licenses to sell intoxicating liquor; but whether such licenses would protect the licensees from prosecution under state laws might be a different question, and one entirely dependent upon the legislation of the state.

Book Notice.

LEGAL MAXIMS, CLASSIFIED AND ILLUSTRATED. By HERBERT BROWN, LL.D. Seventh American, from the fifth London edition, with references to American Cases. Philadelphia: T. and J. W. Johnson & Co. 1874.

Since 1845, when the first edition of this well-known treatise was published, five editions have appeared in England and seven in this country. It is a work which has an established place in the legal literature of both countries. By reason of its wider range and greater usefulness, it at once superseded Wingate's Maxims and other similar collections, and holds its place to this present without a rival; and as its learned author, in 1870, gave to the last English edition the benefit of a careful revision, the period is far distant when the work is likely to have a competitor for professional favor. This work, as well as the same author's "Commentaries on the Common Law," shows that he has thoroughly studied the principles of English jurisprudence, and that he was well fitted to collect and explain the Maxims of the English law, whether indigenous or adopted, and to point out their purpose, scope and limitations and the exceptions to which, in their practical application, they are subject.

The present edition is superior to any of the previous ones. It has been revised in fact as well as in name, and contains nearly 1000 pages. The judicial decisions of Great Britain down to the latest date have been examined and pressed into the service of the author and made to enrich and illustrate his pages. It is a somewhat popular impression that the work is chiefly useful to students, but this is, in our judgment, a mistaken notion. It is true that it does discuss elementary legal principles, and hence it is adapted to the wants of students, but as the author has drawn his principles and illustrations from adjudicated cases, his treatise is especially useful to the practicing lawyer, and to the judge—more useful, as we think, than to the mere student. The title-page informs the reader that the work contains "references to American cases." To some extent this is true, but the references are by no means copious or complete. It has no American editor, and unless it were properly edited it were better without one. Its practical value here would be much enhanced by a more full citation of the American cases, and we suggest to the enterprising publishers that they select a learned legal scholar from the American bar or bench, under whose auspices the next edition may some years hence be introduced to the profession.

Legal News and Notes.

—THE house judiciary committee has authorized a bill to be reported to the house allowing circuit and district judges throughout the United States to employ stenographers at a salary of eight dollars per day, to report the decisions and proceedings of their courts. This is considered as a very essential matter, and will very much facilitate the keeping of such records in a correct and proper manner.

—THE house committee on public lands have agreed upon a bill to protect settlers on railroad lands. It provides that where a settler has filed a claim in the interior department before the withdrawal of the land from settlement he shall not be dispossessed. The department now removes settlers from lands granted to railroads if they have taken possession subsequent to the location of the route. The measure is intended to protect a large number of settlers who are now oppressed by the rulings of the interior department.

—An amusing scene took place the other day in the Supreme Court of New York, special term, in New York city, at the conclusion of Dilleber v. Home Life Ins. Co. The case was a suit upon a policy of life insurance, and the defence was fraud in deceiving the company in regard to the health of the insured in the application for the policy. The evidence made out an unequivocal case of an attempt to swindle the company by procuring an insurance upon the life of a man who was known to himself and friends to be in an advanced stage of an incurable disease. Upon this testimony a motion was made by the defendant's counsel that the court direct a verdict for the defendant. Owing to the importance of the case, Judge VAN VORST took the papers and prepared a written opinion, at the conclusion of which he directed a verdict for the defendant.

"Listen to your verdict as recorded," shortly called out the clerk to the jury; "you find for the defendant?"

"No! no!" exclaimed the jurymen, all evidently being taken by surprise at this unexpected procedure.

"You are discharged," blandly observed the judge, and as they left, a more blank-looking set of jurymen was never seen.

This scene presents a curious theme for speculation. If trial by jury is a bulwark of popular right, what kind of a bulwark does it become where the judge coolly enters upon his record a verdict as the verdict of the jury, they at the same time shouting from their box "no! no!" And yet to such extremities of legal fiction have we come at last.

Digitized by Google

THE CENTRAL LAW JOURNAL

Hon. JOHN F. DILLON, Editor. }
S. D. THOMPSON, Ass't Editor. }

ST. LOUIS, THURSDAY, MAY 14, 1874.

{ SUBSCRIPTION: $8 PER ANNUM, in Advance

WE publish in this number the recent opinion of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, ruling two new points under the act of congress of July 27, 1866, which relates to the removal of causes from the state to the federal courts—one concerning the amount necessary to entitle the party to a removal, the other as to the right of one alleged partner, who makes a separate defence, to have the cause transferred as to him.

THE opinion which we elsewhere publish, in [the case of Tappan v. The Merchants' National Bank of Chicago, will interest our readers, not only on account of the importance of the question itself, namely, the assessment for taxation of personal property, and in particular national bank shares, but also from the fact that it is the first opinion of the recently appointed Chief Justice of the United States. It presents a clear discussion of the subject, written in faultless English.

A RECENT number of the Albany Law Journal contains a long article on Religious Restraint of Trade, in which the learned editor takes occasion to illustrate the uses of legal journalism by "blazing a path," as the admirers of Mr. Bishop say, in advance of the courts, on the woman-praying-temperance crusade, which has lately had an absurd and spasmodic run in various parts of the country, and is now apparently subsiding. No doubt many a lawyer and many a layman has asked himself whether such demonstrations are tolerated by the law, and if not, of what species of offence do they consist? This question the Albany Law Journal lucidly answers: it is a nuisance in restraint of trade. This conclusion is enforced and illustrated by the following cases: Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. 381; Gilbert v. Mickle, 4 Sandf. Ch. 357; Rex v. Carlile, 6 Car. & P. 637; and Fairbanks v. Kerr, 70 Penn. State, 86; s. c., 10 Am. Rep. 664.

IT seems that notwithstanding the high salaries which judges and law officers of the government receive in England, they are beginning to experience difficulty in filling those offices with men who would be considered the first choice for such positions. The post of solicitor-general has recently, it seems, been refused by Mr. Huddleston, Q. C., on the ground that he prefers his private practice and the position in parliament of an independent supporter of the government. Sir James Karslake is also reported to have refused the attorney-generalship on the plea of ill-health. Commenting on these declinations the Irish Law Times says: "We apprehend that this double refusal may be attributed to the fact that the leaders of the bar consider their practice as independent lawyers more advantageous to themselves than the official leadership and almost inevitable transition to the bench which attends the appointment as law officer. If this be so, some other means must be devised of securing to the government the services of the leading members of the bar, belonging to whichever political party may be in power."

If this suggestion is true when applied to the condition of things in England, it would be trebly true in America, where the salaries of our judges are disgracefully low. The judges of the highest courts in this country can not adequately feed their families and furnish their libraries with the miserable pittance which is eked out to them under the name of salary.

WE publish in another place the interesting case of Chapman v. Rose, recently determined in the New York Court of Appeals, expounding the right of a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument as against the maker, who signed it without reading it, trusting to the fraudulent representations of another and supposing that he was signing a different paper. We learn that the case has excited a good deal of interest among the profession in New York, and do not doubt that its publication will be acceptable to our readers. Mr. Vanamee, of Middletown, N. Y., principal counsel for the plaintiff, through whose courtesy we have received the opinion, informs us that it is in conflict with the adjudications of all the Western courts of last resort except Iowa. However this may be, it seems to commend itself to reason and justice, its conclusion being based upon the principle that where one of two persons must suffer, it must rather be he through whose negligence the exigency has been occasioned. Besides it finds strong support in that public policy which is interested in upholding the negotiability of commercial paper. Negotiable bills and notes issued by private persons and corporations constitute a very large portion of the circulating medium by which the wheels of commerce are kept in motion. They are evidences of an enlarged credit, without which commerce, in the proportions to which it has attained in modern times, could not subsist. It must hence be apparent that any course of judicial decision which impairs the negotiability of such instruments, fetters and blocks the wheels of commerce. It is a "contractionist" policy of a dangerous character; for while it has a tendency to eliminate this class of paper from the exchanges of the world, it does not tend in the direction of those substantial benefits which flow from a specie basis of money. It simply has a tendency to impair and break down one of the leading evidences of commercial credit.

Fraud as a Ground for Annulling Marriage.

The case of Carris v. Carris, 1 Am. Law Times Reports, N. S. 41 (and which extends into the next number) contains a long and able discussion of this question. The discussion is divided into two branches. The first, whether the chancery court of New Jersey has succeeded to the powers of the ecclesiastical courts of England over this subject, and whether it hence has, without any express statutory grant of jurisdiction, power to annul a marriage on the ground of fraud. And this question is resolved in the affirmative, VANSYKEL, J., dissenting. The second question discussed is whether the fraud developed by the evidence in the particular case was of sufficient magnitude to avoid the marriage. The facts in proof were, that at the time the parties were married the complainant, the husband, believed from the acts of the wife and otherwise that she was chaste and virtuous; but nevertheless, so artfully had she and her friends concealed her condition, that two months after the marriage she was delivered of a full-grown child, begotten by some other man. The complainant found himself in a condition as perplexing as that of another man whose wife was delivered of a child a week after their marriage. This latter went to a cabinet maker and ordered a cradle, and told the mechanic that he might as well make him fifteen or twenty while he was about it, for his wife had a young one every week. In fact—

Digitized by Google

"A seven months' babe had been a truer gift;
Those two sweet moons confused his fatherhood."

Upon these facts the court held that the want of chastity and the concealment avoided the consent, and constituted such a fraud as would warrant a court of equity in declaring the marriage void ab initio.

Connected with this subject are some cases that bring together the sad and the comical in curious juxtaposition. In the case of The King v. The Inhabitants of Birmingham, 8 Barn. & Cres. 29, the marriage of a female pauper was brought about by fraud of the parish officers for the purpose of changing her domicile to the parish in which the husband was settled. It was nevertheless held that the marriage was valid, and that it operated to give the wife a settlement in the husband's parish. Precisely the same device was resorted to in a case in Vermont. The wife was a pauper, and so, it would seem, was the husband. They were settled upon different towns. Some of the inhabitants of the town which had the support of the wife, hired the husband for sixty dollars to enter into marriage with her in order to get her off their hands. The fraud was consummated, the marriage duly solemnized, and the wife's domicile thereby changed to the husband's town. About three weeks afterwards the wife was deserted, and, as it would seem, turned out to starve. Upon her petition the marriage was declared a nullity. Barnes v. Wyethe, 28 Vt. ——.

In a case in Tennessee, a husband, before his death, devised his plantation and six slaves to his wife "during her natural life or widowhood," with remainder to his children. After the death of the husband the widow became involved in debt; judgments were recovered against her and executions levied upon this plantation and these slaves. How to save to herself the use of this property was to her, no doubt, an all-important question; and, probably acting on the advice of some shrewd lawyer, she resorted to the experiment of entering into a marriage in legal form and solemnity with a drunken and degraded fellow, with whom, it seems, she never cohabited and never expected to cohabit. This done, of course the property immediately vested in the children and the creditor was defeated. The latter brought a bill in equity for the purpose of annulling the marriage on the ground that it was entered into solely in order to defraud him out of the satisfaction of his judgment. But the supreme court held that such a bill could not be maintained. The opinion was written by Judge McKinney, and is a fine illustration of the terse, clear and conclusive reasoning for which that jurist was distinguished. After showing quite conclusively that a court will not exercise its jurisdiction to annul a marriage on the ground of fraud at the suit of third parties, where the parties to the marriage contract do not complain, he puts the question involved in the particular case beyond doubt in the following sentences: "The interest of the defendant, Mary, was an estate upon condition, and her subsequent marriage with the other defendant was an absolute forfeiture of that estate as to herself, her creditors, and all other persons. This forfeiture she might incur at pleasure—it depended solely upon her own volition and act—and no power known to our law could have restrained her from doing so. It would be grossly paradoxical, then, to hold that a forfeiture lawfully incurred could be relieved against, or that a court of equity, though powerless to prevent the forfeiture by restraining the marriage, had nevertheless the jurisdiction to relieve against the consequences of such forfeiture." McKinney v. Clarke, 2 Swan, 321. The case of Castellar v. Simmons, determined about the same time in Tennessee, which has never been reported, but a copy of which the present writer has in his possession, presents the question in a still sadder aspect. The plaintiff recovered against the defendant a judgment of $1500 for a breach of promise of marriage. On the day after the summons was issued in the suit for the breach of promise, the defendant, Simmons, transferred his property to a third person to avoid the payment of the judgment which might be obtained. After recovering her judgment the plaintiff filed a bill in chancery to set aside this conveyance. Pending the chancery suit, the defendant, Simmons, proposed to marry the plaintiff, for the secret purpose of defeating her bill. The plaintiff was simple enough to consent, the ceremony was performed, and within ten minutes thereafter Simmons eloped with a strumpet and betook himself to parts unknown. When the wife discovered how wretchedly she had been deceived, she filed a bill in equity to annul the marriage, and the case coming before the supreme court, the same learned judge said:

"Has the Court of Chancery power to annul the marriage? In a case at Nashville [McKinney v. Clarke, supra] a creditor filed his bill to annul a marriage celebrated for the purpose of defrauding him of his debt. Relief in his case was refused. But here we are called upon by one of the parties to the marriage to grant relief against a fraud which the other party has, through the marriage, perpetrated upon her. In the opinion of a majority of the court we are compelled to announce that the marriage can not be set aside on this ground. Misrepresentations as to station, property and the like, afford no ground of relief against a marriage. The fraud in this case consists in the secret intention of the party to desert the wife. The object was to secure a pecuniary benefit. If this were a ground of relief, the courts of chancery would be crowded with applications of this kind.

"We are of opinion that the complainant is entitled to relief by divorce and alimony. But in the view we take, the sale, which would be void against a creditor (and such the plaintiff was until her marriage with the defendant, Simmons), would be valid as against the party himself, and as against the wife by the subsequent marriage, who can only claim under him. In this attitude the plaintiff now finds herself. The only relief, then, against the property will be to reach the purchase money so far as it remains unpaid. Though the answer states that the purchase money is paid, there is much in the case to attack it indirectly, and so much suspicion against it that we will require the purchaser to show the payment by clear proof. Cause remanded for proof on this point. Costs accrued and to accrue to be paid by defendant."

Totten, J., dissented.

So much for this interesting question. Without doubt the books contain many other cases equally curious and equally irreconcilable.

Digitized by Google

The Arkansas Imbroglio—Some of its Legal Aspects.

We have hitherto refrained from making any allusion to the contest which unhappily threatens with bloodshed and civil strife the unfortunate people of Arkansas. With the political aspects of such a question, we of course, in these columns, can have nothing to say. Our attention has, however, recently been called to the legal aspects of the contest by a brief furnished us through the courtesy of A. M. Rose, Esq., of counsel for Baxter, and also by a brief submitted to the attorney-general on behalf of Brooks, which will be found in the New York Herald of May 8. These briefs enable us to seize upon and present to our readers the salient points of the contest; and these appear to be substantially as follows:

The constitution of Arkansas, after providing that the returns of every election for governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, treasurer, auditor, attorney-general and superintendent of public instruction shall be opened and counted by the president of the senate in the presence of the members of that body during the first week of the session, recites that "contested elections shall likewise be determined by both houses of the general assembly, in such manner as is or may hereafter be prescribed by law." (Const. of Ark., art. VI, § 19.) By a statute in force at the time this constitution was adopted and still in force, it is also provided that "all contested elections of governor shall be decided by the joint vote of both houses of the general assembly, and in such joint meeting the president of the senate shall preside." The statute then describes minutely the manner in which such a contest is to be conducted. These provisions would seem to be entirely decisive of the jurisdictional question involved in the contest; for the vesting of co-ordinate jurisdiction in any other tribunal over the same question would not only be absurd, but would have a direct tendency to produce anarchy and bloodshed. There can, therefore, be no intendment in favor of any other tribunal possessing such jurisdiction. If it exist, it can only be in pursuance of constitutional or statutory provisions equally strong and conclusive in their terms as those above recited. But to offset this express grant of jurisdiction there appears to be nothing in the constitution or laws of Arkansas, except a general grant of jurisdiction to the courts to hear and determine proceedings for the usurpation of office. This general grant of jurisdiction is found in the following provisions of the Arkansas code of 1874; and we understand that it is upon these alone that jurisdiction in the courts to determine proceedings for the usurpation of the executive offices of the state government is claimed:

"In lieu of the writs of scire facias and quo warranto, or of an information in the nature of a quo warranto, actions by proceedings at law may be brought to vacate or repeal charters, and prevent the usurpation of an office or franchise." § 522.

"Whenever a person usurps an office or franchise to which he is not entitled by law, an action by proceedings at law may be instituted against him either by the state or the party entitled in office or franchise to prevent the usurper from exercising the office or franchise." § 525.

"For usurpation of other than county offices or franchises, the action by the state shall be instituted and prosecuted by the attorney-general." § 527.

"Where a person is adjudged to have usurped an office or franchise, he shall be deprived thereof by the judgment of the court, and the person adjudged entitled thereto reinstated therein; but no one shall be adjudged entitled thereto unless the action is instituted by him. And the court shall have power to enforce its judgment by causing the books and papers, and all other things pertaining to the office or franchise, to be surrendered by the usurper, and by preventing him from further exercising or using the same, and may enforce its orders by fine and imprisonment until obeyed." § 529.

On the principle that a statute which operates specifically and directly upon a given subject-matter excludes the operation from the particular subject-matter of an inconsistent statute couched in general terms (Sedgwick Stat. & Con. Law, 123), there seems little room to doubt that the constitution of Arkansas vests exclusive jurisdiction in the general assembly of hearing and determining "all" cases of contested elections to the executive officers of the state government, and that the jurisdiction granted to the courts by the general statutes last quoted refers to other and inferior offices. Again, the constitution having vested jurisdiction of "all" such cases in the general assembly, there would seem to be very clear ground to question the constitutionality of a statute vesting it in another tribunal. And a statute will not be interpreted so as to bring it in conflict with the constitution when such an interpretation can be avoided.

The votes for governor were counted by the senate as prescribed by law, and it was officially declared that Baxter had been elected by nearly 4000 majority. Now it had been held that the Supreme Court of Arkansas has original jurisdiction in all matters of quo warranto. Price v. Page, 25 Ark. 527. On the one hand it is claimed that Mr. Brooks suffered the legislature to adjourn without instituting any contest before that body, as prescribed by the constitution and statute above cited, but instead thereof instituted a proceeding against Baxter by quo warranto in the supreme court; and, on the other hand, it is asserted (and this is probably the fact) that Brooks presented his petition to the legislature asking to be allowed to contest Baxter's right to the office, and that body refused to consider it. It was rejected without being read. The supreme court, in the quo warranto suit, held that neither the supreme court nor any other court had jurisdiction over the question, but that such jurisdiction was exclusively vested in the legislature. The language of the court was as follows: "Under this constitution the determination of the question whether a person exercising the office of governor has been duly elected or not is vested exclusively in the general assembly of the state, and neither this nor any other court has jurisdiction to try a suit in relation to such contest, be the mode or form what it may be, whether at the suit of the attorney-general, or on the relation of a claimant through him, or by an individual alone claiming a right to the office. Such issue should be made before the general assembly. It is their duty to decide, and no other tribunal can determine that question. We are of the opinion that this court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine a writ of quo warranto for the purpose of rendering judgment of ouster against the chief executive of this state, and the right to file an information and issue a writ for that purpose is denied." In this opinion three of the five judges, namely, Judges GREGG, STEPHENSON and SEARLE concurred. Chief Justice MCCLURE dissented, and Judge BENNETT neither signed the opinion nor dissented.

Digitized by Google

This opinion was unanimously affirmed by the same court in the case of Wheeler v. Whytock, MS., 1873. The case was as follows: After the election in 1872, Mr. Wheeler, the candidate on the Grant-Baxter ticket, was declared to be elected auditor over Mr. Berry, the candidate on the Greeley-Brooks ticket. Mr. Berry brought his suit in the Pulaski Circuit Court against Mr. Wheeler, under the provisions of the code above cited. This suit was also pending some time. Mr. Wheeler at last applied to the supreme court for a prohibition against the circuit court to prevent it from exercising jurisdiction in the cause. The writ was ordered, the court holding unanimously that the case was governed by the decision in the case of The State on the relation of Brooks v. Baxter; that the jurisdiction of these contests was vested exclusively in the general assembly, and that no state court could interfere in the matter. It seems that Governor Baxter has been unable to get a copy of this opinion, although it is by law a public document.

Thus stood the case until the recent coup d'etat, and everybody supposed the question definitely settled by the legislature and supreme court. But in the meantime the two governors changed their political affinities. Baxter, who had been elected, or declared elected, on the "Minstrel" or Grant ticket, began to affiliate with the Democrats, and in the meantime Brooks, who claimed to have been elected on the "Brindletail" or Greeley ticket, came to a secret understanding with the republican leaders. This altered the case with the Supreme Court of Arkansas. It was now your bull that has gored my ox, as we shall presently see. The judicial trick which resulted in surprising Governor Baxter and ejecting him from the state-house and installing Brooks in his stead, is familiar to every person who has read the newspapers. If we except the celebrated midnight order of Judge DURELL, which, as appears from the testimony taken before the congressional sub-committee at New Orleans, was issued upon his own motion, it has no parallel in the judicial annals of our country. How it was done, we shall allow Mr. Rose's brief to tell:

"The country was in a state of most profound peace. There was no political strife or contest to awaken interest or incite a conflict, when, on the 15th of the present month, the fact became known that Mr. Brooks had gone to the state-house at a time when a heavy rain was falling and the streets were deserted, accompanied by twenty-five armed men, and had ejected Governor Baxter from the capitol. A little later it became known that Brooks had taken his oath of office before Chief Justice MCCLURE, and claimed to be acting under a judgment rendered in his favor in the above-named suit pending in the Pulaski Circuit Court. And here we may mention several extraordinary facts connected with this judgment, which we believe to be true, and which have not been denied, so far as we know. The judgment was rendered in the absence of Governor Baxter and his attorneys, when nearly the entire bar was in attendance on the federal court, and when it was the understanding of the bar that during that week no business in the circuit court would be taken up without consent; Judge DILLON, of the federal court, being present in the city, and being obliged to press the call of his docket. The judgment was made final on overruling the demurrer, although the civil code of Arkansas, section 154, provides that 'upon a demurrer being overruled, the party demurring may answer or reply.' The court also gave judgment against Governor Baxter for over $2,000 for emoluments of the office received by him, without any writ of enquiry or evidence that he had received any emoluments; all of which were acts only consistent with the idea that the court, as was a well-known fact, had no jurisdiction of the cause, and that the judge was acting with that caprice which is not restrained by official or judicial barriers. Perhaps no judgment was ever more speedily executed. The mandate outran rumor. Official mandate or writ there was none. The parties could not wait for any document of the kind to be made out. By their haste they took Governor Baxter by surprise. He was surrounded by no guards. Armed men entered his room and ejected him. It is contended that no writ was necessary—that the judgment itself amounted to an ouster. We shall not go into technicalities. Technical rules do not apply to such a proceeding. Bayonets and muskets could not give any moral strength to the so-called judgment. If the judgment had been of any force they would have been needless. The whole affair only admits of one explanation. It was a conspiracy, and has a very bad aspect."

It must be remembered that this proceeding, whereby Brooks was declared to be governor, was before a single circuit judge, in a case over which the supreme court of the state had twice declared that no court had jurisdiction. That a circuit judge should thus usurp a jurisdiction which the supreme court sitting above him had determined he did not possess, was a matter of great surprise; but it is a matter of greater surprise that the same supreme court, which had twice decided that no such jurisdiction existed in the courts, should affirm the circuit judge in the exercise of it. This they have done in the case of Brooks v. Page, state treasurer, the text of which, as telegraphed to the daily press, is as follows:

Application for mandamus:. Opinion by Chief Justice MCCLURE. The 12th section of chapter 164 of Gould's Digest reads as follows:

"For the purpose of carrying into effect the object and directions of the section last preceding, the further sum of fifty thousand dollars shall be and the same is hereby appropriated and placed at the disposal of the governor, to be drawn from the treasury under warrants from the auditor, to be issued on requisitions of the governor for the purposes specified in the preceding section, and for no other purpose.

The fourth section, to which the above reference is made, is as follows:

"SEC. 11. The governor is hereby authorized and it is made his duty to superintend generally everything required to be done by this act, and see that every branch of the service is properly conducted, and to see that the laws of the state are fully and efficiently enforced throughout the utmost limits thereof; and if the laws can not be enforced by ordinary means, nor by the means hereinbefore prescribed, it is hereby made the duty of the governor, as soon as it may appear to be necessary, to order out such number of the militia of this state as the service may require, and with military force take possession of the county and expel therefrom or seize and bring to trial all disorderly and disaffected persons without delay, and keep possession of all such by force until order is restored and the sovereignty and laws of Arkansas acknowledged and obeyed."

From the pleadings it appears that the relator, Joseph Brooks, styling himself governor of Arkansas, made a requisition for $1000 on the appropriation made by the 12th section of the act referred to, and that the auditor, in obedience to said requisition, drew his warrant on the treasurer for the amount specified therein, and that said treasurer refused to pay said warrant or issue treasurer's certificates therefor. In response to the prayer of the petition the treasurer admits his refusal to pay said warrant, and submits that he is not bound to do so because Elisha Baxter was declared duly elected governor; and that he took the oath of office, etc., and that in fact said Baxter is governor of the state of Arkansas, and not the relator, Joseph Brooks.

Digitized by Google

To the response the relator files a replication, alleging that by the judgment of the circuit court of Pulaski county he was adjudged the office of governor; that he took the oath of office, etc., and entered upon the discharge of the duties thereof, etc.

To the replication a demurrer is filed, the grounds being that said judgment is not sufficient in law to maintain an action. The only question that we deem it necessary to notice is: did the circuit court have jurisdiction to render the judgment in the case of Brooks v. Baxter? We feel some delicacy about expressing an opinion upon the question propounded, but under the pleadings it has to be passed upon incidentally, if not absolutely, in determining whether the relator is entitled to the relief asked for. His right to the office, if established at all, is established by the judgment of the circuit court of Pulaski county. We are of the opinion that the circuit court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and its judgment appears to be regular and valid.

Having arrived at these conclusions, the demurrer is overruled, and the writ of mandamus will be awarded as prayed for.

Signed by JOHN MCCLURE, Chief Justice; JOHN E. BENNETT, E. J. SEARLE, M. L. STEPHENSON, Asssociate Justices.

That a court of this character could thus overrule its own decision, twice pronounced and in substantially the same case, and without attempting to assign any reason for so doing, is astonishing. It enforces upon the mind the suggestion how deep and well matured was the plot which has so suddenly ended in a political denouement of which the history of our country affords but one parallel.

But whatever feelings must be entertained towards such a judiciary by every honest breast, concerning the arrest and spiriting away of two of the judges by Governor Baxter's militia there can be but one opinion. Whatever preconceived opinions they may have been known to entertain, and whatever predetermined judgment it may have been known that they were prepared to render, they had a right to assemble at the capital and sit in judgment, without molestation, upon any question that should come before them. Their arrest was an outrage which Governor Baxter has not had the courage to avow; which was unworthy of the dignity of American citizens, and which sinks those engaged in it to a position akin to Mexican or Haytian revolutionists. Doubtless those engaged in it honestly felt that they had strong public reasons for such an extraordinary measure, and the previous indecent conduct of three of these judges in telegraphing to the president that they recognized Brooks as governor, thus prejudging the whole case without a hearing, and the subsequent decision of the court go far towards justifying them; but it can not be doubted that the act will receive the general condemnation of the American people.

We have endeavored, in discussing this subject to divest it of its personal and political aspects, and to look upon it simply as a legal question. That Brooks was elected by a fair majority we do not deny, but fully believe. This has hitherto been generally claimed by the followers of Baxter. We think it equally certain that if an election were held to-day, Baxter would be elected by an equal majority and by substantially the same votes. But in our judgment, whether Brooks or Baxter be the legal governor is a question which the legislature has exclusive jurisdiction to determine. And when the legislature does determine the contest in the mode pointed out by law, that decision will be conclusive, and should be acquiesced in by the people and respected by the federal government. It now seems that the president has determined to let the legislature which is assembling settle the whole question, and to abide by and enforce that settlement.

It is to be understood, however, that these are the views of the undersigned alone, and for them he alone is responsible.

S. D. T.

Taxation of National Bank Shares—Chief Justice Waite's First Opinion.

JOHN W. TAPPAN, COLLECTOR OF TAXES, ETC., APPELLANT, v. THE MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF CHICAGO.

Supreme Court of the United States, April, 1874.

1. Taxation of Personal Property.—Personal property, in the absence of any law to the contrary, follows the person of the owner, and has its situs at his domicile. But for the purposes of taxation it may be separated from him, and he may be taxed at the place where it is actually located.

2. National Bank Shares Personal Property.—Shares of stock in national banks are personal property, made so in express terms by the act of congress under which such banks are organized. 13 Stat. at Large, 102, § 12.

3. Taxation of National Bank Shares.—Held, therefore, that the state within which a national bank is situated has jurisdiction for the purposes of taxation of all the shareholders of the bank, both resident and non-resident, and of all its shares, and may legislate accordingly.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

We are called upon in this case to determine whether the general assembly of the state of Illinois could, in 1867, provide for the taxation of the owners of shares of the capital stock of a national bank in that state, at the place within the state where the bank was located, without regard to their places of residence. The statute of Illinois, under the authority of which the taxes complained of were assessed, was passed before the act of congress, approved February 10, 1868 (15 Stat. at Large, 34), which gave a legislative construction to the words "place where the bank is located, and not elsewhere," as used in section 41 of the national banking act (13 Stat. at Large, 112), and permitted the state to determine and direct the manner and place of taxing resident shareholders, but provided that non-residents should be taxed only in the city or town where the bank is located.

The power of taxation by any state is limited to persons, property, or business within its jurisdiction. R. R. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall. 319. Personal property, in the absence of any law to the contrary, follows the person of the owner and has its situs at his domicile. But, for the purpose of taxation, it may be separated from him, and he may be taxed on its account at the place where it is actually located. These are familiar principles and have been often acted upon in this court and in the courts of Illinois. If the state has actual jurisdiction of the person of the owner, it operates directly upon him. If he is absent, and it has jurisdiction of his property, it operates upon him through his property.

Shares of stock in national banks are personal property. They are made so in express terms by the act of congress under which such banks are organized. 13 Stat. at Large, 102, § 12. They are a species of personal property which is, in one sense, intangible and incorporeal, but the law which creates them may separate them from the person of their owner for the purpose of taxation, and give them a situs of their own. This has been done. By section 41 of the national banking act, it is in effect provided that all shares in such banks, held by any person or body corporate, may be included in the valuation of the personal property of uch person or corporation in the assessment of taxes imposeds under state authority, at the place where the bank is located, and not elsewhere. 13 Stat. at Large, 112. This is the law of property. Every owner takes the property subject to this power of taxation under state authority, and every non-resident, by becoming an owner, voluntarily submits himself to the jurisdiction of the state in which the bank is established, for all the purposes of taxation on account of his ownership. His money invested in the shares is withdrawn from taxation under the authority of the state in which he resides, and submitted to the taxing power of the state where, in contemplation of the law, his investment is located. The state, therefore, within which a national bank is situated has jurisdiction, for the purposes of taxation, of all the shareholders of the bank, both resident and non-resident, and of all its shares, and may legislate accordingly.

Digitized by Google

The state of Illinois thus having had, in 1867, the right to tax all the shareholders of national banks in that state on account of their shares, it remains to consider at what place or places within the state such taxes could be assessed.

It is conceded that it was within the power of the state to tax the shares of non-resident shareholders at the place where the bank was located, but it is claimed that under the constitution of the state resident shareholders could only be taxed at the places of their residence. We have not been referred to any express provision of the constitution to that effect. There is nothing which in terms prohibits the general assembly from separating personal property within the state from the person of the owner and locating it at appropriate places for the purposes of taxation, but it is insisted that sections 2 and 5 of article IX. of the constitution of 1848, which was in force when the act of 1867 was passed, contain an implied prohibition.

